There is no place, says a correspondent of the Boston Gazette, with the possible exception of the now famous Garden of Eden, that is capable of giving such expansiveness to a desperate flirtation as Mount Desert—except, as I said, the Garden of Eden, because I have always had a suspicion that Adam and Eve went about as far in a desperate flirtation as well conducted people could, without getting themselves talked about. Still, I suppose that if you take everything into consideration they are partly to be excused. Yes, at Mount Desert, what you can't venture to do under the gauzy veil of a desperate flirtation—well, it isn't worth doing. You can spend eighteen hours out of the twenty-four in one another's company, and if you are not too delicate in your conception of those same proprieties I have mentioned before, you can utilize another hour. You can breakfast together, dine together, sup together; you can pass the morning together, the afternoon together, the evening together, in the parlor, in the woods, in the ball-room—and it's only a desperate flirtation. Did I say "evening together"? Yes, indeed; and when the evening is pretty well gone, you can go out in a boat, row to some remote island, and pass half the night together, and some of the morning—and it will only be a desperate flirtation. On the ball steps you may hug, kiss, and squeeze—and it is only a desperate flirtation. If you go yachting, girls, by moonlight, you may talk love—and, what is better, act it, if you are only careful not to thrust it in people's faces, and you will be laughed at as merely desperate flirts. You may go, boys, and spend the day in the beautiful groves, so thick as to be almost impenetrable, with some fair-haired companion in a flannel dress and a Pompeian red grosvener, eat æsthetic sandwiches with her, and drink champagne, and vary the proceedings with an occasional draught such as that Adonis fool was forced to quaff from Venus's coral lips; and when you have passed the day in a manner about as near as may suit your fancy or hers, like that in which they say it used to be the wont of Dido and Æneas, or Héloïse and Abelard, you may come home arm in arm, tell your friends that you have been off studying the flora of the neighborhood, or discussing some of the fallacies of the Neo-Kantian school—and it will only be regarded as a desperate flirtation, that's all. Anyway, it doesn't matter so much in this world what you do; it's what people talk about. And that is the reason, I suppose—to revert to that venerable instance I cited before—that Adam and Eve carried the thing so far they didn't need to care what people said.

The very latest is to adorn the paws of the pug with silver bangles, and to conceal his neck with an imitation linen collar turned down at the corners and fastened with a stud. Pugs of this decorated description are often seen in Regent Street, London, carried on the arm of a strapping footman, while his mistress is in some shop making purchases. It is difficult to say which deserves the most praise for affording the public so edifying a spectacle.

The London Figaro feels badly because the American minister monopolizes the attention of the Grand Turk: General Wallace, the American Minister, is as much in favor as ever with his imperial majesty. A few days ago he presented his new "letters of credence" as Minister Plenipotentiary to the Porte, and last night a dinner was given in his honor at Yildiz. Mrs. Wallace was also invited, as well as Messrs. Heap and Gargulio, the Consul-General and the chief dragoman. It is very seldom now that a lady is invited to the imperial table. Lady Dufferin has not yet received such an attention, although the ambassador has sat out several state dinners at Yildiz. As a big Turk remarked to a correspondent, in reference to Lord Dufferin's sudden flight to the islands: "Your Elchee, in telling the Porte that he was going away for several days, and that they might send for him if he were really wanted, is paying the Palace out for the slights showered on his wife in this dining business, and the cavalier treatment he met with on first arriving at Constantinople."

If dancing be one of the qualifications of an ambassador, then is Lord Dufferin one of the best fitted men in that respect for a diplomatic career. He is the most indefatigable dancer in a ball-room, and he invariably selects as his partners young and pretty ladies. "Do you know why I was so popular in Canada?" says his lordship. "I'll tell you. I made a point of dancing with every pretty girl I came across, and lifting my hat to every well-dressed person."

The fishwife's poke is the novelty for little girls' wear. Mrs. Langtry has achieved glory already. A sweet cracker—biscuit, she would call it in England—has been named for her by a gallant American manufacturer of that dry edible, and will be known henceforth as the Langtry cracker. Street costumes are either very gay or very sober. A great deal of red will be worn by little people. Mrs. Langtry has done Rosalind, and they delighted the bald heads. They voted them the most shapely since poor Neilson. Copper shades with electric blue; strawberry red with rifle green, and brown with green, are the contrasts of color favored for autumn toilets. The newest fans are of flat feathers, in all shades, with a bird's head in the centre. Tan-colored, long-wristed, loose gloves are the first favorites of fashion. Young persons are emulating Diogenes by going about with diminutive lanterns hanging in their ears. The Princess of Wales is made responsible for a great deal that is outré and abominable in the fashions, but she must be demented to countenance this yellow lace.

LITERARY NOTES.

"Captain Mansana" is the title of the latest volume of stories that Professor R. B. Anderson has translated from the Norse of Björnsterne Björnson. It contains two other stories also—"The Railroad and the Churchyard," and "Dust." The title story was written in 1873, just after the author's Italian trip. The second story is one written in his younger days, while the third appeared in a Norwegian magazine in February of this year. It is interesting to note in this connection that Björnson has just celebrated his fiftieth birthday, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his first appearance in print. The present volume is the last of this writer's shorter stories, and only one long one remains untranslated, "Magnhild," which will shortly appear, and close this series. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

The latest number of the "Round Robin Series" is "Doctor Ben." It is a well written description of life in a mad-house—not the old-fashioned mad-house of "Valentine Vox" or "Very Hard Cash," but a "sanitarium," managed by a physician of sterling character. The plot is simple, and hinges upon a maiden's faithfulness. Ben Hollins, the hero, meets with an accident that affects his brain on the eve of his marriage to Betty Hartley. He wanders about the village in harmless madness. Thomas Macrae, the villain, endeavors to win Betty's love. But she vows that she will remain faithful to her betrothed. Macrae, to further his plans, has Ben abducted to Doctor Patterson's institute for the insane. This proves to be the best thing for Ben, for the doctor cures him, and he is enabled to marry his sweetheart. Meanwhile Macrae meets with a fitting and violent death. Published by J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston; for sale by the booksellers.

Mr. R. E. Thompson has taken great care in the preparation of his work on "Political Economy," of which the third edition now appears. He has consulted many authorities, both ancient and modern, and quotes freely from various authors. His object is twofold: first, to serve the purposes of those who desire to investigate the subject, but have not the time nor opportunity for deep research; and secondly, as a textbook for schools and colleges, where teachers desire to elucidate the science with reference to the national policy of our government. Mr. Thompson is a believer in protection as opposed to free-trade. He does not attempt—like the free-traders—to reason from imaginary propositions and advance impracticable theories, but gives plain statements of historical facts, and then allows them to speak for themselves. He not only shows the advantage of protection, as prevalent among the ancients and also in the past eighteen centuries, but also convinces the reader, by a review of the English and French commerce and trade for the past three decades, of the losses and financial embarrassments into which their free-trade advocates have led them. The volume is by no means heavy, and will prove readable to the veriest novice. Published by Porter & Coates, Philadelphia; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

"Sylvie's Betrothed," by Henry Gréville, has just been translated from the French by Mary N. Sherwood. It is a rather clever story, and is exceptionally well translated. It relates the sorrows of four persons—two women and two men. Sylvie, the heroine, falls in love with her godfather, M. Clermont, a man of forty. He is extremely fond of his wife, and is in turn much loved by her. Sylvie's suitor, Jacques, is a protégé of Madame Clermont. Sylvie and Jacques become engaged, but Sylvie, although loving him after a fashion, has too strong a passion for M. Clermont, who, being thrown into her company to a great extent, finally reciprocates. Sylvie is frightened at this, and repels him. A mutual confession ensues in which the two decide to subdue their love. Meantime the same thing has happened to M. Clermont's neglected wife and Sylvie's neglected lover. These two have a similar dénouement; an explanation is made, and they come to the same conclusion. But this condition of affairs is suddenly altered by the husband and wife reviving their old affection for each other with redoubled ardor. Sylvie suddenly finds that she has never loved any one but Jacques; who, for his part, says that Sylvie holds his undivided heart. Thus everything ends happily. Published by T. B. Peterson & Co.; for sale by Bancroft; price, 75 cents.

Miscellany: The first article of a series on the American poets has been prepared by Monsieur Léo Quessel for the Bibliothèque Universelle de Genève Suisse. Its subject is Longfellow. Monsieur Erckmann, the well known literary partner of Monsieur Chatrian, has only just recovered from a most serious and alarming illness. The printing of the British Museum catalogue, which has been discussed for nearly half a century, has at last begun, but at the rate which the government is providing for the work the whole catalogue will not be in print for forty years. The value of such a complete catalogue can not easily be estimated. Mr. and Mrs. T. B. Aldrich sailed for home on September 16th, from Liverpool, aboard the Servia. Longfellow, it is reported, was never fully satisfied with his tragedy of "Michael Angelo," which is shortly to be published. The Boston correspondent of the American Bookeller says that the poet conceived the idea of writing the tragedy eight years ago, on the occasion of the four hundredth anniversary of the sculptor's birth. A little volume of "Aphorisms" has been translated by Mrs. A. L. Wister, from the German of Marie, Fisihray von Ebner, Eschenbach, and published by J. B. Lippincott & Co. Some of the most interesting letters in the forthcoming volume of Emerson's correspondence are from the pen of John Sterling. Monsieur Turgeneff is much better—the happy change in his health being attributed in part to the generous use of milk. He no longer needs hypodermic injections. He is engaged upon a short story, and has lately written to the Pushkin society that he expects to be able to attend their proposed reunion at St. Petersburg. The English "Folk-Lore Society" has now published three volumes of their "Records"—"Notes on Folk-Lore of Northern Counties of England and the Borders," by William Henderson; "Aubrey: Remains of Gentilism and Judaism," edited by James Britten, F. L. S.; "Notes on Folk-Lore of Northeast Scotland," by the Reverend Walter Gregor. Many ladies are members of the society, which also includes Professor Max Müller, Mr. Lang, and Mr. Ralston.

Announcements: George MacDonald is writing a new novel. The subjects of the essays in his forthcoming volume, "Orts," are as follows: "The Imagination: its Functions and its Culture," "A Sketch of Individual Development," "St. George's Day, 1564," "The Art of Shakespeare, as Revealed by Himself," "The Elder Hamlet," "On Polish," "Browning's 'Christmas Eve,'" "Essays on Some of the Forms of Literature," "The History and Heroes of Medicine," "Wordsworth's Poetry," "True Christian Ministering," "Shelley," "A Sermon." Those who do not care to look at the dictionary may like to know that the word "Orts" means "fragments," and that it has been used by Milton. The "Legend of 1804," the sketch which Mr. Thomas Hardy has written for Harper's Christmas, deals with the story that in that year Napoleon made a midnight reconnaissance at Dover preparatory to an invasion of England. Mr. Hardy describes an English fisher-lad as going to sleep on the shore, and waking to hear in the darkness near him the muffled voices of Napoleon and his companions. Mr. Austin Dobson is engaged in writing a preface and making selections from Herrick's poems for the beautiful volume which the Harpers intend to publish. Many of Herrick's verses besides those illustrated so charmingly by Mr. Abbey will be included in this American tribute to the English poet of a former day. Mr. Russell, the author of that delightful story of the ocean, "The Wreck of the Grosvenor," has been writing another entitled "The Sea-Queen." The Harpers will publish it during the winter. Mr. George Augustus Sala is preparing a volume on "Living London," with illustrations made by himself. Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford has contributed to Harper's Christmas a story of the early days of New England, entitled "A Widow." Miss McLean, the author of "Cape Cod Folks"—which has, by the way, reached its twelfth thousand—has written a new novel. She has given it the felicitous title of "Tow-Head: The Story of a Girl's Life," and it will soon be published by A. Williams & Co.

INTAGLIOS.

[Recently there has appeared a volume of poems by Renel Rodd, a young Englishman, who is an apostle of Swinburne, and who dedicates his book, "Rose Leaf and Apple Leaf," to Oscar Wilde. This latter fact must not be counted against him, for his verses are marked by really exceptional powers. They have excited considerable attention in England and in the Eastern States. We give a number of his most striking poems.]

Long After.

I see your white arms gliding
In music o'er the keys;
Long drooping lashes hiding
A blue like summer seas;
The sweet lips wide asunder,
That tremble as you sing;
I could not choose but wonder,
You seemed so fair a thing.

For all these long years after
The dream has never died;
I still can hear your laughter,
Still see you at my side.
One lily hiding under
The waves of golden hair;
I could not choose but wonder,
You were so strangely fair.

I keep the flower you braided
Among those waves of gold;
The leaves are sere and faded,
And like our love grown old.
Our lives have lain asunder,
The years are long, and yet
I could not choose but wonder—
I can not quite forget.

Disillusion.

Ah! what would youth be doing,
To hoist his crimson sails,
To leave the wood-doves cooing
The song of nightingales,
To leave this woodland quiet
For murmuring winds at strife,
For waves that foam and riot
About the seas of life?

From still bays silver sanded
Wild currents hasten down,
To rocks where ships are stranded
And eddies where men drown.
Far out, by hills surrounded,
Is the golden haven gate,
And all beyond unbounded
Are shoreless seas of fate.

They steer for those far highlands
Across the summer tide,
And dream of fairy islands
Upon the farther side.
They only see the sunlight,
The flashing of gold bars,
But the other side is moonlight
And glimmer of pale stars.

They will not heed the warning
Blown back on every wind,
For hope is born with morning,
The secret is behind.
Whirled through in wild confusion
They pass the narrow strait
To the sea of disillusion
That lies beyond the gate.

After Heine.

Beautiful fisherman's daughter,
Steer in your bark to the land!
Come down to me over the water
And talk to me hand in hand!

Lay here on my heart those tresses,
For look, what have you to fear
Who are held with the sea's caresses
Every day in the year?

My heart is at one with the deep,
In its storm, in its ebb and flow,
And ah! there are pearls asleep
In cavernous depths below.

A Roman Mirror.

They found it in her hollow marble hed,
There where the numberless dead cities sleep,
They found it lying where the spade struck deep—
A broken mirror by a maiden dead.

These things—the heads she wore about her throat
Alternate blue and amber all untied,
A lamp to light her way, and on one side
The toll-man's pay to that strange ferry-boat.

No trace to-day of what in her was fair!
Only the record of long years grown green
Upon the mirror's lustreless dead sheen,
Grown dim at last, when all else withered there.

Dead, broken, lustreless! It keeps for me
One picture of that immortal land,
For oft as I have held thee in my hand
The dull bronze brightens, and I dream to see

A fair face gazing in thee wondering wise,
And o'er one marble shoulder all the while Strange lips that whisper till her own lips smile,
And all the mirror laughs about her eyes.

It was well thought to set thee there, so she Might smooth the windy ripples of her hair
And knot their tangled waywardness, or ere
She stood before the Queen Persephone.

And still it may be where the dead folk rest,
She holds a shadowy mirror to her eyes,
And looks upon the changelessness, and sighs
And sets the dead land-lilies in her breast.

At Lanuvium.

Spring grew to perfect summer in one day,
And we lay there among the vines, to gaze
Where Circe's isle floats purple, far away
Above the golden haze;

And on our ears there seemed to rise and fall
The hurden of an old-world song we knew,
That sang, "To-day is Neptune's festival,
And we, what shall we do?"

Go down, brown-armed Campagna maid of mine,
And bring again the earthen jar that lies
With three years' dust above the mellow wine;
And, while the swift day dies,

You first shall sing a song of waters blue,
Paphos and Cnidus in the summer seas,
And one who guides her swan-drawn chariot through
The white-shored Cyclades;

And I will take the second turn of song,
Of floating tresses in the foam and surge
Where Nereid maids about the sea-god throng;
And night shall have her dirge,

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION

called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1882, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious. Splendid Timekeeper.

In order to advertise HOUSE AND HOME, and secure subscribers promptly, we have decided to make the following most princely and magnificent offer to each and every reader of this paper: It is the common practice of the gold and silver refiners of England and Switzerland to purchase from the purveyors of their respective countries all the gold and silver watches which have been unredemmed, simply for the sake of the gold and silver cases. The watches are then sold to a celebrated watch firm who have made a specialty of this business. This firm places the works in the hands of skillful workmen, who set to work and put them in as good condition as possible. These watches embrace every variety of movements, some of them being very fine and perfect timekeepers. We have just purchased the entire stock (5,000) of a bankrupt concern of the above described watches less than the first cost of the raw material.

On receipt of $1.50, the subscription price of HOUSE AND HOME, and $1.00 extra to pay for packing, postage, and registering, we will send HOUSE AND HOME for one year (12 numbers) and one of these watches, postpaid, to any address in the United States. Watches mailed the day the order is received. The watches were purchased especially to go with HOUSE AND HOME, and will be furnished only to the subscribers to that publication. In order to introduce it at once we make this unusual offer, which could not be made were it not for the fact that we bought the watches at one-quarter cost of manufacture.

On receipt of 50 cents extra we will send our new and elegant watch chain with a whistle charm and dog call attachment—just the thing for hunters and sporting men.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED.

Remember, any one sending us money for HOUSE AND HOME as the above offer, who can honestly say that they are not satisfied with their bargain, can have their money cheerfully refunded.

A TALK ON SOCIETY.

A very good authority has said: "Whatever is, is right," and though one may fall to arguing as hotly as one may on politics, religion, or social ethics, one is generally forced to conclude that the thing is as near right as it can be made to be under existing circumstances. "Are you going to the hall this evening?" I asked Jack, and was startled at the slangy sound the words had as they innocently left my lips. I almost expected the usual queue of idiotic response; but Jack contented himself with an embellished and most explicit negative; and then he launched forth upon the follies, and foibles, and hollowness of society. He does this upon the occasion of every leading social event throughout the winter. He is also given to eloquence of this sort whenever news comes from the watering places in the summer. Take the year round, and the growing years stacked upon each other, and he may be said to have expounded his views very thoroughly, yet society moves along the even tenor of its way without upheaval. This is disconcerting to Jack, but inevitable. "After all," cries Jack, with clinching emphasis, after I have unsuccessfully reverted to the subject of the ball, "after all, what is society?"

"Society," I remark, quietly but perspicuously, "is the generic name for that class of people who, by reason of an excess of brains or money, or a lucky accident of birth, are upon the top stratum."

"An excess of money, yes; and the accident of birth, yes; but I will not admit to the excess of brains."

"My dear Jack," I say, kindly, "don't be stupid. What you say is merely the echo of the cry of the masses. Nowhere are brains so popular as in society. Wealth, and birth, and all, bow down before them. When the author has written his successful book, when the artist has painted his great picture, when the poet has sung an appealing song, and the sculptor chiseled his masterpiece, the doors of society the most exclusive are thrown wide open to him. He is the lion of the hour."

"So is the rich man, when he has accumulated his millions."

"And so he should be," I retort; "it does not require any great depth of intellect to remain poor, nor is there anything very meritorious in it."

"My dear Betsy," says Jack, somewhat loftily, "you are wandering wide of the subject. I do not object to the elements that compose society. It is its manners and feelings and exactions that I object to."

"What are its manners, Jack?"

"Well, a—cultivated artificiality, a certain veneer," says Jack, not quite readily.

"Ah, Jack," I say, "do not cry out against our veneer. In a state of nature we are unbecomingly. In a state of nature we punch our neighbor's head if we are angry, and do him harm if we simply dislike him, and when we are pleased we manifest it with a stupid, leering grin, a degree more odious than natural anger. The soft, high treble of a cultivated woman is your veneer; the deep-toned billingsgate of the fish-woman is nature. Compare the gentle chasing smile on the lips of a high-bred woman with the wide, stationary grin of the first Digger squaw you see at a railroad station. Compare the cordial yet dignified reserve of a drawing-room greeting with the suspicion and coldness you would find in a strange wigwam."

"Your argument, madam, has little weight, since it flies to such extremes. I don't propose to go prowling around wigwams to find a state of nature. There may be some of it left outside the trammeling thongs of society."

"That's quite an imposing phrase, Jack, but will you tell me just where the trammeling thongs are bound? You know in democratic America we have not two directories, as in England, where he who runs may read who is outside the pale and who is inside."

"At all events, they are not at the edge of good manners," speaks Jack, "and yet, after all, I believe it is not exactly the manners of society that I object to. I think perhaps the hollow and unreal feelings are what make me most aggressive, and loth to be one of the charmed circle."

"What feelings, Jack?"

"Well, Betsy, it gives a man a kind of a stranded, lonely feeling when he is in one of these glittering throngs to know that, if he dropped out of it by violence or disaster, the gap which he left would be filled suddenly and completely, and never a sigh given to him."

"Ab, Jack," I say, "great and good men have been dropping out of their places from time immemorial, and there has been but a ripple to signify their loss, for there is no one whose place can not be taken."

"Thanks for the implied disparity," says Jack, politely; "all the same my melancholy thought is sure to obtrude itself when I am in the glittering halls of pleasure."

"And will you give no one credit for more feeling than shows upon the surface of society, Jack? We are all of one clay, whether we are in society or out of it, and you will always find one in your glittering throng ready to serve you, if need be, as readily in their dress-coats as if they were in blue shirts and huckskin trappings, out on the frontier. These well-dressed, well-bred, pleasure-seeking people are not standing about in grim, unassailable stony-heartedness, saying under their breaths the prayer of Ape-manus: 'Immortal gods, I crave no self; I pray for no man but myself. Grant I may never prove so fond To trust a man on his oath or bond; Or a harlot for her weeping; Or a dog that seems asleeping; Or a keeper with my freedom; Or my friends if I should need 'em. Amen.'"

"Perhaps you are right, Betsy. After all, a man is not going to walk up to you at a brilliant ball, and offer to go on your bond if you should need him, or to secure your nomination for a political office without its costing you a penny."

"Perhaps, after all, Jack, it is not the hollowness that you object to."

"Well, no, Betsy; upon the whole I think it is its exactions that would gall me most."

"What are its exactions, Jack?"

"Oh, party calls, and dress suits, and that sort of thing," spoke Jack, without an instant's hesitation.

"You don't mind the glittering throngs, and the lights, and the flowers, and the music, and the pretty girls, and the handsome matrons, and the pretty veneer, if you were not obliged to induct yourself into a dress coat. I will make up your unsettled mind for you. It is merely the physical discomfort of it that you object to, Jack, for you are a man."

"Then you will acknowledge its discomfort, Betsy? That's the first admission I have had from you."

"Ah, yes, Jack; so much I will allow, for its discomfort is unspeakable. To get into the swim is to be at once infected with a moral malaria, unless, indeed, one be a leader; and even the leaders do not sleep upon thornless rose pillows. There is a never-ending rush and hurry, with never a pause for the wayside for a bit of rest; a ceaseless striving to catch up with something—one never knows quite what. A constant going nowhither; a nervous tension, which makes life a rack after the first flush of youth is past. It is easy to understand the delight of a young girl in her first season, or her second, or her third. Her pulses, bounding with youth and health, keep time naturally with the throbbing music and tripping feet. It is all fairy-land, through whose haze she peeps at the mystic future, and it is all new. But what charm has the scene for the gray-haired matron, surely grown weary with the ceaseless round—and in all the world there is nothing more monotonous than the round of pleasure. It is nothing but a constant meeting of the same people, a constant exchange of the same rapid and commonplace. And yet what is one to do? It would be a little alarming to be approached by some one in the ball-room, and asked if one accepted the Trinity, as Beecher does, without analysis, or a state of future punishment as mental, and according to the laws of moral sensibility."

"Stop to breathe, Betsy. Do you know that you are contemplating society entirely from a ball-room standpoint? There is more in it than that."

"I take the ball-room, Jack, merely because it is the parade-ground of society, and it is after all the be-all and the end-all of it all. Why do people submit unshrinkingly to the inexorable demands of society's routine, before which even physical infirmity will not give way, but to be in at the ball, not to be left out when the magic pasteboard is distributed, to be bid with the dear five hundred? People will drag themselves to a ball who must first stimulate themselves with cordials to keep up. I have seen them there with racking headaches, and toothaches, and what not else. Why were they there, Jack? There could not have been either pleasure or comfort. Now, tell me, what was the underlying motive?"

"My dear girl, does it not occur to you that you have boldly switched over on to my side of the argument? I started in to rail against society, and I propose to have my rail out. If you will kindly take your position on your original pedestal I will resume my argument. The woman with the headache, and the toothache, and the backache, went to the ball to put in an appearance, lest some one would think she was not invited."

"That's what I was about to say, Jack."

"But that is what you have no right to be about to say, madam. Please argue on your own side."

"But I am ready to say something on either side, Jack. I have pleas to put in both ways."

"Then all we have been saying amounts to nothing."

"Absolutely nothing. The world will go on as before, and society will not take in a reef in its sails for us. Shall we go the ball, Jack?"

"Well, a—yes; we might as well go and look on for a while."

"And will you call all the dancing men popinjays, and all the pretty girls snips, and all the pretty married women flirts, and think no one has any sense but that fringe of miserable human beings who hang around the edge of the room waiting for their wives and daughters to go home?"

"Yes, my dear; I shall do all these things. I don't care a tinker's expetive for going, unless I can be miserable with perfect comfort to myself."

"Very well, then, Jack, you shall do as you like; but why, since it is all hollow, and void, and unsatisfying, why should two humble people plunge themselves into such a vortex? Why do we not withdraw from this wicked world, and be happy hermits?"

"My dear, we are neither rich enough nor great enough to afford to be hermits comfortably and respectably."

"And when we are rich and great, Jack, shall we become hermits?"

"When we are rich and great, Betsy, we shall go the way of all weak flesh, and become leaders of society."

Tomato Soup.
Cantaloupe.
Baked Crab.
Broiled Beefsteak, à la Bordelaise. Potato Croquettes.
Baked Bell-peppers. Stewed Tomatoes.
Roast Mallard Ducks. Vegetable Salad.
Chocolate Bavarian Cream and Raspberries.
Apples, Pears, Oranges, Plums, Peaches, Figs, and Grapes.

CHOCOLATE BAVARIAN CREAM.—One pint of cream, one cupful of milk, half a cupful of sugar, one ounce of chocolate, half a package of gelatine. Soak the gelatine in half a cupful of the milk. Whip the cream to a stiff froth. Scrape the chocolate, and add two table-spoonfuls of sugar to it. Put into a small frying-pan with one table-spoonful of hot water. Stir over a hot fire until smooth and glossy. Have the remaining half cupful of milk boiling. Stir the chocolate into it, and add the gelatine; strain into a tin basin and add the sugar. Place the basin in a pan of ice water, and beat the mixture until it begins to thicken; then add the whipped cream, and when well mixed turn into a mould. Serve, when hard, with whipped cream.

Obscure Intimations.

"Home-making"—Accepted. Will shortly appear.

"Demona."—You say that since your story was objected to by the Virtue and Morality Editor you are practicing, with some old Argonauts for samples, how to say the most wicked things imaginable, in the most innocent manner possible. Well, being a woman, Demona, you will probably succeed. That portion of your letter in which you took up the cudgels for Zulano has been submitted to him. Yet it only brought a wan smile to his features, which smile at once flickered and faded away. He says he is a Crushed and Blighted Being.—The name of the book you desire is "Roget's Thesaurus of English Words and Phrases."

"Vanity"—Accepted. Will shortly appear.

"The Two Gensdarmes"—A strong story in portions, but too prolix. Declined; MS. awaits your disposal.

"To L. K."—Declined. Send it to Lulu, young man, send it to Lulu. She'll tell you it's real nice. So it is.

THE DEATH OF AN ACTRESS.

Only a few months ago a beautiful Russian actress dawned on the Paris stage. She was ravishingly beautiful, and soon became the maîtresse en titre of the young and dissipated Duc de Morny. He promised to marry her when he was old enough to force his mother's consent, and she believed his false words. He soon began to weary of her, and went on a trip, ostensibly to Russia, but really to dance attendance on a Rothschild heiress at Homburg, whose hand and fortune he wished to secure. The trusting Russian girl suddenly learned the truth, and on his return sought an interview. She came at midnight to his palace, and was denied admission, in accordance with his previous orders. The Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune thus describes the ensuing tragedy: "She took out her revolver, held it cocked, and resolutely passed on. The servants above did not attempt to repulse her. On his return the duke found her in his smoking-room, quietly reading. He and she chatted glibly into the small hours of the morning. It was 2 o'clock when he said to her, carelessly: 'By the by, I am going back to Russia to shoot with Prince Demidoff. I shall stay there some time.' 'Do I go with you?' 'No; your doing so would be incompatible with your engagements at the Français.' You have a difficult part to learn, and all future success will depend on the manner in which you acquit yourself in it.' He went into his bath-room. When he was in the bath, Mademoiselle Feyghine came behind him, handed him his cigarette, and said: 'I'm going away; good-night,' took his head in both her hands and kissed him on the forehead. In a mirror he saw her take something in the adjoining room out of her pocket. Then he heard a detonation, and saw her (in the glass) fall. He jumped up and rushed to her side. He saw that she was wounded in the chest and vomiting blood. At about five o'clock surgical aid was obtained. As the position of the ball was extremely awkward, it was determined not to try to extract it. When the duke, who remained aloof, heard that his mistress could not be removed, he looked at himself in the glass and said: 'Why, I appear twenty years older than I did to-day. This will never do. I must not let myself be worried any more. Should anything untoward occur, send word to the Duchesse de Sesto [his mother] with whom I am going to stay. If Mademoiselle Feyghine dies here, let her corpse be taken away directly, and let the place be well cleaned. But, above all things, don't let her die without fetching a priest. These instructions given to the butler, the most Christian duke got himself shampooed by a valet to keep out an eczema. When the operation was got through with he muffled up, got into a heated carriage, and went to his mother's. The state of Mademoiselle Feyghine meanwhile became more alarming. In the thirty hours during which her splendid constitution fought with death she expressed intense desire to see the duke, and was grieved when she found he had quitted the house. A Catholic priest came. Mademoiselle Feyghine told him she was not of his flock. She was a Jewess, but had been received as a child into the Greek Church. Just before her death she fell into a comatose state and frothed at the mouth. The fair face was contracted and disfigured by suffering. The moment the last breath was drawn a stretcher was fetched in pursuance to the duke's orders, and the corpse, hidden under a sheet of black glazed calico, was taken away from Monsieur de Morny's residence to the actress's villa. Her body was laid out on a bed painted blue and white, and tapestried with chintz. The hair, which was bright blonde and curly, was unfurnished by the Sisters of Charity who came in to lay out the body and watch by it. They placed the head on a lace-edged pillow and garlanded the coverlet with tea-roses. No trace of beauty remained. The eyes were encircled with dark, bistrous rings. The old deaf cook, not to be at the trouble of watching a bell she could not hear, threw wide open the doors of the house. Any one who was moved by curiosity to enter might do so. When the duke ascertained that Mademoiselle Feyghine's aunt would not bear the cost of the interment, he sent his butler to arrange for the funeral. At first the orders were to go on cheap sides, but they were ultimately rescinded and a second-class hearse and twelve mourning coaches were ordered. Gunzberg, the Russian financier, Jeanne Granière, Perrin of the Français, Got, and some actresses sent magnificent floral crowns and crosses. A crowd went to look at the body in the little villa. Messrs. Cook, the excursion agents, took their 'lot' of stolid, staring cockneys. There were four chairs à banc laden with them. Young ladies of McCall's Mission and of the Salvation Army also slipped in to gaze on the corpse, and to 'improve the occasion.' How oddly Parisian! Christian obsequies were given at the Greek Church, a doctor having certified the madness of la suicidée. De Morny, with crape on his hat, and flanked by the Princes Murat and De Sagan, attended the funeral. The three walked in a line behind Perrin, who, as manager of the Français, was chief mourner. 'We three widowers,' the cynical young duke was heard to say. He wanted to excuse himself in the eyes of the population of Paris by disbonoring the memory of the poor lighted widow of the Russian steppes. It is stated that he will fulfill next week his engagement to go and shoot with Prince Demidoff. All the fast young men of rank envy the duke. They count it a prodigious feather in his cap for the beautiful young actress, in despair at being forsaken by him, to have committed suicide. He has been interviewed by some journalists, and gave an account of the suicide, which does not tally with the statement he made before the police commissary. His latest version proves him a wretched creature, eaten up with vanity and skilled in the art of prevarication. The duke denies (forgetting the depositions of his servants) that Mademoiselle Feyghine forced her way up on Sunday night to his rooms pistol in hand. She was, he says, in the habit of making herself at home with him, as he was with her. This is true; but the rest is not. Monsieur de Morny also told the interviewer that he wanted to give the ill-starred actress an expensive funeral, but was advised not by the Greek ecclesiastics of the Rue Dames. The pope of the Russian church says that he was asked to celebrate the obsequies in the cheapest manner possible, and that Mademoiselle Feyghine must have been insane indeed to have killed herself for a De Morny. She should have been contented with spitting in his face." The young duke is not the sort of man most women admire. He is a pale, tow-haired, emotionless, simpering fop, with little force of character, and less personal magnetism. He has hitherto possessed two claims to distinction—an abhorred name, and a washstand set (basin, pitcher, sponge-bowl, soap-dish, brush-box, perfume-flask, tumbler, and hand-mirror,) all of solid silver. To these he has now added a third and greatest—the death of La Feyghine—on which he plumes himself with ostentatious exultation. He only regrets that the doctors did not extract the fatal bullet, that he might have it mounted on a breast-pin to wear as a trophy of his conquest, and it is said that he has offered a reward to any grave-rover who will secure it for him.

Interior Decorations.

NOW THAT THE DECORATIVE ART is so interesting, the minds of all classes, any suggestions on the subject can not fail to be welcome to those who are building, and who are furnishing up a home. And right here one might justly recommend a call at Blum's rooms, in Thurlow Block, No. 126 Kearny Street. This is the only place that we know of in the city where everything of the decorative description may be found, and where the interior of a home may be made comfortable and beautiful with the least trouble to the purchaser, who simply gives an idea of what he desires, and what price he is willing to pay, and this firm conducts the rest of the affair. Light, size, and character of a room are the main conditions for colors and forms used for its fitting up, and it is very important that the carpet, color and style of walls and ceiling, as well as curtains and principal pieces of furniture, be selected at one time. To make such a selection judiciously requires not only natural taste, but also study and experience, owing to the fact that carpets, damasks, and especially wall-paper, when in combination, assume a very different effect from what one would expect when seen in the piece. Consequently, it requires one who is able to judge of these things, that no error may occur. The choicest selections of tapestries, covering goods, lace curtains, Persian rugs, plushes, Lincrusta-Walton, Chinese and Japanese leathers for covering walls, wood carpeting, stained glass, and in fact all that is required for this work, are furnished by Mr. Blum.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

A Serious Jar.

If Jem is the same as Jim,
And G sounds the same as J,
Then between a Gem, and Jim, and Jem,
What is the difference, pray?

We read about Gem Jars,
Jars made for holding jam,
Then, are these Gem jars Jim jam jars?
(Be calm, my mind, be calm.)

Jim-jams is a modified way
Of saying delirium trem;
And the jars of a fit of the "blues,"
Why, nothing can equal them.

So alter the name at once,
Lest discussion should wax hot,
And call the Gem Jam Jar, instead,
The James Preserving Pot.

But if folks are opposed to this,
As many doubtless are,
Then let the jar have its name in full,
As the Jim Jem Gem Jam Jar.

—Mantua Liar.

Romance and Reality.

Do you remember, dearest Jane,
That bygone day in June
We strolled down your father's lane
One balmy afternoon?
And how we on a rustic seat,
Reclined among the flowers,
And there in conversation sweet
Passed some ecstatic hours,
Until the weary sun had found
His usual western bunk—
And how that blasted bench broke down,
And sprawled us both, kerchunk!

—Homer Magee.

Her Chin.

Tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied her raven ringlets in.
But not alone in the silken snare
Did she catch her lovely floating hair;
For, tying her bonnet under her chin,
She tied a young man's heart within.

—Nora Perry.

An Old Club Squib.

If any man loves comfort, and has little cash to buy it, he Should get into a crowded club—a most select society—
While solitude and muton-cutlets serve infelix uxor, be
May have his club, like Hercules, and revel there in luxury.
Yes, clubs knock taverns on the head. E'en Hatch-ett's can't demolish 'em.
Joy grieves to see their magnitude, and Long's longs to abolish 'em.
The Inns are out. Hotels for single men scarce keep alive on it.
While none but houses that are in a family way thrive on it.
There's first the Athenaeum Club; so wise, there's not a man of it
That has not sense enough for six—in fact, that is the plan of it.
The very waiters answer you with eloquence Socratical.
And always place the knives and forks in order mathematical.
Then opposite the mental club you'll find the regimental one—
A meeting made of men of war, and yet a very gentle one.
If uniform good living please your palate, here's excess of it.
Especially at private dinners, when they make a mess of it.
E'en Isis has a house in town, and Cam abandons her city;
The Master now hangs out at the United University.
In common room she gave a rout (a novel freak to hit upon)
Where Masters gave the Mistresses of Arts no chairs to sit upon.
The Union Club is quite superb; its best apartment daily is
The lounge of lawyers, doctors, merchants, beaux, cum multis aliis.
At half-past six the joint concert for eighteen pence is given you.
Half-pints of port are sent in ketchup bottles to enliven you.
The Travelers are in Pall Mall, and smoke cigars so cozily,
And dream they climb the highest Alps or rove the Plains of Moselai.
The world for them has nothing new, they have explored all parts of it,
And now they are club-footed, and they sit and look at charts of it.
The Orientals, homeward bound, now seek their club much sallow,
And while they eat green fat they find their own fat growing yellower.
Their soup is made more savory, till bile to shadows dwindles 'em,
And neither Moore nor Savory with Seidlitz draughts rekindles 'em.
Then there are clubs where persons Parliamentary preponderate,
And clubs for men upon the turf (I wonder they aren't under it).
Clubs where the winning ways of sharper folks pervert the use of clubs,
Where knaves will make subscribers cry, "Egad, this is the deuce of clubs!"
For country squires the only club in London now is Boodle's, sirs,
The Crookford Club for playful men, the Alfred Club for noodles, sirs;
These are the stages which all men propose to play their parts upon,
For clubs are what the Londoners have clearly set their hearts upon.

—Theodore Hook.

This standard article is compounded with the greatest care.
Its effects are as wonderful and satisfactory as ever.
It restores gray or faded hair to its youthful color.
It removes all eruptions, itching and dandruff, and the scalp by its use becomes white and clean.
By its tonic properties it restores the capillary glands to their normal vigor, preventing baldness, and making the hair grow thick and strong.
As a dressing nothing has been found so effectual or desirable.

Dr. A. A. Hayes, State Assayer of Massachusetts, says of it: "I consider it the best preparation for its intended purposes."

BUCKINGHAM'S DYE,
For the Whiskers.

This elegant preparation may be relied on to change the color of the beard from gray or any other undesirable shade to brown or black, at discretion. It is easily applied, being in one preparation, and quickly and effectually produces a permanent color which will neither rub nor wash off.

THE COMET.

Its Orbit, Periodicity, Identity, Constitution, and Probable End.

The eccentric visitor to our planetary domain which is now flaming in the eastern heavens before daybreak presents features of peculiar interest, not only to astronomers, but also to the public at large. So much conflicting testimony has been produced from so many sources regarding its direction, its rate of motion, and its identity with comets which have previously approached the sun, that it is a matter of difficulty for the public mind to convince itself upon these matters; and it is fain to fall back, in a helpless sort of way, upon the ancient mot, "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" Still, it is hardly fair to astronomers to expect that they shall compute the elements of a comet's orbit with perfect accuracy from a few initial observations, (though theoretically this can be done,) for the reason that their calculations must be based upon the hypothesis that such orbit is parabolic, and corrections must subsequently be made if it be afterward found to be elliptical. In the present instance, the weight of authority favors an elliptical orbit, with a period of between eight and nine years. Still, even this hypothesis must be accepted cum grano salis, since upon its heels comes the question, what has this comet been doing during its back periods, that it has not been seen, and its identity fixed and recognized?

Let us proceed to examine into what is fairly presumable regarding (1) the orbit, (2) the periodicity, (3) the identity, (4) the constitution of this comet, and so arrive at some reasonable conclusion regarding it.

(1) The orbit. Comets move in orbits of three classes, answering in the conic sections of the ellipse, the parabola, and the hyperbola. Those which move in an ellipse return to the centre of attraction at definite intervals, dependent upon the nature of the ellipse; while those which move in parabolic and hyperbolic curves swing off into space, moving ever onward till they fall within the attraction of some other sun.

In order to make the orbit of the present comet easily comprehensible, reference may be had to the accompanying diagrams.

Fig. 1 gives an idea of the inclination of the comet's orbit to the plane of the earth's orbit. The inclination has been variously estimated at from 17° to 26°; but either is sufficient to send the comet far south of the plane of the ecliptic, and therefore preclude the possibility of its coming in contact with the earth. In both diagrams, E represents the position of the earth in its orbit, S the position of the sun, and C C the projection of the comet's orbit upon space, and its relation to the earth's orbit, whether viewed as in Fig. 1, longitudinally, or laterally, as in Fig. 2. The positions of the comet, on both sides of its perihelion, are indicated in the figures, its motion being retrograde—i. e., proceeding from left to right in the diagram; or from southeast to southwest, as compared with the course of the earth in its orbit. There is no longer any doubt that this is the same body discovered by Mr. Cruikshank at Rio Janeiro, on September 11th, when it apparently occupied its left-hand positions in the diagrams. On or about the 17th of September it passed its perihelion point, or point of nearest approach to the sun, when it commenced its return journey into space, occupying at the present time, approximately, the right-hand positions indicated in the diagrams. Its perihelion distance is surprisingly small, there being only one comet—that of 1843—which is recorded as having passed within so close a distance to the sun. This distance is estimated at 800,000 miles from the centre of the solar sphere; or, taking the sun's diameter at 880,000 miles, less than half that distance from its exterior surface.

(2) Its periodicity, or the time it takes to execute one revolution. Here again we are not yet justified in approaching a definite conclusion, though the conditions of observation are now so favorable that such conclusion will certainly be reached before the wanderer recedes beyond astronomical ken. There seems to be no doubt that its orbit is an ellipse of comparatively circumscribed limits, though this very fact renders the absence of previous record most mysterious, and leads us to the very important, and perhaps the most interesting, consideration of all—namely,

(3) The question of identity. When comets are found to move in the same plane and along the same curves, and to approach the sun to nearly the same distance at perihelion, it is very strong evidence of their identity. When their general appearance is similar the testimony is strengthened, and when we consider the vast number of these wandering bodies, and the countless variations of path and inclination in which they are free to move, it seems well nigh impossible that any two which fulfill the same conditions should not be actually identical. The present comet has been found to resemble two other recorded comets—those of 1843 and 1880—so closely in its path and perihelion distance that several eminent astronomers, including Professor Boss, of Albany, and Richard A. Procter, have been forced to the conclusion that these three several comets are identical. But in admitting this fact we are at once brought face to face with some apparently irreconcilable incongruities. From 1843 to 1880 gives us a period of thirty-seven years, which, if the hypothesis is available, falls at one bound to somewhat over two years. There are only two ways of reconciling this inconsistency. The first is to suppose that this comet has made several intermediate returns to our system between the first-mentioned two dates, but that, owing to our position in space at the time of such returns, its advent was unknown to us. This is a plausible solution of the difficulty, as there is no doubt the vast majority of comets do approach the sun and wheel back again into space without ever becoming visible to our gaze. A comet approaching the sun from the opposite quarter of the heavens to that which the earth occupies at the time of such approach would have its perihelion fall between us and the sun, and its hither and backward course would fall within the influence of the solar rays. It is, therefore, only necessary to suppose that each intermediate return was made under such conditions. Still, this would not satisfactorily account for the lack of records of previous appearances, for it is stretching the privileges of accident too much to suppose that all the previous returns of this comet were made in like manner.

The other hypothesis on which this comet could be identified with those of 1880 and 1843, demands that its periodicity be growing shorter in a startling ratio of geometrical progression. Nor is this theory so inconceivable as at first sight it may appear. A body which approaches the sun so closely as does this comet must do so at the expense of its centrifugal energy. At each successive approach the centripetal attraction is intensified, and thus it leaves the neighborhood of its dominator at a more acute angle of orbit. The initial impetus and direction thus given exert an effect over the entire orbit, and this effect is discernible in a shorter and more speedy return on each successive occasion. The orbit of a comet under such conditions would not form an ellipse, but a succession of ever-narrowing eccentric spirals, as shown by the diagram in Fig. 3. Here the dark interior circle S at the right hand represents the sun, P the perihelion point of the comet, and the spiral path of the comet's orbit follows the direction of the arrows.

This hypothesis is perfectly tenable, and is endorsed by some of our most eminent and broad-minded physicists. There is, of course, but one termination to a comet with a path like this; namely, absorption into the body of the sun.

At some point in its progress, at or near perihelion, it will encounter a resistance in the sun's atmosphere, which even its estimated speed of three hundred and seventy miles a second—nearly ten times as great as that of our earth—will be unable to withstand, and it will sink within the atmosphere or luminous envelope of our flaming centre never to appear again. A consideration of what the probable result of such a catastrophe would be brings us to

(4) The constitution of the comet. This is a subject still involved in mystery, and one which has baffled even the investigations of the spectroscope. Most comets consist of two elements or factors, one denser, called the nucleus, the other rarer, known as the train or tail. Encke's comet, a small body of short periodicity, is an exception to this rule, and merely appears as a luminous nebulous ball without either nucleus or tail, but the first mentioned conditions are most commonly fulfilled in kind, though displaying as great eccentricity in form as in orbit. The most generally approved theory of cometary constitution is that these bodies consist of metallic and gaseous elements, identical with those which exist in all known spheres throughout space. There is no reason for doubting—nay, there is every reason for affirming—this theory of cometary composition. The spectroscope gives us the known lines of several elements, and everything points to the conclusion that the nucleus, at all events, of a comet consists of metals and gases in a state of high volatilization. What may be the constitution of the train or tail, admits of much greater latitude for speculation. It is natural to infer that a close approach to the sun at perihelion should make the elements composing the nucleus glow with a fierce incandescence, since it is the nucleus which possesses a certain solidity, else it could not possess the momentum necessary to carry it beyond the attractive influence of the sun. But it is not so clear that the ethereal matter composing the train should be rendered luminous to its utmost extremity while near the sun, and should lose its radiance thereafter, on any recognised hypothesis of dynamics or light. That this matter, whatever be its composition, is extremely tenuous, has been proved by the fact that stars shine through its mass without loss of brilliancy.

The suggestive circumstance, that this train usually points directly away from the sun, in a straight, or nearly straight, line, has led to the inference that the nucleus may act somewhat like the convex lens of a magic lantern, and project the light of the sun upon an ulterior atmosphere surrounding the nucleus. It must be confessed that it is easier to conceive of a semi-transparent convex nucleus obeying a recognised law of optics, and projecting a conical shaft of light upon a receiving ground of atmosphere, than to conceive of a shaft of luminous vapor 10,000,000 miles long, (as the train of the present comet at least is,) sweeping through a nearly semi-circular arc, the dimensions of which arc would give—allowing a speed of 370 miles a second for the nucleus while rounding the sun for the space of four hours—the enormous speed for the extremity of the train of 32,000,000 miles in the same time, or 8,000,000 an hour, 133,333 a minute, or 2,222 miles a second. It is easier, we repeat, to conceive of a shaft of light being projected upon different portions of a nebulous atmosphere surrounding a comet at all points, than to conceive of a tenuous body sweeping round through space at a speed which would disintegrate any forms of matter of which we have any experience. Nor does the fact that comets have been observed with two or more tails, and with tails curved in every possible direction, militate against the soundness of such a theory, for a nucleus whose component parts were of varying degrees of density would refract the solar beams unequally, and give rise to such trains, or projections of light. Varying density of the nebulous envelope itself would produce the same result. This hypothesis will also explain naturally the diminished radiance of the train as it recedes from the solar influence, and its decrease in length, which is not so easily accountable on the grounds of the increasing obliquity which it presents to us, as it is by the rapid condensation of the nebulous medium which reflects the sun's rays; since there is reason to believe that comets only become luminous and incandescent, and their nebulous envelopes correspondingly rare and extended, while close to the sun, while at the aphelion of their orbits they are probably nothing else than spheres of chilled metals and gases traveling sluggishly on through the cheerless blackness of a thousand-fold Arctic night.

It is extremely difficult to divine the result of such a catastrophe as the precipitation of a comet upon the sun, or a collision with our planet. The dynamical effect of such events simply depends upon the density, mass, momentum, and composition of the comet. The momentum of the comet at perihelion is such that, were its nucleus composed of solid material, the shock of precipitation upon the sun would engender such an amount of frictional heat as would be felt to the utmost limits of the solar system. There is every reason, however, to suppose that cometary matter at perihelion is so volatile and rare that it would sink into the vast solar furnace without any appreciable augmentation of our central fire. It has even been scientifically suggested that hundreds of comets fall annually into the sun, and go to repair the waste arising from the constant radiation of heat and light into space. A collision with our planet, however, would depend its results—admitting the gaseous nature of a comet—the nature of the gases which composed it. It is perfectly admissible to conceive of a comet whose principal element was hydrogen, combining with the oxygen of our atmosphere, and precipitating upon our surface such devastating floods of water as it would be impossible for the higher forms of animal and vegetable life to withstand; or of one composed of nitrogen, whose contact would destroy all life from the face of the planet; or, say, carbonic acid, which would have an equivalent effect; or a still larger proportion of hydrogen, which would refuse to combine with our atmosphere in the proportions H_2O , but would doom us to a fiery death. In short, the possibilities for injury are as boundless as the chances for any such casualty are infinitesimal.

The diagram on the preceding page gives a fair idea of the appearance of our celestial visitor during the past few days. Those who have not yet seen the flaming shaft can do so to advantage, in the southeast, on any clear morning for another week, from 2:30 A. M. till daybreak.

ROBERT DUNCAN MILNE.

Just now, says the Figaro, speaking of the Egyptian war, by the best available route the London dailies have to pay seven shillings and twopence per word for their telegrams. The lowest average of the daily papers is one thousand pounds per week; and the Standard account is probably much higher. Newspaper correspondents can not telegraph in "skeleton" from the seat of war. Even in full their messages are likely to be supervised; while a "skeleton" telegraph would stand no chance. In the ordinary way, "A great battle is about to be fought at Jericho. The general has gone to the front with the brigade of guards," would figure across the wires as "great battle—directly—Jericho—general gone with guards," thirteen words being saved out of twenty-two. But in Egypt, except from certain leading centres, this is impossible. Even taking the "skeletons" with the full telegrams, a column of leaded messages in a daily paper averages from two hundred to two hundred and fifty pounds. Had the Egyptian war lasted a year, the total sum spent, altogether extra from ordinary expenses, would have amounted to upward of fifty thousand pounds. War is a benefit to a rising paper which needs to make its name, but it is a dead loss to an established journal. Newspaper managers have refused to send some of the best of their long-winded men, and have preferred to rely for their war telegrams on correspondents who possess not only enterprise but business tact. The leading provincial dailies arrange with the London dailies for "first editions." In Scotland both the Glasgow Herald and the Scotsman send engines along the line between Glasgow and Edinburgh very early in the morning. The Glasgow Herald has the sight of all the Standard telegrams as they come in at night, the Scotsman of all the telegrams in the Daily Telegraph. These are quoted to the various newspapers, but large sums are paid annually for an early view of the telegrams.

"The publication of a new volume of sketches by Mark Twain," says the Liverpool Courier, "reminds us once more of the great vogue which such works have obtained in England during the last few years. We say of a joke: 'How thoroughly American!' but that is because we rarely, if ever, stay to reflect upon the extent to which what is most individual in Yankee humorists has already been anticipated by our own writers. At the same time it will be distinguished from English, as a whole, by the presence of certain qualities in such a ratio as to make Yankee fun distinctly recognizable. And among these qualities is that of irony. Another peculiarity of Yankee humorists is their affectation of extreme simplicity. Yet another peculiarity of American comic writers is in the grimness of many of their jokes. Here, in England, we are careful to draw the line at a certain point, some subjects being altogether exempted from the play of wit and humor. We endeavor to amuse ourselves, as the poet has it, 'within the limits of becoming mirth,' and any writer is severely censured who oversteps what we regard as the boundaries of good taste. In America, apparently, they have no such boundaries. Undoubtedly this distance of American humorists from the centre of good breeding is one reason why they are, on the whole, less acceptable in England than they used to be."

A young student of Jena, who had been reading Darwin's works, found that they raised religious doubts in his mind. They could not fail to do that, provided their philosophy had gained control over him. Accordingly the young man wrote to the late Mr. Darwin, who replied as follows: "Sir, I am very busy, and am an old man in delicate health, and have not time to answer your questions fully, even assuming that they are capable of being answered at all. Science and Christ have nothing to do with each other, except in as far as the habit of scientific investigation makes a man cautious about accepting any proofs. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe that any revelation has ever been made. With regard to a future life, every one must draw his own conclusions from vague and contradictory probabilities. Wishing you well, I remain your obedient servant, Charles Darwin."

"I often cross the street to avoid meeting a man," says Mr. Beecher; "not because I have anything against him, but simply because I do not feel like speaking to him. I suppose all men are this way." Yes, nearly all men are this way, Mr. Beecher, retorts the Arkansas Traveler; and we are glad that you have mentioned the subject, for it gives us a chance to agree with a great man. We sometimes cross the street and climb a fence to avoid meeting a man, not because we have anything against him, but because he has something against us—a bill, Mr. Beecher.

Intermarriage between whites and blacks is a penitentiary offense in Texas, and those who break the law usually take care that there shall be no evidence of any ceremony. But Eldred, a Dallas lawyer, made a public wedding on taking a mulatto for a wife, and in consequence is now in jail awaiting trial.

A sad-eyed man, says Bill Nye, the other night fell out of a bed into the aisle of a Pullman car and skinned his knee. He now claims that he was lame from his berth. When he sees Carbon he will be hung by request.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Yanked to Eternity.

Once, when a section crew came down the mountain on the South Park road from Alpine Tunnel to Buena Vista, a very singular thing occurred. Riding down a mountain on a push-car, descending at the rate of over two hundred feet to the mile, means utter destruction unless the brake is on. The section crew referred to got on at Hancock, with their bronzed and glowing hides as full of arsenic and rain-water as they could possibly hold. Being recklessly drunk they enjoyed the accelerated velocity of the car wonderfully, until the section boss lost the brake off the car, and then there was a slight feeling of anxiety. The car at last acquired a velocity like that of a young and frolicsome bobtailed comet turned loose in space. The boys began to get nervous at last, and asked each other what should be done. There seemed to be absolutely nothing to do but to shoot onward into the golden presently. All at once the section boss thought of something. He was drunk, but the deadly peril of the moment suggested an idea. There was a rope on the car which would do to tie to something heavy and cast off as an anchor. It was decided to tie it to some one of the crew and cast him loose in order to save the lives of those who remained. It was a glorious opportunity. It was a heroic thing to do. George O'Malley, the section boss, said that he was willing that Patsy McBride should snatch the laurels from outrageous fortune and bind them on his brow, but Mr. McBride said he didn't care much for the encomiums of the world. He hadn't lost any encomiums, and didn't want to trade his brains for two dollars' worth of damaged laurels. Every one declined. All seemed willing to go down into history without any ten-line local, and wanted some one else to get the effulgence. Finally, it was decided that a man by the name of Christian Christianson was the man to tie to. He had the asthma anyhow, and life wasn't much of an object to him; so they said that although he declined, he must take the nomination, as he was in the hands of his friends. So they tied the rope around Christian and cast anchor.

* * * * *

The car slowed up, and at last stopped still. The plan had succeeded. Five happy wives greeted their husbands that night as they returned from the jaws of destruction. Christian Christianson did not return. He will never entirely return. He has done so partially, of course, but there are still missing fragments of him, and it looks as though he must have lost his life.—Bill Nye.

A Head on Him.

At the recent veteran's reunion in Chicago was Theo. R. Davis, the artist of Harper's Weekly, who was all through the war. There was one of the Chicago veterans who sometimes took in a little too much wet stuff, and who was a little excitable when full. The visiting, the music, the marching, the cheering, and the excitement of the reunion, had made him feel quite excited, and he wanted to fight his battles over again, but the boys kept him quiet, and finally got him to bed, and soon he slept like a log. The boys were in the room telling stories, when some one called attention to the sleeping comrade, and in a second an idea occurred to Davis, the artist. He went to his room and got his water-color paint, and brushes, and some court-plaster. Pretty soon the artist was at work with his soft camel's-hair brushes. He first painted two black eyes, then he painted a swelling on one cheek, and on the forehead he painted what looked as though a sledge-hammer had smashed in the skull, and left the brain oozing out. Then the artist took some strips of court-plaster, and stuck one across the painted broken nose, another across the mouth, sealing both lips, and the boys stood back to look at the stricken man, and wait for the court-plaster to dry. The boys got a strange veteran from Oshkosh to personate a doctor. After a little the sleeper began to wake up, and one of his friends took a seat by his bedside, took hold of his pulse, and as he opened his eyes the friend said: "Now don't exert yourself, and don't try to talk. The doctor says you will be all right if you remain quiet." The victim of the joke opened his eyes, and was going to ask was the matter, when he found his mouth held together by court-plaster, and his voice sounded like that of a man with a hare-lip asking some one to go to the devil. By this time one of the jokers was having trouble to keep from laughing, so he put a handkerchief to his face, sobbed, and said: "My God, boys, this is horrible!" At this point the Oshkosh villain said, hopefully: "Don't be discouraged, my boy; we will pull you through, if you do not get excited. I have cured worse cases." Then he took a pair of scissors and cut the court plaster that held the lips together, and said: "There, how do you feel now? Don't talk much, but don't you feel relieved?" The victim looked at the doctor, and at the boys who were picturesquely standing around the bed, and said: "Doc, for God's sake, what has happened to me?" The doctor told him to be quiet, and then whispered to him: "You have had the worst fight that a man ever had and lived. A man attacked you on Wells Street, with a view of robbing you, and you defended yourself, but it was a hard struggle. Mr. Drury, please hand me that hand-glass. There, you can see for yourself. There is a contusion of the brain, the eyes are discolored, and I thought your jaw was broken, but as you can talk I guess it is only fractured. Don't talk." The victim took a long look at himself, and the first thing he said was: "Is the other fellow alive?" It was all the boys could do to keep from bursting, but they kept sober faces, and the doctor said the other fellow was alive, but he was the worst used up man he ever sewed up. He said one arm was broken, and one eye gouged out, and his face looked as if a pile-driver had struck him. The victim smiled a satisfied smile as he heard how he had whipped the other fellow, and then the boys asked him if he had any message to send home. He took the mirror and looked at himself again, and then said: "Telegraph for my wife." That was too much, and the boys roared, and the doctor tore off the court plaster from his nose, another fellow brought a wet towel and the paint was washed off, and when he was clean the boys handed him the mirror, and he looked at himself again, and then he saw it was a joke, and he wanted to kill some of them.—Puck's Sun.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Kossuth recently celebrated the eighty-first anniversary of his birth, and the thirty-third of his condemnation to death as a traitor.

Before leaving Russia for Central Asia General Tcherniaeff made a pilgrimage to the tomb of Skobeloff, and placed above it a superb silver image of Saint Michael, the dead chieftain's patron saint. In life the two generals were rivals, but, withal, great admirers of each other.

Among the well known Americans who were recently assembled at Mr. Osgood's dinner party in London, Bret Harte was, according to M. D. Conway, the only one who looked at all English. All the others bore an impress of nationality, making a strong contrast between them and any similar gathering of Englishmen.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley, the African explorer, arrived at Lisbon recently in excellent health. He had, he said, penetrated three hundred miles beyond Vivi, and established fifteen trading stations. At first the natives were hostile, but soon became so friendly that the men at the trading stations now required no weapons to insure their safety.

The great deer forest of Blackmount, in Argyllshire, the property of Lord Breadalband, which extends over ninety thousand acres, has been sublet by the lessee, Lord Dudley, to Mr. A. Gibbs, who rented it during the season of 1880. Mr. Gibbs pays three thousand five hundred pounds for three months; but Lord Dudley's rent is nearly five thousand pounds.

The venerable Marshal Canrobert lives in a small house in Paris, in the Rue de Marignan. It is plainly furnished; for, like most French soldiers, he is careless of luxury, and pays little attention to the fine arts. The marshal, now seventy-three years old, is a man of medium size, with curly gray hair, a snowy beard, a high, intellectual forehead, and keen, brilliant eyes.

Commander Gorringer's rooms in the old University Building, facing Washington Park, are the same as were formerly occupied by Theodore Winthrop. And it is stated that the gentleman who posed for the character of Deuseath in "Cecil Dreame," which was written by Winthrop while living in this picturesquely gloomy old building, is still the occupant of sumptuously furnished apartments under the same roof.

Meissonier reminds one of some of the personifications of rivers in which the ancients delighted to display their artistic skill. His body is small and slight, but surmounted by a massive, patriarchal head, with long waving locks of snowy white hair, and a beard that hangs like a snow-wreath over his chest. His eyes are bright and sparkling, and he has an inspired air, as though listening to sweet music to which all other ears are deaf.

When Cetawayo was photographed in London, it was hard work to impress upon him the necessity of remaining still during the focusing and arranging of accessories; and, in a pleasant way, when his likeness had been taken, he placed the artist in the chair from which he himself had just been released, and waved to the attendants to operate upon him, as some sort of retribution for the duress, short as it was, that he had suffered in his own person.

Sir Bernard Burke, the well-known Irish herald, has frequently been asked, "What is the surname of the children of Queen Victoria?" and he says: "I feel persuaded that the royal house of Saxe-Coburg has no surname. When the adoption of surnames became general, the ancestors of that illustrious race were kings, and needed no other designation than the Christian name added to the royal title." The Plantagenets and the Tudors were in quite other case, and the sobriquet of the former originated their surname.

The latest bit of legal sensational news is that Sergeant Ballantine has been asked to go out to Egypt to defend Arabi Pasha. As the learned sergeant is now in his sixty-eighth year, he would certainly exhibit great enterprise if he went to the land of the Sphinx to plead on behalf of the Egyptian leader. It will be remembered that some years ago this distinguished English barrister went out to India to defend the Guicowar of Baroda, and received on that occasion an enormous fee for his services, a large portion of which he dropped at Monaco on his way home.

"In the café on the Place Morny," writes a Deauville, France, correspondent, "Henri Rochefort sits surrounded by his friends. He is full of anecdote. That verve and ready wit which made a name for him under the empire have not been dulled, and he has the same vein of sarcasm as when Villemessant, of the Figaro, took the young clerk from the Hôtel de Ville on his staff, and made the Tuileries laugh at the jokes cracked at the expense of the Imperial Court. Now and then he pulls out a stump of pencil and a notebook to jot down some passing thought, some happy idea, or some nickname which will cling to his political opponent, as the sobriquet of 'serpent à lunettes' did to M. Thiers."

The uncle of Sir Garnet Wolseley's great-grandfather was the Colonel Wolseley who, in the old "No Popery" days, gained the battle of Newtownbutler, and caused the Mayor of Scarborough to be well tossed in a blanket in the marketplace for making a speech in favor of King James. When Sir Garnet Wolseley was young he was a good deal of a fop in Dublin, as was the Duke of Wellington in his youth, and he used to drive a drag with his brothers daily into Dyer's repository, now the family seat, near Dublin. He then wore long curls. Time has worked much change. He is now spare, lantern-jawed, with short gray hair, and a blonde moustache. In the field he wears a yellow sun-helmet, wound about with a handkerchief of check; his red coat is open at the chest, and spotted with many stains of grease; he has a variegated cravat, a woolen shirt of a loud pattern, gray-checked trousers, yellow riding-boots and spurs, an opera-glass, with a yellow case and strap, and yellow revolver-belt with cartridge-case; yellow gauntlets, a violet pocket-handkerchief stuck in his red coat, a gigantic pair of dark-blue spectacles, and in his hand he flourishes a fan to keep off the flies.

THOUGHTS FROM THACKERAY.

Those who are gone, you have. Those who departed loving you, love you still; and you love them always. They are not really gone, those dear hearts and true; they are only gone into the next room; and you will presently get up and follow them, and yonder door will close upon you, and you will be no more seen.—Roundabout Papers.

Proud of his newly acquired knowledge of the art of exhausting the contents of an egg, the well known little boy of the apologue rushed to impart his knowledge to his grandmother, who had been for many years familiar with the process which the child had just discovered. Which of us has not met with some such instructors? I know men who are ready to step forward and teach Taglioni how to dance, Tom Sayers how to box, or the Chevalier Bayard how to be a gentleman. We most of us know such men, and undergo, from time to time, the ineffable benefit of their patronage.—Philip.

Ah! fiends and tortures! a gentleman may cease to love, but does he like a woman to cease to love him? People carry on ever so long for fear of that declaration that all is over. No confession is more dismal to make. The sun of love has set. We sit in the dark—I mean you, dear madam, and Corydon, or I and Amaryllis—uncomfortably, with nothing more to say to one another; with the night-dew falling, and risk of catching cold, drearily contemplating the fading west, with “the cold remains of lustre gone, of fire long passed away.” Sink, fire of love! Rise, gentle moon, and mists of chilly evening. And, my good Madam Amaryllis, let us go home to some tea and a fire.—Philip.

Now, say people quarrel and make it up; or don't make it up, but wear a smirking face to society, and call each other “my dear” and “my love,” and smooth over their countenances before John, who enters with the coals as they are barking and hitting, or announces the dinner as they are tearing each other's eyes out? Suppose a woman is ever so miserable, and yet smiles, and doesn't show her grief? “Quite right,” say her prudent friends, and her husband's relations above all. “My dear, you have too much propriety to exhibit your grief before the world, or, above all, before the darling children.” So to lie is your duty—to lie to your friends, to yourself if you can, to your children.—Newcomes.

Gentlemen are rarer personages than some of us think for. Which of us can point out many such in his circle—men whose aims are generous, whose truth is constant, and not only constant in its kind but elevated in its degree; whose want of meanness makes them simple; who can look the world honestly in the face, with an equal, manly sympathy for the great and the small? We all know a hundred whose coats are very well made, and a score who have excellent manners, and one or two happy beings who are what they call in the inner circle, and have shot into the very centre and hull's-eye of the fashion; but of gentlemen, how many? Let us take a little scrap of paper, and each make out his list.—Vanity Fair.

When a man is in love with one woman in a family, it is astonishing how fond he becomes of every person connected with it. He ingratiates himself with the maids; he is bland with the butler; he interests himself about the footman; he runs on errands for the daughters; he gives advice and lends money to the young son at college; he pats little dogs which he would kick otherwise; he smiles at old stories which would make him break out in yawns were they uttered by anyone but papa; he drinks sweet port wine, for which he would curse the steward and the whole committee of a club; he hears even with the cantankerous old maiden aunt; he beats time when darling little Fanny performs her piece on the piano; and smiles when wicked, lively little Bohhy upsets the coffee over his shirt.—Virginians.

Love in some passionate and romantic dispositions never regards consequences or measures accommodation. Who has not experienced that frame of mind; what thrifty wife has not seen and lamented her husband in that condition, when, with rather a heightened color and a deuce-may-care smile on his face, he comes home and announces that he has asked twenty people to dinner next Saturday? He doesn't know whom exactly; and he does know the dining-room will only hold sixteen. Never mind! Two of the prettiest girls can sit upon young gentlemen's knees; others won't come; there's sure to be plenty! In the intoxication of love people venture upon this dangerous sort of housekeeping; they don't calculate the resources of their dining-table, or those inevitable butchers' and fishmongers' bills which will be brought to the ghastly housekeeper at the beginning of the month.—Virginians.

Has it ever happened to you to leave a card at that house—that house which was once THE house—almost your own; where you were ever welcome; where the kindest hand was ready to grasp yours, the brightest eye to greet you? And now your friendship has dwindled away to a little bit of astetohard, shed once a year, and poor, dear Mrs. Jones (it is with J. you have quarreled) still calls on the ladies of our family, and slips her husband's ticket upon the hall table. Oh, life and time, that it should have come to this! Oh, rascals powers! Do you recall the time when Arabella Thompson was Arabella Briggs? You call and talk fadaises to her (at first she is rather nervous, and has the children about her); you talk rain and fine weather—the last novel—the ext party. Thompson in the city? Yes, Mr. Thompson is in the city. He's pretty well, thank you. Ah! daggers, ope, and poisons, has it come to this? You are talking about the weather, and another man's health, and another man's children, of which she is mother, to her? Time was the weather was all a burning sunshine, in which you and she asked; or if clouds gathered, and a storm fell, such a glorious rainbow haloed round you, such delicious tears all and refreshed you, that the storm was more ravishing than the calm. And now another man's children are sitting on her knee—their mother's knee—and once a year Mr. and Mrs. John Thompson request the honor of Mr. Brown's company at dinner; and once a year you read in the Times. In Nursery Street, the wife of J. Thompson, Esq., of a m. To come to the once-beloved one's door, and find the docket tied up with a white kid glove, is humiliating—say that you will, it is humiliating.—Philip.

A ROMISH RUSE.

We print the following translations from the archives now at Washington of some letters from a Roman Catholic priest to the government of Mexico, in the year 1845, for two purposes: first, that we may show what a narrow escape California had from becoming a second Ireland; and, second, to again illustrate that Romish priests do meddle themselves with politics of all countries where they may be located. This correspondence of the Reverend Father Eugenio MacNamara was brought out in a congressional investigation, of which General Lewis Cass, of Michigan, was chairman. The letters are in Spanish. Translated they read as follows:

I, Eugenio MacNamara, Catholic priest and apostolic missionary, take the liberty of transmitting to your excellency some reflections on a subject which at this time attracts much public attention. I allude to the expectations and actual condition of Upper California. It does not require the gift of prophecy to foresee that, within a little time, this fertile country will cease to be an integral part of this Republic, unless some prompt and efficacious measures be adopted to restrain foreign rapacity. The immediate question that presents itself is, What are the speediest and most secure means of avoiding such a calamity? The unanimous voice of the country responds, Colonization. The second question is, Where shall we find all the colonists who possess all the necessary qualities for an object so desirable? Certainly not in Mexico, and as little in all its dependencies, which are so thinly peopled. We have then naturally to recur to Europe, which abounds with an excess of population. What people of this ancient continent is best calculated for the end of colonization, best adapted to the religion, character, and temperament of the inhabitants of Mexico? Emphatically I answer the Irish; they are devout Catholics, moral, industrious, sober, and brave. For this reason I propose, with the aid and approbation of your excellency to carry forward this project, to place in Upper California a colony of Irish Catholics. I have a triple object in making this proposition. I wish in the first place to advance the cause of Catholicism. In the second, to contribute to the happiness of my countrymen. Thirdly, I desire to put an obstacle in the way of further usurpations on the part of an irreligious and anti-Catholic nation. I therefore propose to your excellency that there be conceded to me an extent of territory on the coast of Upper California, for the purposes I have indicated. I would prefer, with the permission of your excellency, to place the first colony on the Bay of San Francisco. Your excellency will agree with me that this will be a proper step, when it is remembered that the Americans have possession of Bodega, a port abandoned by the Russians, situated a little to the north of San Francisco. I should bring for the beginning one thousand families; afterward, should it appear well to your excellency, I would establish a second colony near Monterey, and a third at Santa Barbara. By these means the entire coast (by which most danger is to be expected) would be completely secured against invasions and pillages of foreigners. For each family that I bring I will require the land that composes one sitio de ganado mayor (a square league, containing four thousand four hundred and twenty-eight acres) to be given free of all cost; likewise that the children of the colonists, when they marry, shall receive a half sitio as a national gift. There are other points of less importance, which I do not touch upon now, as they can be discussed to more advantage hereafter.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your excellency's most obedient servant, EUGENIO MACNAMARA.

To the Most Excellent Señor President of the Republic of Mexico.

A second letter, also without date, contains the following: Your excellency will excuse me that I take the liberty to further demonstrate that no time ought to be lost in this important affair, if it is to be realized, since your excellency knows well enough that we are surrounded by an artful and base enemy, who loses no means, however low, to possess himself of the best territory of the country, and who abhors to the death its race and its religion. If the means I propose be not speedily adopted, your excellency may be assured that, before another year, the Californias will form a part of the American nation. Their Catholic institutions will become a prey of the Methodist wolves, and the whole country will be inundated with the cruel invaders. While I propose the means of repelling them, my propositions ought to be the more admissible as I have no personal interest in the affair, save the progress of the holy religion of God, and the happiness of my countrymen. As for the fidelity and adhesion of these to the Mexican Government I answer with my life; and according as may be drawn a sufficient number of colonists, at least ten thousand men, I am of opinion, and may assure with certainty, that this number will be sufficient to repel, at the same time, the secret intrigues and the open attacks of the American usurpers. EUGENIO MACNAMARA, Apos. Miss.

To the Most Excellent Señor President of the Republic of Mexico.

In a third letter, dated July 1, 1846, Father MacNamara wrote to the head of the department of California at Santa Barbara, announcing that he had obtained the above-named grant, and that he was prepared to contract for the immigration of two thousand Catholic Irish families, industrious and sober, numbering in all about ten thousand souls. He solicited the said governor of the department to adjudicate to him “in ownership the land selected between the river San Joaquin from its source to its mouth and the Sierra Nevada; the limits between the river Cosumne on the north, and on the south the extremity of the Tulares in the neighborhood of San Gabriel.” Thereupon follows a document issued by the governor, conceding the lands for the colonization of Irish families, “with the reservation of the approval of the supreme national government.” In connection with the same testimony, is a letter from Archibald H. Gillespie, Captain U. S. Marine Corps, dated Washington, February 4, 1848, in which he gives his own personal experiences as a special messenger of our Government to Colonel Fremont, in the spring and summer of 1846.

In the course of his letter he says:

About June 30th I learned that the Junta which was to have assembled at Santa Barbara on the 15th of June, and which had been planned and arranged by and through the agency of Mr. Forbes, the British vice-consul, and an Irish Catholic priest of the name of MacNamara, had been prevented from assembling in consequence of the rising of the settlers under Colonel Fremont. This Junta was proposed for the purpose of asking the protection of England, and giving an immense tract of land in the valley of the San Joaquin for the settlement of ten thousand Irishmen, to be brought to California under the protection of MacNamara.

All this intrigue was broken up by the timely and prompt operations of the settlers under Colonel Fremont. The flag of the United States was hoisted at Sutter's Fort at sunrise, July 11th. Fortunately that flag has never been hauled down. We congratulate ourselves upon an escape from what might have been the condition of this country if this clerical conspiracy against the “base and artful” American had succeeded, and the country had not been invaded by the “cruel Methodist wolves.” The “holy religion of God” would have warred upon all other religions. Freedom of worship and freedom of conscience would not have been permitted, and California would not to-day have been under the flag of the republic of the United States. There would to-day have been a union of church with state; the church directing the administration of civil justice, education subordinate to priestly teachings, and California's population would be an ignorant, bigoted, unprogressive, priest-ridden community.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Two men paused before the serpent-house in a zoölogical garden and contemplated the hoar-constrictor. “I say,” said the first man, “what's that insect tied himself up in a knot for like that?” “Oh,” replied his companion, in a superior manner, “I suppose he wanted to remind himself of something when he woke up.”

Hearing a noise at night, Jones descends with a lighted candle, and discovers a hurglar escaping with a full sack. “Hallo!” he cries; “come back, you!” “Eh, wbat?” returns the hurglar. “Ah yes, the silver candlestick. Permit me.” He takes it from the hand of the astonished Jones, and puts it in his bag. “Ten thousand thanks. Have I forgotten anything else?”

An English north country paper frowns upon the known ambition of the mayor of its town to be made a knight for his distinguished services in receiving royalty, and narrates for the benefit of the aspirant this anecdote: When Mr. Adam Black, the Edinburgh publisher, was sounded on the subject of receiving knighthood, he said: “Nae, nae; it wadna dee. You see,” he added, “if a hoy cam into ma shop and said ‘a ha’peth o’ slate-pencils, Sir Adam,’ it wadna sound weel.”

Commodore Vanderbilt had contracted so inveterate a habit of keeping himself and everybody else to the precise matter in hand, that once, asking a friend he had invited to dinner if he would take venison, and receiving what he deemed an evasive reply, “Thank you, I am going to take hoiled chicken,” the commodore sharply retorted: “That, sir, is no answer to my question; I ask you again if you will take venison, and I will trouble you to say ‘yes’ or ‘no’ without prevarication.”

A letter, written by Prosper Mérimée during his Eastern travels in 1841, has just been unearthed, which contains a compliment by a Turkish pasha to the press. “Great invention, newspaper!” said the pasha to his visitor; “they afford an excellent way to pass the time.” “But you Orientals have the pipe, which is infinitely superior.” “I don't know about that,” answered the pasha. “You see, when you smoke, sometimes it inspires you with gloomy thoughts, whereas, when you read the French newspapers, you never find anything to think about at all!”

A postoffice agent was inspecting the office at Iron Rod, Montana, which consisted of a saloon, a postoffice room, and a faro bank. A hard-looking case emptied the mail bag on the floor, the crowd overhauling the letters, registered and all, selecting what they wanted, and the rest were dumped into a candle-box. “Where's the postmaster?” asked the agent of the bar-tender. “Out mining.” “Where is the assistant-postmaster?” “Gone to Hell's Cañon; and, by thunder, Bill Jones has got to run this office next week—it's his turn.” The government official demanded the keys of the office. The bar-tender coolly took the candle-box from the bar, placed it on the floor, and gave it a kick, sending it out of the door, saying: “There's your postoffice; and now git.” The agent says: “Knowing the custom of the country, I lost no time in following this advice, and got.” This is why the postoffice at Iron Rod was discontinued.

Not many years ago there lived in New Haven a rough, honest sea-captain, who, after accumulating a handsome fortune on the water, retired to dry land to enjoy his money, and the reputation of an eccentric, care-for-nothing old fellow. He was a strong churchman; and it one day fell to his lot to drive the clergyman of his parish to the graveyard, in a funeral procession. As the cortege was wending its way in solemn slowness to the place of sepulture, the captain and parson in the van, the captain espied a clam-peddler, and, stopping his horse, he sung out in a gruff voice: “Jim, what do you ask for clams?” “Twenty-five cents a peck,” says Jim. “Well,” said the captain, “take a peck down to my house.” “But, cap'n, I rather think it will be worth three shillings to carry them so far.” “Go to h—ll!” exclaimed the captain; “what do you mean by stopping a funeral? Get up, Bill!” and the procession moved on.

“Sinc” Barnes tells a racy story of his experience at Santa Monica, in the Carson Appeal: “I was down in that section a few months ago,” said “Sinc,” “and pretty nearly hustled when I fell in with Jones, the senator, and told him my condition. He fell right up abreast of the situation and told me he could give me a job. ‘I want a lot of men to keep in the water all day to show visitors how delightful surf-bathing is. You see these people from the East have acquired a sort of prejudice against the Pacific Ocean, and I want to counteract the feeling. I want you to boss eight men and keep 'em tumbling around in the billows, the sport of the laughing sea, in striped costumes—men who can run out on the beach every ten minutes and tell how warm the water is.’ Well, I caught the idea, and agreed to furnish the crowd for twenty dollars a day, and we closed the bargain. I hired eight men at one dollar a head to bathe there all the afternoon, and I pocketed the balance. On the second day they struck for two dollars more, because the water was so cold. I tried to explain about the trade winds and harvest-moon tide, but they wanted the money all the same. Then three quit, but Jones didn't miss 'em, and I kept even financially. Then two froze to death right on the beach, and I had to get a coroner's jury to find a verdict from over-heating in the water. The balance of the gang left, and I had to go it alone. I got so injured to the cold that I could rush out of the water, skip up to the English tourists and tell 'em it was just lovely, and keep my teeth still all the while. I got my twenty dollars every night, and spent it all for warm drinks. Then I quit, as my condition was giving way. When I left he had eight Irishmen the railroad doing the bathing for the hotel, and they were going all the while back of some rocks, where they could warm up between swims. That is a great cliff down there.”

THE NAHL COLLECTION.

It is within the memory and actual experience of many among us to picture to ourselves the wide-spread undulations of shifting sands, and scrubby vegetation, and forlorn, desert-like appearance of the spot whereon to day our city stands. Powerful incentives brought rapid changes; prosperity made comfort a necessity; commerce wielded its powerful influence, and swift facilities for intercourse grew up all about us, and spread their tendrils into the remotest corners; huts, and tents, and cabins were the seeds from which grew the solid buildings of the merchants, and the palaces of our upper tandom, and the multitude of handsome houses which dot our hills. The crudities of interior embellishments were quickly supplanted by tasteful arrangements, and many an art treasure has found a home in San Francisco. And now we are to have an exhibition of "old masters." Raphael, and Giorgione, and Rubens, and Correggio, and Coppel, and Guido Reni, and Titian, and Rembrandt, and Van de Velde, and Van Dyck, and Ribera will be there, and the breath of their imagination will thrill our souls, and three centuries of endeavor to present the beautiful in its most attractive form will adorn the walls of the Art Association—an institution which has not yet attained to the age of twelve years. This is indeed precocious. Are there, then, already men and women among us who can love the ineffable sweetness half hidden by the grime and must of centuries, and who will gaze in rapt attention upon the gentle spirit of devotion that limned inspired humanity so that it became deified? Have we artists and art-lovers among us who will feed greedily upon every line of the dead masters, and drink the delicious draught of inspiration from the ever-bubbling fountain of beauty? It is not impossible. The growth of the mind has kept step with the development of coarser matter, and California has reared and raised many a name whose sound insures respect in other climes.

So, then, let us hail this strange visitor as an honored guest, and improve the rare opportunity of paying homage at the shrine of genius while that shrine is brought to our door. The quality of the collection itself is of that nature that it appeals to the perception of the trained artist rather than to the general taste; yet it contains enough of real beauty, regardless of satisfying the seeker after mannerisms, and schools, and handling, and treatment, to enlist the sympathies and engross the interest of any one outside the pale of the arts. None can look upon the "Danse d'Amours," by Raphael, without admiring the simple correctness of outline, the graceful pose, the life-like action and soulful expressions of the faces of that bevy of romping children. The picture is remarkably well preserved and proves the esteem in which it has been held by the different owners through whose hands it has passed since the year 1520, when the master-hand, stilled in death, left that work to be completed by one of Raphael's best pupils, Parmigianino. Though this circumstance may impair the money value of that work, the intrinsic worth of that charming conception must always gain for it the rank of a chef d'œuvre. Then we have a Donato Creti of the latter part of the seventeenth century, full of color and excellent in design—a feast for the eye; a Coppel representing that prince of good fellows, Democritus; a jovial face, which puts one in better humor with all the world; a truly artistic execution of a very happy motive, which affects one like a humorous chapter from Thackeray. The art-student will find a source of delight in an original etching of the same subject by Coppel himself. An allegorical picture, supposed to be a replica of the great painting by Rubens, now in the Pinakothek, at Munich, representing Minerva protecting Peace and Plenty from approaching War, is a delightful display of color and texture, and is sure to elicit the admiration of every beholder.

Nos. 13 and 14, two little gems from the collection of the Duc d'Orléans, are by Oudry, a painstaking artist, whose reputation for that class of work was almost unsurpassed in the beginning of the eighteenth century, represent two sets of dogs, whose action is an excellent satire upon covetous aggression. The portraits of the founder of this collection and his spouse are not merely interesting because they familiarize the features of an artist of renown and an enthusiastic collector of art-treasures, but are both remarkably good proofs of Tischbein's best quality as a portrait painter. The more recent additions to the collection by the different members of the Nahl family are equally interesting; aside from the faithful copies from originals by the great masters, of which there are, notably, the "Venus and Cupid," after Correggio, by J. W. Nahl; the "Florentine Madonna," after Raphael; "Eneas and Dido," after Guérin; "The Massacre of the Mamelukes," after Horace Vernet, by the same artist—there are a number of highly original works by John Augustus Nahl Jr., which will not fail to meet with the warm appreciation of artists and laymen alike. "Hector's Parting from Andromache," of which there is also a sepia-drawing by the same artist, is a thoroughly classic study. The "Origin of the Red Rose" is exquisite in its flesh-tints; and, without particularizing any further the many good works which will be of general interest, it can be truly said that the collection, as a whole, will prove both enjoyable and profitable to the general public. Now, as to its value to the art-student. Those who feel an irrepressible desire to express their æsthetic ideas in poetic form, those who strive by touches of nature to sound the chord of human sympathy, that faithful, brave little band of true artists who aspire to be worthy of being counted as fellows with them, will hail the advent of this collection as the greedy would a treasure-trove.

The pleasure of scanning the original, impulsive sketches, the first outlines of beautiful ideas, the crude embryos of masterly conceptions by the hands of Raphael or Murillo, Correggio or Andrea del Sarto, by such great ones as Leonardo da Vinci and Parmigianino, by Poussin and Nicolas Berghen, all of whom are there represented, is only surpassed by gazing upon the finished work by the same master-hands. And in view of the rare opportunity granted only to the favored few to ramble amid the wealth of European galleries, this opportunity to see so much that is good in art, a collection which is really excellent in parts, will no doubt meet with an enthusiastic appreciation by artists and art-students. Particularly noteworthy in that respect is the "Dying Cato," by Ribera—a subject so graphically represented that it would chill the layman's desire for acquisition, but a work of art which is simply priceless as such; the drawing, the color, and the handling are equally excellent and worthy of the most attentive study. Some still-life by Cornelius Lilienbert, although considerably darkened by age, will amply repay a careful scrutiny.

Landscapes, a branch of art wherein the modern school surpasses the old masters, by a few examples of the Dutch and Flemish schools in this collection exemplify the treatment and conception of some of the masters of the Dutch and Flemish schools, and will prove highly interesting to the student. A sketch in oil, by Rubens, of a Magdalen, is worthy of the closest attention, and numerous other works, which will probably escape the cursory glance of the ordinary sight-seer, will be thoroughly enjoyable to the artist or art-lover. The collection contains, besides, a wealth of original copperplate prints too numerous and too uniformly excellent to be especially enumerated, which will prove a source of delight to the appreciative observer.

Mr. H. W. Arthur Nahl, to whom that collection has come as an heirloom through four generations of ancestors, a number of whom have earned a well-deserved reputation as artists, is to be highly commended for the laudable spirit which actuates the exhibit in this city, which he regards as his home and the place of all places which recognized his talents. The Art Association, under whose auspices, and for the benefit of which, this exhibition has been arranged, deserves the encouragement of our citizens, and it is to be hoped that this important step in the path of its progress may meet with splendid success. M. TAUBLES.

SOCIETY.

Banquet to General Barrios.

On Tuesday evening last, a dinner was given at the Union Club, by Mr. Frederick L. Barreda, in honor of His Excellency, President Barrios, of the Republic of Guatemala. About forty gentlemen sat down to the table, which was very artistically decorated with flowers and flags. The menu is worthy of being given in extenso:

Huitres de l'Est. Potages—Reine; Consommé à la Desgignac. Hors d'Œuvres—Salade de crevettes; Anchois; Olives. Poissons—Truite saumonée, à la Hollandaise; Maquereau, à la maître d'hôtel. Relevé—Filet de bœuf, à l'Andalouse. Entrées—Suprême de volaille, à la Richelieu; Grouse à la Cussy. Pices Froides—Faité de gibier, à l'Alsacienne. Légumes—Artichauts, à l'Italienne; Petits pois, à la Française; Haricots verts. Punch à la Crêlée. Rôti—Selle de mouton; Bécassine Anglaise. Salades. Entremets—Nesselrode pudding; Pyramide de Nougat. Dessert. Café. Liqueurs.

It was remarked that but very few of the number of army officers present appeared in uniform. Such an oversight, upon an occasion intended to honor a high official, the president of a republic whose functions are both civil and military, must have been regretted by the host, as well as observed by his distinguished guest. The peculiar squeamishness too frequently exhibited in this particular, ought not to blind our professional military gentlemen to the fact that there are social occasions when a uniform is not only expected, but eminently in order, and its absence an impropriety almost as absurd as would be their appearance disguised as Arabi Pasha, Dick Deadeye, or as the Apollo Belvedere. Among those who assisted were the following: Ex-Governor Leland Stanford, Major-General McDowell, Mr. Peter Donahue, General Kautz, Mr. C. W. Howard, General Caxton, Mr. H. B. Williams, Consul Booker, Colonel Sullivan, Mr. Henry Barroilhet, Mr. L. P. Parrott, Major Darling, Mr. Evan P. Coleman, General Kelton, Mr. Wm. Babcock, Captain Humphrey, Mr. F. F. Barreda, Captain Payson, Commodore Phelps, F. W. Macondray, Major Rathbone, and Doctor George Chismore.

Reception to General Schofield.

The complimentary reception and entertainments given to Major-General McDowell, the late commander of the Military Division of the Pacific, upon his retirement, are now being rapidly followed by others in honor of his successor, Major-General Schofield. The first was a delightful reception given by General and Mrs. Kelton on Thursday afternoon, at their residence at the Presidio, when those in attendance were presented to General and Mrs. Schofield, and Mr. and Miss Schofield. As it was intended to be rather a military family gathering, invitations were limited to the sons and daughters of Mars; they were present in full force. In such competent hands, with the tasteful and elegant toilettes of the ladies—all of whom were more than usually charming—the bright uniforms, the handsome display of floral decorations, and the urbanity of the host and hostess, it is needless to add that the affair was extremely brilliant, and thoroughly enjoyed by all who participated.

The society gentlemen of San Francisco, embodying many of its most prominent citizens, had arranged, in honor of Major-General McDowell, upon his retiring from the command of the Military Department of the Pacific, and his successor, Major-General Schofield, a grand entertainment to be given at the Palace Hotel. The unexpected departure of General McDowell for the East defeated the affair, and it is indefinitely postponed. This is to be regretted, as it would have been exceptionally elegant, and because there are so many civilians who were anxious to reciprocate for the many social favors they have received at the hands of General and Mrs. McDowell. General McDowell's retirement is a source of regret to all his California friends, not only because of his generous hospitalities to its citizens, but because of his entertainments and attentions so often extended to such distinguished persons as visited us from the Eastern States and from foreign countries—persons who, from their official positions, were entitled to something more than the hospitable recognition of private individuals. General McDowell's wealth, intelligence, and official position gave him the opportunity and ability to do gracefully and well that which would have been embarrassing to any of our occupied and busy citizens. We are glad to learn that the McDowells will permanently remain residents of California.

Truxton Beale visits his parents in Washington for two months, leaving early in the week. Mr. and Mrs. Julius Reis entertain their friends socially on Thursday evening at their new residence, corner of Gough and Sacramento Streets. It is to be a very elegant affair.

Coffo, U. S. N., went to Monterey on Monday last, to remain a few days. Mr. and Mrs. John S. Barrett, of Oakland, are spending a few days at Monterey. W. E. Brown left for New York on Wednesday last, to remain away a month or six weeks. Mrs. Captain Brown and daughter, of Alameda, are visiting in Los Angeles. Mr. Ernest A. Leigh and Miss Ella M. Lees, daughter of Captain Lees, will be married on Thursday evening next, the 26th instant, at nine o'clock, at the residence of the bride's parents, No. 1022 Pine Street. Some time in November is fixed for the wedding of Lieutenant Warring, of the navy, and Miss Lutie Cole, second daughter of Senator and Mrs. Cole, of Los Angeles County. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Meinecke, after a long stay at Monterey, have returned. The Misses L. and M. O'Connor have also returned from Monterey. Mrs. J. H. Carroll, of Sacramento, who has lately been visiting friends at Menlo Park, returned home on Monday last. Governor I. M. Kapena, Hawaiian envoy to Japan, leaves to-day on the City of Peking. On last Monday evening, Consul Severance entertained him at dinner, at his Octavia Street residence, together with Hon. M. Kaulukou, the Japanese Consul Yanagiya and wife, J. Mott Smith and wife, and Miss Aldrich. On Tuesday evening, Mr. W. F. Babcock gave a dinner to Governor Kapena, when there were present, among others, Hon. Wm. Alvord, ex-Governor Low, Colonel Claus Spreckels, A. B. Forbes, J. Mott Smith, and Consul Severance. General Schofield, who arrived here on Saturday last, with his family, was called on by General McDowell, who formally transferred his command to the former the following day. General Schofield has taken up his residence at Black Point, and General McDowell has moved into his new residence, on Van Ness Avenue. The Wachusett arrived on Wednesday last. S. W. Holliday returned from the East on Thursday last.

HOME-MAKING ON THE COAST.

Advice on the Application of Decorative Art to California Houses.

"What will you do in California where there are no bric-à-brac auctions, or old furniture to pick up?—and art furnishing is a pleasure for rich folks," asked a friend of sympathetic tastes the day my face was set for the Pacific. In truth, a pang shot through me at the thought of old houses on the South Shore and Quincyward not yet ransacked for colonial furniture, and of two or three old ladies whose demise, shortly expected, would leave stores of rich old India porcelain and creamy Spode-ware to fall into the hands of collectors. Were there to be no more idle holidays spent in the dim, dusty chaos of second-hand shops, rewarded by some bits of Sinas or Black Forest carving?—a music-rack or cabinet-guard in open work of ferns and birds, bought for a few shillings because of some trifling flaw which a sharp knife would repair in an evening?—or a pair of Hankin plates which would just make up the set gathered in the same way from half a dozen directions?—or a quaint piece of Renaissance furniture gone to rack, but capable with clamps and polish of resetting and reviving in envied elegance? To think of leaving that punch-bowl, brought from Holland by a wealthy captain to Falmouth on the Cape-Cape Cod, of course—a howl of translucent porcelain, glowing with such colors as we only see in royal Worcester nowadays, its filled, shell-like edges and deep gilding fit to ravish the soul of a china fancier; and that George II. secretary in black oak, with pineapple finials each side the classic front—pieces I have had my eye upon for three years, till the dealer should consent to my price, as he was sure to finally; all of which chances were to be relinquished if I went to have my lungs repaired on the Pacific Slope.

What balm to my collective soul was the sight of the Indian china in the San Francisco shop-windows! The Navajo rugs at Santa Fé and the San Domingo pueblo pottery had tempted the spare silver out of our pockets, and kept our faculties for acquisition from rusting. At Los Angeles we had heard praises of the Indian treasures with which Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson's rooms were filled, and saw some lovely Oriental china in private hands, but everything in the shops was of lively newness and factory finish. Why will dealers bring, and people insist on buying the horrible, machine-carved side-boards and bedsteads, with high, bold-crested head-boards in awful curves of bastard Renaissance origin from the brain of an over-worked pattern-monger in Michigan workshops, when the low French panels with fretted tops are so much more fashionable and in better taste? Why will they select Brussels in hard Japanesque panels before library ingrain in soft olive, dull blue and pink, or geranium pink and maroon, studied from the borders of royal tapestries, and twice as expensive as Brussels, or half as cheap, according as you buy triple-wave English carpeting, fine as suiting, that will outwear generations, or the home-made Lowell or Bromley ingrain, of similar design, and both in the best taste? The halls and parlors of ordinary houses are dull with olive, stone-color, and dark red wall-papers, just as the French designers give us joyous clusters of blues, dull pink geraniums, and meadow grasses, or the purple and bronze of changing vines, and bouquets of blush and cream roses in dim, lovely tints for our home walls. Depend upon it, the Japanese, those sensitive, subtle aesthetes of nature, have the right idea of home interiors, for which everything they design is gay and cheerful, while rich, oppressive color goes for shrines and palatial halls. These citrine and dark red rooms depress our spirits with their fashionable gloom. Mr. Morris, in England, the French artists before him, and the Associated Artists of New York, have by practice and education of eye reached the same verdict, that neither dark nor very light surroundings content the senses, which require plenty of soft light without glare, with hues of tender color in the furnishings, and richer shades of the same asserted in cornice and relieving. The blues of mist deepening to cornflower tints, the warm dull tone of grain-fields, the sun's own color, the greens of vine and bough, softened by the downy surface of maturity, or their paler underlinings, or the kindly dust—if nothing else offers to subdue the harshness of deep green—mauve-violet haze and rose-washes of dawn, all these are about us in the wide world out of doors, and their delightful ghosts should follow us within, taking the change of different light and atmosphere. The eye does not weary of skillfully toned color and correct form, any more than the ear tires of those magical Spanish and gypsy airs which are the soul of bewitching melody. One seldom cares to change the furnishing of a room when taste has done its perfect work, and this content, and the care born of it, give one's meubles a longer lease of life. So it is economical and good policy to have things in the truest taste, which is not a matter of money in all cases.

Experience teaches the saving wisdom of furnishing everywhere in native and accessible belongings. These cabinet woods are in supply, with inlaid floors, paneled wainscots, and polished single panel doors, and light and ample furniture of ash, beech, or cherry. In the southwest States, New Mexico, Colorado, and Arizona, where fine stone abounds, stone and concrete should apply everywhere, from pavements and balustrades to chimney-pieces, hall seats, windowledges, and dressers. Mantels of serpentine and jasper, onyx slabs for window-casings and cabinets, with inlays of silver or copper alloys, and beading of native turquoise, only fit for such work, should gratify the taste for luxury, and stone surroundings would prove more acceptable in the long summer heats of Tucson and Santa Fé than wood-work and upholstery. When the resources of the country are developed, the tileries of the San Juan and Rio Grande will rival those of Valencia, which furnish Newport and New York entrance halls with floors and borders of tiles from the works extant since the time of the Moors, who established them in Spain. The fragments of tile and glazed pottery, which strew the ground about the ruined cities of the San Juan in New Mexico, are of a quality to compare with Etruscan and antique majolicas in brilliance and depth of color, and in richness of the glaze. Material for the most superb enamels and wares exists inexhaustibly in the fields of Arizona and her sister territories, and I expect to live to see house-walls lined and ceiled with clean, delicate tile-work as cheap and abundant as lath and plaster, which will vanish with adobe roofs. Adobe walls deserve a good word said for them, as they are warm in winter, cool in summer, substantial and pleasant in a homely way and it is to be hoped never will go out of existence for the common class of dwellings. One only needs to compare the stuccoed walls of the Spanish adobes at Monterey with their graceful southern roofs of curved tiles, their deep window-seats and doorways, with the thin, smart Yankee cottages going up near by, perky, limited, pretentious, and certain to be in twenty years more decrepit than the old adobes of the palmy days of '46. A Spanish adobe house, with well-finished walls and ventilating roof of the old curved tile, is more beautiful in an artistic sense, both suited to the climate and scenery, than the poky English cottage set up on stilts, where the price of lumber makes itself felt in contracted inches, and the spirit of trade-unions in the rough finish of casings under very thin paint. The adobe houses want wider windows with awnings, instead of the porch-roofs which throw the rooms into the shade, and cut off the sunlight, which is the great luxury of the California climate and essential to health. They make up for this lack in their low walls, which almost do away with stairs, and relieve the señoras of that sharp penance which the Yankee woman's three to four-story house entails in going up and down stairs continually, and which more than any other cause breaks her health, ruins her temper, and makes her thin and wretched-looking while young. Yet with land in plenty, by the thousand acres, the West must vacantly follow the idiocy of the East in planning stilted houses, albeit there is no dampness in the soil to dread, no valuing lots at a fortune the front foot. The well-to-do farmer thinks he has not done the right thing by his family unless he puts up a tall frame house on piles, and with attics to give all his children, servants, and women-folk the privilege of climbing three flights of stairs, indoors and out, twenty times a day; and the nabob no sooner sells his mines at a profit than he hastens to pile his walls heavenward, as if a hundred stairs to climb were the perquisites of wealth.

Why can not these people take lesson by the taste of the modern wealthy English, whose Mexican cottages, straying in one story with verandas canopied with vines, are the acme of fashionable aristocratic pleasure-houses along the Thames, and whose Tudor-gothic mansions, rarely rising above a modest second story, are the most beautiful of ancestral homes. Tenement houses must rise ten stories high, to make the most for their owners; but surely the test of a rich man's residence is the ease of living he can afford at any cost of ground. The newest houses East by the best architects are beginning to show the influence of such considerations. A man lives longer, other things being equal, if he does not force himself to carry his hundred and seventy-five pounds up and down twenty feet of steep incline a dozen times a day. He might as well take so many turns at hod-carrying. Ideas filter through people's heads slowly on matters of health, and it will be ten years before they can believe that a nerve-exhausted, heart-diseased, spine-affected generation will probably live longer, and certainly live easier, on a level than by lifting their own weights up-stairs. Perhaps you will agree that there is no end to the pretty and original style of fitting rooms possible in San Francisco, with the wares of the Orient and Mexico at command.

Where the dust flies as it does in this country, one may give thanks to find fine matting at twenty-five and thirty cents a yard. If you had to pay eighty-five cents a yard, as they do on the other side of the continent, you might condescend to use them; for there is nothing prettier in simple furnishings than a check, red, white, and olive matting, with redwood floor bare for fifteen inches all around, and polished with shellac until it is deep and rich-bued as mahogany. A redwood wainscot gives a rich tone to a room, with a pinky gray wall above it; but do not mix woods, as the custom is—laurel, cherry, ebony, and ash—till the beauty of each is lost. A redwood beading of the darkest kind, with one dull line of gold below, would be a handsome finish at the ceiling; and then on the pinky gray wall, what? A large Japanese paper panel, or two, joined from floor to ceiling, with pink curcubule, or scarlet crape ends for empty corners, and the space left for pictures, cabinets, or china. One lightest of corners, however, must be reserved for those wide shelves which are safest and best to display china—one velvet-covered shelf grouped with East Indian majolica, deep-plum and indigo bowls and flasks set off by Benares brass trays and flagons; above that, gay Oriental china, not set out piece by piece, all in a row, but massed in confusion of bright color and gilding—for three or four ordinary pieces have a good effect together, when they are not at all interesting singly; above that group the beautiful shells from the Gulf, a pink murex between large green and silver snail-shells—salmon and black, rose and buff—all the deepest enamel and tinting which porcelain essays in vain. A Pompadour might have a passion for ornamenting her cabinet with these heavies of the Nereids. See against that sea-green piece of Shanghai silk, draped on the pinkish wall, the old rococo mirror found in a Market Street shop, its dead gilding retouched, and small oval brackets round it bearing the choicest pearl and silver shells, alternately with blood-red coral and fine sea-fans. You might think the whole a sea-nymph's toilet, harring the gold comb. And each side of a lovely painting, in flat frame of satin-gold, are branching brackets for Indian bowls of California ferns, the choicest cheilanthes gracilis and maiden hair. An oval mirror hung across an inner corner of the room has its golden sconces at the side rising out of a base of fern with loveliest effect. The furniture is a bamboo lounge, with Chinese embroidered cushions, and foot-cover of blood-red silk, lightly embroidered in shades of deep-red, with tassels at the corners; and those carved India chairs fit for a church, with white, scarlet, and gold embroideries across the backs; that seraglio cushion in the window, made out of a cashmere shawl, with cashmere and silver tassels; and two or three swinging chairs, with soft purple cushions tied on seat and back; a screen of open-work wood before the fire, which California evenings excuse for purely decorative effect, it would seem; a painted screen, lovely with white bloom-roses and purple bell-flowers shutting off the library-table in one corner, which serves also for tea, as you see by the Kaga service on the deep-lace towel thrown across one end. We have specimens—what house in California has not?—but they are not strung out on the mantel, or set in square boxes on shelves, but gathered in a little velvet-lined, mirror-backed, hanging cabinet of lacquer with irregular shelves, where the big piece of peacock ore and pale amethyst quartz the rough nugget of gold and the azurite, the granite full of garnets, and the blue agate, the crystallized silver, the blood red stone from the Colorado River, the crystal vase of Pescadero pebbles, and block of Mexican onyx, relieve each other in color and sparkle. Everything for use is the secret of showing rarities well; accordingly, rose quartz lies on the writing-table for a paper-weight, a superb agate is hollowed for an inkstand, rough crystals, flecked with gold, receive slender gold-plated vases too slight to stand alone, a great polished abalone hangs by silver chains from a bracket for a catch-all, the straight cloisonné vases are filled with pot-pourri, and a white shell, on a gilt tripod holds confectionery.

Push aside the heavy Navajo rug, which deadens all noise the other side of the library door—Navajo weaving in dark blue and red, fine as Kabyle curtains in the best qualities, answering many artistic needs in the way of drapery. Coarser rugs joined form a handsome oriental-looking carpet in deep shades, which, with portières and sofa-covers en suite, richly relieve the fittings of laurel, ebony, and silver. What is the use of sending across the water for Smyrna and Arabic hangings when the fine Navajo rugs, in texture and color, compare with eastern work, a hundred dollars' worth of merino wool going to make a single blanket? The furniture was made, under protest, by an Oakland mechanic, by days' work, under the eye of the library-owner, the English chairs with square frames, grooved, and relieved with ebony stained sides, and dull silver four-foils and bosses—the dwarf bookcase and mantle to match. What, I ask you, is the use of living in the richest natural country on the hemisphere, unless polished woods, rich metals and stones are to be of use? Quantities of San Domingo and Fort Wingate pottery, of graceful shape and decoration, exquisite Alaska carving in black, polished slate, and Indian curios, fill the shelves each side of the mantel, tufted with feather work and crested with quiver and arrows. Fine pueblo baskets, woven to hold water, are filled with roses bedded in damp sponge. A great chair has a soft rug, lined with red silk, thrown over it—imagine the luxury of sinking into its folds. The windows are screened with thin green and crimson silk across the lower half; above the curtains of écu lace are festooned pale, embroidered headings. Kingston? No; but Moquis mantas, wrought in red and blue figures on unbleached twill—the work much better than anything from the Decorative Society. It has been wonderful diversion, devising and combining things for these rooms; but it has been vastly less expensive than buying commonplace Eastern furniture, and the effect—well, it is not commonplace.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 17, 1882.

Mr. Frederick Yates has just returned to this city from Europe, and has opened a studio at 417 Montgomery Street, in Morse's old place. He has brought with him many paintings, etchings, and engravings, from Paris, where he spent two years under the instruction of Bonnat, the celebrated French artist. Mr. Yates chose Bonnat's atelier because of the high place which that painter occupies as master of "life" studies. Besides Paris, he visited other European cities, making sketches and studies of celebrated works of art. Mr. Yates had the honor of seeing one of his paintings in the last Paris Salon, which was an acknowledged merit of worth, since only about twenty per cent. of the candidates gained the right to exhibit their paintings. This picture is now at his studio, and attracts much attention. It is entitled "The Mouse-Trap," and is well worth the encomiums bestowed upon it in Paris. He also does excellent work in etching, and improved every opportunity in that line while in Europe. Mr. Yates will shortly open a "life-class" in a studio adjoining his own, where he will take a limited number of pupils under his tutelage.

A sharp shock of earthquake took place Friday morning at a quarter past two o'clock. When it is considered that there were earthquakes in 1854, 1857, and 1859—in October; that the great earthquake of 1865 was in October; that in 1868 there were six shocks during the last nine days of October, by one of which much property was destroyed and some lives lost, both here and across the bay; that there were two earthquakes in 1872—in October; that there was one in 1875—in October; that there was a temblor in 1881—in October; when we consider, too, that there is a comet flashing in the southeastern sky, "importing change of time and state;" when we consider that by the electrical theory of earthquakes the comet may not be unconnected with our shake-up; when we consider that it is still ten days to the end of the month, and that we are all miserable sinners—when we consider all these things, it behooves us to break off abruptly, lest somebody believe them, or believe that we do.

Owing to the departure of two of its members, the Board of Directors of the Bohemian Club has been reconstituted. Mr. Eugene Dewey, the Vice-President, is about to take up his residence in New York City for an indefinite period. Mr. Edward W. Reuling starts for Europe in a few days, to remain a number of months. Horace P. Fletcher has been elected Director, vice Dewey, resigned. J. D. Redding has been elected Director, vice Reuling, resigned. The Board as at present constituted stands: President, Paul Neumann; Vice-President, Jerome A. Hart; Treasurer, Charles Josselyn; Secretary, T. H. Robertson. Directors—A. J. Moulder, Virgil Williams, Horace P. Fletcher, Joseph D. Redding, and J. R. Grismer.

The Californian for November opens with an article by Alfred Wheeler, entitled "A Contemporary of Washington." Mary W. Glascock is the author of a story, "Miss Vesta's Prodigal." "Evil Literature," is an attack by C. H. Shinn against evil literature, in which he denounces some modern novelists. One of the most interesting papers is on "Sir Gavan Duffy," by John Manning.

The Nahl collection will be placed on view next Tuesday evening, at the rooms of the Art Association, for only. The affair will take the form of the usual exhibitions, a string-band being in attendance. The collection will be thrown open to the public at rates of admission.

YORKER'S PARD.

"I'll go a hundred."

"I'll see your hundred and raise you five."

Mr. Ned Wade hesitated a moment, then slowly pushed forward two stacks of double-eagles, and called for a sight.

Mr. Jack Howland leisurely closed and returned his dainty penknife to his vest pocket, picked up his cards from the table, and tossed four queens and an ace into the pot. The crowd pushed forward to see his opponent's play. It was a disappointing one. Wade threw his cards, face down, upon his adversary's, pushed his chair back, and proceeded to carefully select and light a cigar, while Mr. Howland deftly sorted the eagles and double-eagles into symmetrical piles, until the pot was empty.

Said pot had contained all Mr. Ned Wade's material wealth. No sign of this embarrassing fact was evident in his face, as, with a cool nod to his opponent, he lazily arose and sauntered away. A few comments, such as, "Sandy cuss!" "Grit to the ends of his hair!" "You bet your life," etc., followed him; but a new victim of Mr. Howland's finesse had at once dropped into the vacant place, and absorbed the interest of the crowd anew. Wade, making for the door, slowly eluded his way through the dense crowd which filled the saloon. A hand was laid on his shoulder. He turned, and met the gaze of a rough, bearded specimen of the genus "prospector." Wade was a Kentuckian, and had all a Kentuckian's pride. The man's familiarity ruffled him. He haughtily drew away from the rough hand which lay not unkindly on his shoulder. The stranger seemed slightly abashed, and his suggestion that they should "irrigate" was advanced with a timidity absurdly out of keeping with his decidedly aggressive appearance.

"Thanks, no," was Wade's brief reply, as he moved away.

Recovering from the shock of so decided a refusal, the miner slowly followed him, and together they emerged upon the long porch which skirted the front of the saloon. The night was dark and damp. The wind blew cool from the yellow waters of the Klamath, which rolled sullenly along the base of the precipitous range which towered above Happy Camp. The change from the hot, fetid atmosphere of the saloon was delicious. Wade drew a half-dozen quick, full breaths of the sweet air, and then, resuming his cigar, sauntered down to the end of the porch farthest from the noise and hustle which came faintly through the walls, and, leaning against a pillar, gave himself up to meditation. His privacy was soon invaded. The miner had exhumed a battered pipe of incalculable age and filled it from a huckskin pouch of very questionable purity, had dexterously lighted it with flint and steel, and, thus prepared, advanced upon the enemy. He planted his battery alongside of an adjacent pillar, cut off retreat by assuming an inclined attitude which brought his broad back against the post, and one huge foot against the side of the house. A half-dozen vigorous puffs, and then:

"I say, stranger!"

No reply from the enemy. More blank cartridges of smoke from the attack, and then:

"O stranger!"

"Well?" quick and sharp.

"Strapped, ain't yer?"

Profound disgust, expressed by emphatic silence, follows this shot. The attack proceeds to toss a few shells into the enemy's works, regardless of results:

"I'll bet yer hoots that yer flat broke; that yer wouldn't pan out a color to the bucket." Then, waxing confidential: "Pard, yer thought yer was a little horse at poker—didn't you? Yer science to the heels of yer hoots, but yer didn't hold the pictures. Why, bless ye, pard, that Howland is a poker sharp, and he is a holy terror—now you hear me? Why, he knows a pack of cards better'n you know yer mother. A sandier man on a bluff, nor a purtier dealer off'n the bottom of a pack, never shuffled the pasteboards. He'll stock 'em quicker'n you can cut 'em, and give you any lay-out he likes, and heat it hy one card every time. Oh, you hear me; he's a terror, an' don't yer forgit it!" Again followed a volley of blank cartridges, and the attack was enveloped in the smoke of his own batteries. The enemy was evidently securely entrenched and uninjured, for not a shot replied. The attack was somewhat disconcerted, but not repulsed. Settling more securely in his own position, he renewed his bombardment.

"Pard, I'll allow that yer a handy cuss, and don't stand no bluffin'; but yer played on the squar', an' that coyote cleaned you to the limit of your pile, or I'm eternally fooled. Now, if yer are down to hard-pan, an' ain't got no dust cached no whar', yer're like to find it purty barren diggin' in a camp like this; seein', as I reckon, yer ain't no miner, an' like as not don't know a rocker from a rifle-bar. I'll allow, I like your grit, an' I think yer a white man; so, if yer want a grub-stake any time, I'm your man. Yorker's my name, an' my har is up the river a couple o' mile. Anybody'll tell you whar it is. That's what I want to say to you." Then, with a snap, as silence still reigned in the enemy's camp: "That's my offer, and you can take it or leave it, an' he damned to yer!"

The enemy was roused at last. Confusion followed this shot.

"I don't know why in the devil you take such an interest in my affairs," said Wade, with a short laugh; "but I assure you that I appreciate your kindness, and if I need assistance at any time I will take your offer gladly. But, candidly, I think that I can take care of myself, even though I don't know a what-do-you-call-it from a rifle. At all events, I'll give it a trial. Much obliged to you, all the same. Good-night." And Wade stepped off the porch and sauntered away into the darkness.

"O pard! Let's irrigate," called Yorker, after the retreat-ing figure.

"Thanks; not to-night," came back from the gloom.

"Well, I'm damned! Twice in one evenin'," exclaimed Yorker, sorrowfully, as he reloaded his pipe. "Queer cuss! Regular tenderfoot, but sand to his hat. Guess I'll liquor an' make a break for the ranch," which he did a half-hour later.

It was early fall when Wade "struck" Happy Camp. The rainy season, which in northern California begins in November, had not yet set in. Indian Creek was down, and the miners on it and smaller affluents of the Klamath were idle from lack of water. Decidedly, it was a bad time for a "tenderfoot" to make a living. Excepting a few hars along the Klamath, no ground was being worked. Wade acquired an extended and a minute knowledge of the topography of the camp and its environs in his search for a claim. This was all he did acquire. All old claims were represented, and no unstaked ground existed adjacent to the water supply. A month after his interview with Yorker, Wade found the condition of his affairs at least interesting. All superfluities upon which money could be raised had been applied to that end. His revolver still remained; but when it became a question of food vs. a possible need of the weapon, the latter consideration was swallowed by the former, and Wade lived for a week luxuriously upon the result. He was not accustomed to roughing it, and had yet to learn to eke out a day's subsistence to a week's. One morning he awoke to a new sensation—that of being "flat broke." At first he failed to grasp the situation. Breakfast, always a light meal with him, was not much missed. But when no breakfast was supplemented with no dinner and no supper, the intense reality of being "strapped" dawned upon him. Of course, he could have had a meal for the asking; a thousand, for that matter. There was not a miner in camp who would have refused him his share of bacon and black coffee. But his pride was not broken if his hank was, and he would not beg. Doubtless he was a fool, but the fact remains that at the end of two days he was rather weak from fasting. The morning of the third he started for Yorker's har. He had sought work at other hars along the river, but had found them full-handed. The same pride which had kept him from good food had also deterred him from seeking the man whom he had so indifferently treated some weeks before. Still, when a man has fasted—well, you know that fasting is accepted as a salutary remedy for pride.

Wade had traveled the narrow, hilly trail to Yorker's har before, but he had never found it the pull it was that day. He would have blushed to admit how long he was in making those two miles. Two miles? Two hundred! However, he finally got to the point on the trail opposite the har, and sat down on the rocky margin of the river, and looked across the yellow water to Yorker's cabin.

"Devilishly queer that a man should choose such a ledge as that for a building site," thought Wade.

Well, it was queer. The ledge referred to was a projection from the face of a cliff, which rose almost abruptly from the river's edge. It was more properly a bench, some hundred yards long, twenty yards wide, and twenty feet above the water, reached only by a rocky trail leading from a har which jutted into the river lower down and constituted Yorker's claim. Neither har nor ledge was accessible from that side of the Klamath. Above and below huge rocks rose from out the rushing river, forming the horns of the crescent in which the har and ledge lay. "Yorker's Ranch," some local wit had dubbed the cabin, possibly owing to the existence of a diminutive garden upon the ledge, in which scratched and floundered a few chickens, maintained at an expense truly exorbitant, when one contemplates the result in eggs. Yorker had been classified as a "queer cuss" long before Wade's advent, and enjoyed that immunity from intrusion which usually attaches to "queer cusses" in the West. Much of this was possibly due to the fact that he held the only means of communication with this fortress—a dug-out canoe. This Wade saw drawn up on the har below the ledge. Yorker was not in sight, but the singular appearance and disappearance of a shovel from the howels of the earth, and the clatter of falling gravel upon the howlders, already piled in symmetrical lines along the hars, gave evidence of his being in that vicinity. The river rolled wide and deep between them, but the air was still, and a voice reverberating from the cliff opposite was plainly heard; hence Wade's hail of "O Yorker!" was promptly answered by the resurrection of the individual addressed. Clampering over the howlders, Yorker made his way to the water's edge, whence, after an inquiring scrutiny of the invader, he quickly embarked in his dug-out. Working his way up stream in slack water for a hundred yards or so he suddenly shot out into the current, and, maintaining a diagonal course, deftly landed almost at Wade's feet. "Pard, I'm glad to see yer, cussed if I ain't; shake!" and Yorker held out his clay-stained hand, frankly.

"Yorker, I have come for that grub-stake," abruptly said Wade, taking his proffered hand.

"Wall, pard, yer do look kinder worked out an' abandoned," and Yorker looked into the thin face with its hungry eyes pityingly, and then turned away, muttering as he drew the canoe nearer shore: "Lots of sand yit, but a mighty holler stomach, I'll bet my life." Then to Wade: "Crawl in, pard, and set straight and stidy for'ard."

A few minutes later both men stood on the har. Silently Yorker led the way to the cabin, and going at once to a small locker produced a flask of whisky and two small tin cups. Placing these on the table, he pushed the bottle toward Wade with a doubtful expression on his face, which, however, cleared away like mist in the sunshine when Ned poured a generous portion of the liquor into his cup. Filling his own, Yorker nodded courteously to his companion, and with a brief "my regards" swallowed the contents at a draught. Wade drank more leisurely. He felt the need of some stimulant, and the fiery liquor thrilled through his veins, infusing delicious warmth.

"Purty good hug-juice, that; eh, pard?" said Yorker, dashing the amber drops off his grizzly moustache.

"Excellent! Where did you get it? Not at the camp?"

"Bet yer sweet life I didn't. That came from Yreka at an ounce a gallon. Load her up again; it's as mild as milk and wouldn't faze an infant."

"Thanks; not just now," and Wade sank upon one of the rough stools, and, leaning lazily back against the logs, listlessly watched Yorker's hurried preparations for dinner. He did not feel equal to assisting. A delicious languor pervaded his frame. Even the sight of the food in preparation did not excite him as it would have done an hour before. Yorker, with a rare delicacy, refrained from conversation, but pushed the dinner with all speed. Placing the table in such a position that Wade need not move, he soon spread upon it the simple food.

"Now, then, pard, slide inter the grub, such as it is. Have some salt-horse?" and he pushed the tin of meat toward his companion. Wade helped himself languidly, ate a few mouthfuls, and then laid down his knife and fork. An unconquerable drowsiness overcame him. He could not resist it. His head sank upon his chest, and he slept. Yorker paused in the act of pouring some dense black fluid in his companion's cup. Coffee-pot suspended, he gazed at Wade with blank astonishment. Then the light dawned upon him.

"Wall, I'm blessed if it ain't the hug-juice! Yorker, you are a cussed fool, for a fact, to give a man liquids when he ain't had no grub for the Lord only knows how long. I say, pard! O pard!" and he leaned over and shook the sleeping man gently, but without effect.

"He's floored for a fact. Wall, I am an idjotee," and, with remorseful tenderness, he carried the victim of misplaced kindness to a bunk, and, covering him with a blanket, resumed his meal in silence. Wade turned uneasily on his hard bed, and seemed for an instant about to rouse; but the fumes of the liquor reassured his power, and he once more lay still, breathing heavily. Yorker stole softly out of the cabin, and mechanically filling and lighting his pipe, paced up and down the ledge.

The sun was sinking behind the ragged crests of the Siskiyou, tipping the pines with silvery fire, when Yorker, knocking the ashes from his pipe, ceased his walk, and paused at the cabin. All was quiet. Wade still slept; but quietly now. The fire smoldered in the rough howler fire-place. Yorker entered quietly, and, tossing some splinters of pitch-pine upon the embers, added some bark, and by the glow of the flame, which at once sprang up, he again studied his companion's face. Turning away, he once more left the cabin. "Salt-horse is too heavy grub for a tenderfoot in his fix," muttered he, as he rounded the corner of the hut. He paused, and affectionately contemplated his little brood of feathered companions, regretfully remarking: "One of you roosters has got to pass in your checks. Banty, I reckon you're the unfortunate," and Banty was.

When Wade awoke, an hour later, he found Yorker smoking his pipe in the glow of the fire, while the murmur of the river stole softly in from the twilight which seemed to stop at the door.

He sat up dizzily. Yorker laid down his pipe, and advanced with a cup of smoking, black coffee.

"Pard, I'll admit that the hug-juice was soothin' in its effects; but take a good swallow or two of this yer truck, and mebbey yer head'll feel better." Wade drank the contents of the cup at a draught. Then he rose and walked unsteadily to a seat near the fire, and wearily rested his head upon his hand.

"Rather shaky on yer pins, pard. Yer need a little stiffenin', I reckon. Try some soup," and with pardonable pride Yorker produced from the Dutch oven a pan of fragrant broth—the tangible essence of the unfortunate Banty. Wade ate it eagerly, while Yorker smoked, and contemplated him complacently.

"Taste good, pard?"

"Delicious! Best I ever ate."

"Wall, it oughter. Banty was a gamy little cuss," remarked Yorker, simply. "I reckon yer ain't been livin' very high since I saw yer last," he continued, refilling his pipe and settling himself more at ease.

"Well, not very," and Wade flushed, and laughed dryly.

"Kinder tough diggin' in a camp that's idle." Then crossing one leg over the other and nursing one foot, Yorker continued, colloquially: "I remember the summer of '59 down in Sacramento—"

"Were you in Sacramento in the fall of '59?" Wade interrupted, eagerly.

A slight pause, and then very quietly: "Yes, pard; I was."

"It seems an absurd question to ask, Yorker, but did you know a man named Wade there—Charley Wade?"

Another pause, and then: "Wall, yes, pard; I did. Friend of yours?"

"Why, he is my brother!" exclaimed Wade, excitedly. "This is the first news I have had of him since that fall, four years ago. Did you know him well? Have you any idea where he went to—where he is now?"

Yorker moved his chair back into the shadow. His voice was husky, and he cleared his voice nervously.

"Yes, pard; I knew Charley Wade well. 'Kentuck' we used to call him. So he was your brother?" with a strange emphasis upon the verb.

"Was? Yes; and is, I hope," returned Wade, lightly.

"Tell me all that you know about him, Yorker," and he eagerly leaned toward the man in the shadow. Yorker rose and leaned against the rough chimney. The flickering flame cast strange shadows upon his face. It looked older and more wan; but it might have been the changeful light.

"Pard," said he, softly, at last, "pard, I'd rather know where he is than to have to tell yer this; for pard, old man, yer brother's dead."

"Dead! Charley dead!" cried Wade, springing to his feet.

"Yes, pard; died in Sacramento in '59," answered Yorker, sadly.

Wade sank into his seat again. His weakness overcame him, and, resting his face in his hands, he sobbed pitifully. Yorker stole softly out into the night, and once more paced up and down the ledge. What sad memories came to these two men during the hour which followed will never be known. When Yorker again entered the cabin, Wade had recovered his tranquillity, and sat gazing at the dying fire. Yorker sat down, and smoked sympathetically in silence.

"Yorker, can you tell me how he died?" asked Wade, in a low tone, at last.

"Pard, I wasn't with him; but—but it was a—few as took him, I was told. He was well cared for, an' they gave him a hoss lay-out, and planted him in the purtiest spot they could stake out in the boneyard. Likewise, he had a hiyou signboard, with 'Kentuck, a white man,' painted on it in black an' gilt. He was a white man, an' don't you forgit it." Then Yorker said no more, nor did Wade.

* * * * *

"Well, Yorker, what arrangement can I make with you?" said Wade, the next day, as the two men sat over their breakfast. "I want to get a few hundred, and then, I reckon, I'll get back to Kentucky and the old folks."

"Why, pard, you'll locate right here, an' work this har with me, an' we'll divide the dust," said Yorker, simply, as if the possibility of any other arrangement had never presented itself.

"Well, but that isn't at all fair to you, Yorker, and"—
"Hold on, pard," interrupted Yorker, quietly. "I asks yer pardon, pard, for speakin' of him; but your brother helped me out of a hole, an' set me on my pins, when I couldn't show a color. He was a white man, an' my friend, an' you are his brother, pard. Half my pile is yours, so long as you'll spread yer blankets an' camp with me." Then with a sudden pathetic touch of pleading in his voice, as Wade seemed undecided still: "Pard, gimme a show to make up yer loss to yer a little. He was my friend, and never went back on me when I was down on my luck."

Wade held out his hand, and grasped Yorker's warmly. There was a tacit acceptance in the act. He could not say much, nor did Yorker seem to expect more. That Yorker should have taken as a partner in his claim "a damned tenderfoot," as the miners generically, and not vindictively, described Wade, caused a passing ripple of surprise in the camp. Yorker's reputation for sociability was not an enviable one. He had systematically repelled all advances toward intimacy, and one bibulous and persistent prospector, who insisted upon drinking with him one evening, found himself in a very discomposed condition under a card-table, and with no personal attractiveness—to speak of—left. To his reputation as a hard hitter was added that of being very quick with his "gun." Hence, he maintained his exclusiveness with passable ease.

Yorker and his "pard" were seldom seen in the camp. A flume had to be set, a dip-wheel and China-pump to be placed, and raffle-blocks and poles to be cut; and it was only by the steadiest labor that the partners succeeded in getting affairs in proper shape before the rainy season was upon them.

The excitement of mining took full possession of Wade. The ground worked proved to be unusually rich. Two nuggets of exceptional size and beauty added renewed enthusiasm, and Yorker found it almost impossible to keep his companion down to reasonable working hours. The result may be anticipated readily. The long hours spent in water which chilled in spite of rubber suits, the irregular meals, the restless sleep, the feverish excitement, all told on a frame unused to such strains. Slight shooting pains began to manifest themselves in the supple joints. Yorker looked grave and begged Wade to rest—to get a substitute and run out to Yreka for a month. Wade laughed at his fears, and, with the blind confidence of youth in its physical powers, hurried on to his fate.

It came upon him quickly. One night he awoke with racking pains in every part of his frame. He could not move without excruciating agony. He was in the clutches of inflammatory rheumatism. Yorker applied the few alleviative remedies he had been quietly collecting for a month past, but with little success. By morning, Wade was raving in delirium. By a passing miner Yorker sent to the camp for assistance in nursing the sick man. By night, Wade's condition was pitiable in the extreme.

Thirty miles up the river, at Hamburg Bar, was a physician who had gained a local reputation in the treatment of this dread disease. It was just dusk and raining fast, when Yorker suddenly rose from his seat by the sick man's bunk, and said, abruptly: "Boys, I'm goin' to Hamburg for the saw-bones. Klamath Jack's just in from Sailor Diggins, an' I can get his cayuse. Will be back by noon to-morrow if I can make the rifle. Yer can't do much but keep him in his bunk, and keep the flannels wet with that doctor's stuff. So long!" and taking his oilskin coat from its peg he passed out into the night.

The river was running full, and now and then some huge black object came rushing down the flood and shot by into the gloom. One touch from those fallen pines meant sure destruction to the frail canoe and its occupant. But a cool head guided the craft, and soon Yorker was plodding heavily along the sodden trail leading to Klamath Jack's rancherie.

By the time the cayuse was saddled a pall of blackness had settled upon the region. Bad enough in the broad light of day, the trail to Hamburg Bar was beset by fearful risks when wrapped in the gloom of a stormy night. But no thought of waiting for day found refuge in Yorker's mind. The agonized face, the delirious ravings of his friend, were clinging to him with terrible distinctness as he threw himself heavily into the deep saddle, exclaiming: "We'll go through or bust, old gal! G'long, you beast!" and digging his spurs into the beast's ribs, they dashed away from the rancherie.

It was well for them that the cayuse had traveled the trail through day and night until each turn and twist, each hill and level, each crumbling foothold and overhanging rock were mapped in the convolutions of her brain, and instinct did what man's reason would have failed in doing. Now, dashing along with apparent recklessness, brushing the rain in showers from off the bushes which swept them on either side; now, pausing and slowly creeping along some almost unseen ledge, while from far below rose the roar and hiss of the angry river; now, plunging into some rushing affluent swollen to a torrent by the steadily falling rain; on and on, mud-splashed, rain-soaked, struggled horse and man till the blackness of night gave way to the ghostly gray of dawn. Then the trail descended suddenly for the last time, and, widening to a road, swept into the town lying in ghostly silence. With jingling spurs and creaking saddle Yorker rode heavily up the deserted street. Pausing before the corral of the only hotel in camp he sought an unused stall in the barn, and loosening the cinch of the saddle, removed the bridle from his tired animal's foam-flecked mouth, and then wearily proceeded to rub down the smoking flanks and mud-stained limbs. The cayuse contentedly munched the coarse hay before her. Finally, removing the heavy saddle, Yorker, by deft touch, examined the beast's back. Rubbing it with the sleeve of his rough coat, he said, cheerfully: "All right, old gal! You're the boss cayuse;" and with a hearty slap of commendation, which the tough little beast bore stoically, he left the stable.

Making his way at once to the doctor's cabit, Yorker thundered on the door. It was quickly opened, and a brief colloquy ensued.

"In two hours, then," finally said Yorker.

"All right. Will meet you at the hotel," and the door closed.

OLD FAVORITES.

By the Alma River.

Willie, fold your little hands;
Let it drop—that "soldier" toy;
Look where father's picture stands—
Father, that here kissed his boy
Not a month since—father kind,
Who this night may (never mind)
Mother's sob, my Willie dear—
Gry out loud, that He may hear
Who is God of battles—cry,
"God keep father safe this day
By the Alma River!"

Ask no more, child. Never heed
Either Russ, or Frank, or Turk;
Right of nations, trampled creed,
Chance-poised victory's bloody work;
Any flag if the wind may roll
On thy heights, Sevastopol!
Willie, all to you and me
Is that spot, whatever it be,
Where he stands—no other word—
Stands—God sure the child's prayers heard—
Near the Alma River.

Willie, listen to the bells
Ringing in the town to-day;
That's for victory. No knell swells
For the many swept away—
Hundreds, thousands. Let us weep.
We, who need not—just to keep
Reason clear in thought and brain
Till the morning comes again;
Till the third dread morning tell
Who they were that fought and—fell
By the Alma River.

Come, we'll lay us down, my child;
Poor the bed is—poor and hard;
But thy father, far exiled,
Sleeps upon the open sward,
Dreaming of us two at home;
Or, beneath the starry dome,
Digs out trenches in the dark,
Where he huries—Willie, mark!—
Where he buries those who died
Fighting—fighting at his side—
By the Alma River.

Willie, Willie, go to sleep;
God will help us, O my boy!
He will make the dull hours creep
Faster, and send news of joy,
When I need not shrink to meet
Those great placards in the street,
That for weeks will ghastly stare
In some eyes—Child, say that prayer
Once again—a different one—
Say, "O God! thy will be done
By the Alma River."

The Children.

When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And the school for the day is dismissed,
And the little ones gather around me
To bid me good-night and be kissed;
Oh, the little white arms that encircle
My neck in a tender embrace!
Oh, the smiles that are halos of heaven,
Shedding sunshine of love on my face!

And when they are gone I sit dreaming
Of my childhood too lovely to last—
Of love that my heart will remember
When it wakes to the pulse of the past,
Ere the world and its wickedness made me
A partner of sorrow and sin,
When the glory of God was about me,
And the glory of gladness within.

Oh, my heart grows as weak as a woman's,
And the fountains of feeling will flow,
When I think of the paths steep and stony,
Where the feet of the dear ones must go—
Of the mountains of sin hanging o'er them,
Of the tempest of fate blowing wild;
Oh, there's nothing on earth half so holy
As the innocent heart of a child.

They are idols of hearts and of households;
They are angels of God in disguise;
His sunlight still sleeps in their tresses,
His glory still beams in their eyes.
Oh, those truant from home and from heaven!
They have made me more manly and mild,
And I know how Jesus could liken
The kingdom of God to a child.

I ask not a life for the dear ones,
All radiant as others have done,
But that life may have just enough shadow
To temper the glare of the sun;
I would pray God to guard them from evil,
But my prayer would hound back to myself;
Ah! a seraph may pray for a sinner,
But a sinner must pray for himself.

The twig is so easily hended,
I have banished the rule and the rod;
I have taught them the goodness of knowledge,
They have taught me the goodness of God;
My heart is a dungeon of darkness,
Where I shut them from breaking a rule;
My frown is sufficient correction;
My love is the law of the school.

I shall leave the old home in the autumn,
To traverse its threshold no more;
Ah! how I shall sigh for the dear ones
That meet me each morn at the door!
I shall miss the "good-nights" and the kisses,
And the gush of their innocent glee,
The group on the green, and the flowers
That are brought every morning to me.

I shall miss them at morn and at even,
Their song in the school and the street;
I shall miss the low hum of their voices,
And the tramp of their delicate feet.
When the lessons and tasks are all ended,
And Death says: "The school is dismissed!"
May the little ones gather around me,
To bid me good-night, and be kissed.

THE TROTTING-HORSE REPORTER.

He Discourses on Croquet.

"Editor in?"

"No," replied the horse reporter to the person asking the question—a young man with a tablespoon-hat and a you-may-kiss-me-but-don't-you-tell-papa moustache, who stood in the doorway.

"Well, of course, you know," said the young man, "very likely it wouldn't be absolutely necessary for me to see the really and truly editor about this matter that I wanted to have settled. It's a question to be answered, you know. It is a real hard question, you know, and a good many of our set have tried awfully to settle it, but we can't. I never saw such a provoking thing in all my life, and last night I was talking with my room-mate about it, and we got real angry, and it looked once as if we should strike each other. I wouldn't have had a row with Cholly for anything, you know, because we have been in the same store for nearly three years now, and when he was promoted to the ribbon counter he always spoke to me just the same as when we were both in the threads, you know."

"Yes, I know," said the horse reporter; "but what is your question?"

"Well, you see, some people are playing croquet, and a rover is driven up close to the home-stake. Now, another man he is dead on the ball, but, having a stroke, plays on the rover and forces it against the stake. Now, I say the rover is dead, and the other fellows they say it isn't, and we've been having an awful time about it, and"—

"Yes; you told me that before. Our croquet editor is away on his vacation. He spends it in the Asylum for Feeble-minded People, getting pointers from the inmates; but like enough I can fix this thing for you."

"Oh, that's jolly! I have a cigarette?"

"No; thank you. I am over nine years old. But about the croquet matter. You say the rover is close to the stake?"

"Yes."

"And the next player knocks it against the stake?"

"Yes."

"And then the player after him claims that the rover is dead?"

"Yes; that's it; and they can't agree."

"Well," said the horse reporter, "I should say that the man who got the first knock-down ought to win."

"But they don't knock each other down. They don't quarrel at all."

"Then the fairies are indeed kind to the dry-goods clerk, and I can only say that your best plan is to disguise yourself with a cigar and ride down in the elevator."

Also on Dissipation.

"I want to see an editor," said a slim young man, as he opened the door yesterday afternoon.

"If it's anything about a delightful reception was held last Thursday evening at the residence of our well-known fellow-citizen John Smith, or Miss Beatrice Perkins will spend the autumn at Mukwanago, you'll have to take it into the other room," said the horse-reporter, "because the society editor is out editing a chicken-fight this afternoon, and the orders are to turn all the social gruel over to the janitor. To-morrow is window-cleaning day."

"I came up to see," said the young man, "whether one of the editors would have any objection to giving me some advice on a matter in which I am deeply interested."

"You're in love, aren't you?" asked the horse reporter.

"I know you are, anyhow," he continued, without giving the visitor a chance to answer. "There is a sort of nervous, hesitating, cat-found-in-the-wrong-back-yard air about your actions that gives you away at once. What's the trouble? Girl gone back on you?"

"I think not," replied the young man; "I can not believe that any one has usurped my place in her affections."

"You mustn't have such a Boston way of talking," said the horse reporter, "or we shan't be able to get along well. How's the old man? Have you corralled him?"

"Do you mean the young lady's father?" asked the visitor, with a look of mild astonishment.

"Certainly I do," responded the reporter. "How do you loom up in the parental horizon?"

"The father of the young lady does not object to me. I hardly think you understand the matter," said the young man. "My trouble is that the young lady does not seem fitted to become the wife of a man who wants a helpmeet. She doesn't seem to have any practical ideas."

"Sort of a girly girl, isn't she?" said the horse reporter; "always talking about the ideality of the ideal, and all such mush as that, and wants to know if the silvered pencilings of moonlight among the verdure-clad trees are not weirdly beautiful. I've seen that kind. They're daisies—to keep away from."

"I think you have the right idea," replied the visitor, "although your style of expressing it is somewhat crude."

"It's a pretty tough case," said the admirer of Maud S. "These girls that are so eternally æsthetic are generally first-class feeders though—I've noticed that. The silvery moonbeams never seem to take away their appetite. I guess you'd better try the reckless-dissipation racket—that ought to fetch her. This is the way: The next time you call on Myrtle, or whatever her name is, you want to plant yourself on the sofa with a sort of weary, man-been-reading-a-Milwaukee-paper look, and put your hand up to your forehead. Then when she asks what's the matter, you say that her manner of late has been so cold that it must be that she does not love you, and that the thought of losing her was so maddening that you have been indulging in reckless dissipation. If she doesn't sling herself around some then, and say that she will never, never leave you, and how could you ever doubt her love, and all that, I'm no judge."

"I will act on your suggestion," said the visitor, taking up his kiss-me-quick-before-I-go hat, and looking out in a friendly way over the high-water collar. "How much dissipation to you think I ought to indulge in to produce the proper effect?"

"Well," replied the horse reporter, "I should imagine if you were to play about two games of billiards and strong lemonade, it would constitute for you the will of a debauch."—Chicago Tribune.

The strength of the McDonald vote is variously estimated from ten to thirty thousand. No one thinks it will be less than ten, while many enthusiastic temperance people place it beyond the larger figure. The reasons for this confidence are thus stated: There are twenty-two thousand Good Templars, of whom ten thousand seven hundred and fifty are adult male voters; in the other temperance organizations—"Home Protectionists," "Bands of Hope," "Christian Alliances, etc.—there are large numbers of earnest temperance men; the religious organizations, Protestant and Catholic, will contribute votes from conscientious convictions of religious duty; many who are not teetotalers or prohibitionists will encourage a movement which will, in their judgment, reduce their taxes; many who are tipplers, unable to resist appetites for intoxicating drink, will vote for prohibition as an aid to reform; while many temperate drinkers are willing to aid a movement which will end in some rational mode of regulating and controlling the manufacture, sale, and use of alcoholic drink. There are large numbers of Republicans who are indifferent to the success of Mr. Estee because of his questionable relations toward the corporations, the debris, and Sunday-law questions; many who resent his former defections from the Republican party, and many who resent his questionable practices in securing his nomination, and are indignant toward him for his alliance with the Irish ward bosses who ran the machine in San Francisco from Peter Hopkins's bar-room and the Mint Saloon. The temperance people, like all enthusiasts, have entered with zeal upon their first political campaign. They are perfecting local organizations in all the counties of the State. They are calling mass meetings in every direction. They are establishing organs, sending out speakers, and scattering documents on every side. Money is abundant—abundant, because the class of people composing the temperance party demand no compensation for votes, and do not have to be rallied around a beer-barrel and whisky-keg. Doctor McDonald expects to get more votes than Mr. Estee, and James McM. Shafter will give Paul Neumann a lively contest in this district for Congress. The temperance vote renders the election of Mr. Estee quite impossible, and makes the election of General Stoneman quite certain. This emancipates Republicans from the embarrassment of thinking that they will throw their votes away upon McDonald. The defeat of Mr. Estee is now conceded by all intelligent politicians; and, while it may not be possible to elect McDonald, each vote cast for him is the expression at the ballot-box of an individual opinion in favor of substantial reform, and is a protest against the methods which Mr. Estee has used in advancing his political interests. Every vote cast for McDonald goes to lay the solid foundation of a new American party, that shall give the courage to make itself felt in the future. Thirty thousand votes cast for the temperance candidate this year bring both parties to them. Both parties will ask their support, and both parties will bid for their votes the promise of healthful and needed legislation upon the alcoholic traffic.

The municipal conventions have ended their labors. The Republicans have waded through the deep waters of many tribulations to pastures that are green with the promises of success. The Pope's Democratic Irish, which has, like the hog, crawled so often through the party fence, now finds itself still grunting by the barren road-side. Some of the Democratic nominations are excellent ones, but what can be said in defense of the fact that Catholic Irish so largely preponderate? What explanation can be given for the monstrous and anomalous fact that in four Senatorial Districts there are nine Roman Irish, one Scandinavian, and not an American, German, Protestant, or man of other nationality and religion on the ticket? What apology can be made for the fact that of four Superior Judges, all are Irish or Irish-American and Roman Catholics? What is the explanation that any fair-minded, honorable Irish Catholic Democrat and gentleman can make, when the whole Democratic municipal ticket is analyzed and the following facts are encountered: More than a hundred Irish were in the Convention—two-thirds of the whole body; in the County Committee, four-fifths are Irish, and all of one religion. For State Senators are Timothy McCarthy, Jeremiah Harrigan, John Dougherty, Martin Kelly, William Cronan, F. J. Sullivan, Edward Keating, T. K. Nelson, and Jeremiah Lynch. For members of Assembly are Thomas Barry, James Callaghan, James Flinn, Patrick Plover, Tim McDonald, Peter Whalen, Thomas Healy, Bernard Rawle, Dr. Levenson, Michael O'Connor, Dennis H. Bibb, Cornelius A. Hughes, Thomas H. Murphy, E. J. O'Connor, O. Pardow, Van Getz, and McShaeffer. For Superior Judges are Dennis Toohey, James Coffee, James McGuire, F. M. Clough. For Justices are Pennie, Wolfe, Young, and Dunne. For School Directors, a majority belong to a church that denounces our schools as godless, and declares it a sin to educate children in schools other than parochial. We could stand Pat Dunn for Controller, and Pat Connelly for Sheriff, but, in the name of God, must we have only Irish-born Romanists to make our laws, and Irish-born judges to expound them? While we would avoid charging any one of our Democratic legislators or judges with immoral or vicious lives, with ignorance, bigotry, poverty, or drunkenness, we demand of each of our readers that for himself he institute the proper inquiries as to the habits, the morals, and fitness of these men to make and interpret our laws. We demand of respectable Democrats—native and foreign-born—to answer, on their consciences, if these things are endurable. Let us conceive Jos. Hoge, Samuel Wilson, Hall McAllister, Messrs. Garber, Thornton, Greathouse, Bergin, Hammond, Heydenfelt, and other lawyers, expounding the law to Clough, McGuire, and Toohey. Toohey—yesterday a land-league orator; the day before a salaried writer upon an obscure country journal, a political adventurer, without legal learning or the discipline of a trained legal education; to-morrow clothed in judicial ermine—to adjudicate upon the lives and property of his fellow-citizens. These things are monstrous and unendurable. They menace the safety of our republican institutions. If freedom be worth preserving, let every intelligent and honorable citizen—Democratic and Republican, Roman Catholic and Protestant, foreign and native-born—protest at the electoral urn against this prostitution of republican government. The Republican Municipal Convention has, after awful birth-pains, been delivered of a ticket that is fairly representative of the respectable, intelligent property interests of our city. We have a right to be grateful to those attending physicians who, though called late to the party bedside, thus happily saved to the world mother and child. Mother and child are both doing well, and, unless assaulted with more than ordinarily severe infantile diseases between now and November, we have no doubt the Republican infant will pull through. It has been very hard on the old man of the Bulletin, who worked the machine, and we shall not regret if he dies. The bosses all look thin, and we are dreadfully anxious that they do not recover. The Republican party will never be itself, and be never again restored to its normal condition of health, strength, and honest, manly vigor, till it has buried all this vile mob of political suckers who have drained its very life-blood. The sooner it is rid of them the better. We wish in conscience that we could say what we think of some most excellent nominees on the Democratic ticket. We wish we could vote for them; but, unfortunately, they are in such awful bad company that we must content ourselves with Dr. McDonald for Governor, and, with here and there an exception, a straight Republican city ticket. This is written before the Republican Supervisors are named. Unless the Republicans make exceptionally good nominations for the Board of Supervisors we shall indulge ourselves with the luxury of voting for several Democrats; among others, John Shirley, from the Third Ward; Henley Smith, from the Fifth Ward; Fleet Strother, from the Eighth Ward; and Herman Ranken, from the Tenth Ward.

The compliment paid to Doctor R. H. McDonald, in making him the candidate of the Prohibition party, was a very great one. Its personal value is far higher than the nomination of General Stoneman after a struggle of many ballots or the triumph of Mr. Estee's well-arranged machine. Doctor McDonald stands as the representative of a principle, a sentiment, and a reform. He is the leader of a band of men governed by high and honorable motives. He is the standard-bearer of an army of earnest men, on the eve of an important contest. To-morrow is for him and his cause in California an Austerlitz or a Waterloo. It will be as he makes it. If, in sordid cowardice, he sits in his bank, to make and save dollars through this coming month of battle-days, he will deserve the contempt of all brave men who mean business. His place is at the head of his army; his purse its commissariat. He should visit in person each division and headquarters of his forces. He should personally inspect his out-posts. He should in person plant his picket-guard, and throw out his line of skirmishers. Prayers don't win political victories. Providence is always with the heavy artillery and the quick-flying batteries. No gun kills that is not shot. God helps those who help themselves. We write this in hopes to inspire Doctor McDonald, and every man on the Prohibition ticket, and every man who believes in the regulation of the alcoholic traffic, to put forth their best exertions. A national convention of alcoholic traffickers has just been held in Chicago. The League of Freedom in California is fighting like a black cat in a dark corner for the last of its nine worthless lives. The temperance people are fighting against organization, money, and party intrigue. They are fighting for the law under the banner of the law, for the valley farmer and his home against the gravel-slucier, for the poor man's Sabbath and the Christian's day of worship against the greed of capital and the plottings of the alcoholic fiend, for property and its rights against the agrarian and communistic robber who would interfere with what he does not own, and the political adventurer who would steal that which he has not the genius or industry to honestly acquire. Let no man be ashamed of his candidacy or his cause, or for a moment indulge the idle thought that in voting for McDonald he is throwing away his vote. Let no temperance man undertake to set up his opinion that there is another and a better way, or a later and a better day, to strike this blow than now. Every vote is an added stone to the barricade over which the whisky army must fight its way. Let no preacher attempt to pray around his duty, for he can't fool Saint Peter with his quaker guns. If every temperance man will vote, he will be surprised at the result in November.

The Reverend M. C. Briggs—too late for our use—sends us a communication too long for our space. It is so uncommonly good that we feel a sincere regret that we can not print it. We make it a rule never to allow a good thing to be lost, simply because it is severe on ourself. The doctor defends the Jesuitical doctrine of choosing the least of evils when the one is inevitable, and this is his apology for deserting an opportunity to vote for a principle—viz., prohibition—and vote for an evil—viz., Estee. This is the kind of impracticable goodness that has bindered the temperance cause, and will hold it in check till the whisky influence is strong enough to murder it. The Christian denominations and their clergymen have been praying for temperance reform ever since the writer's grandfather was a boy. We simply ask them to make the experiment of aiding God with their votes. Try the ballot just once, and if it fail, we will stipulate that the prayers may go on till the angel Gabriel blows his ultimate horn. The following hit, which the doctor gets in, so fairly above the belt, although it is cuttingly severe, is too good to be lost:

Pardon this unintended length, and indulge me in a single paragraph more. You facetiously represent the editor of the Argonaut as passing smilingly in at heaven's gate, and helping himself to harp and stool. Even in dreams men will "talk of what runs in their head." Helping yourself to what does not belong to you does not appear to have been so unfamiliar a thought as to starve you in the least. In death, the whole scene of slipping in, etc., appears genuinely characteristic.

"But, oh, it was a dream."

Pardon me if I meekly suggest that none enter there by proxy. Perhaps both of us had best adopt Josh Billings's wise advice, never to prophesy till after the event transpires. But if "dreams are to be interpreted by contraries," and positions should get transposed in that future state, it will afford me a melancholy pleasure to bring you water, if I may, for the sturdy blows you have struck for the right in the past, and, let me hope, the not less trenchant thrusts you will yet give for temperance and a true Americanism, ere either of us shall interview St. Peter at the Gate.

M. C. BRIGGS.

Mr. J. P. Dunn, now Democratic candidate for State Comptroller, was once Auditor of San Francisco. During his term of office he imported all his own and his wife's relations from Ireland, and pensioned them upon our treasury, as follows:

Himself.....	$8,000
His brother.....	2,400
His sister.....	1,498
His cousin.....	3,000
His other cousin.....	1,038
His brother-in-law.....	1,310
One more cousin.....	3,000
Just one more cousin.....	1,312

Making a total for the Dunn family of $23,596. If Dunn is elected State Comptroller, we may regard the State Treasury as an Irish immigration fund for all the mendicant Dunns in all Ireland, from the Cove of Cork to the Giant's Causeway.

There is a false impression abroad in our community in reference to the Central Pacific Railroad corporation, in this: that the corporators have been the beneficiaries of the Government to the extent of nearly thirty millions of dollars in money, to the extent of millions of acres of valuable lands, and that they are indebted to the State of California, to San Francisco, Sacramento, and Placer counties, for large gifts and subsidies; that these lands and moneyed gifts and credits in aid of the railroad enterprise place the railroad builders in an attitude toward the people other than a business one; that they hold somehow the relation of trustees toward the General Government, and are holding some undefined relation toward the people that places upon them at least the moral obligation to transport passengers and merchandise at such rates as the community shall be content with, and to do business upon other than business principles. This impression is a false one. It is not founded upon facts, and the sooner the business community is disabused of this false impression the better it will be for it. We shall not in this article undertake to discuss the moral attitude which these or any other corporations hold toward the people. We are not concerned with the moral question, and are not holding the position of father-confessor or conscience-keeper to those who own and control the Central Pacific Railroad property. We will in this writing consider the practical and financial relations which exist between the Central Pacific Railroad owners and the community in which and for whom they have undertaken to do business. These relations are to a degree exceptional, and grew out of exceptional conditions, but in no sense do they alter the business relations which exist between the roads and the people. If Mr. John T. Doyle, who is the most intelligent and fairest representative of a class that has gone crazy over a false idea, would disabuse himself of the conceit that he is Don Quixote, and the railroad company the windmill; if he would dismount from his Rosinante and make Samuel Seabough descend from his ass for a consultation; if they each would ask the other: In what respect has the railroad injured us?—in what particular has it failed in its obligation to the people of whom we are a part?—what money has it had from city, county, State, or General Government whose taxes we are compelled to pay, for which it has not rendered a fair and just equivalent?—what contract has it ever entered into with government or individual that it has not honorably kept?—what has it ever done that has injured the State of California, where it is located, or the city of San Francisco, where it terminates?—what is it doing or threatening to do that imperils these interests, or in any sense threatens to be prejudicial to the future welfare of city or State?—if these two gentlemen would look upon the railroad as a place to grind corn, and not as an enchanted castle; if they could be made to regard it as a practical business enterprise engaged in the transportation of passengers and merchandise for the mutual benefit of the parties interested, and not as a political factor which they have a right to drag into the arena of politics for the benefit of knaves and demagogues—then they would seem at least to be more rational and disinterested than they now appear to be. If they would admit the benefits which have already been wrought in this State by the existence of its railroads, confess the good they have done, and fairly acknowledge what has been accomplished, instead of this continual jeremiad of woes, which, through the Examiner and Chronicle, they continually pour out, they would appear more honest. They would encourage immigration and do much to improve the business of the community, if they would get themselves into the Pandora's box of evils and shut the lid down over themselves. Two such never-ending scolds, with the unceasing din of unfounded complaints and false accusations, with such demagogues as Estee, Foote, and Sumner, are sufficient to keep the community in a ferment which works only evil. The truth is, and it is recognized by every honest man of sense, that the Central Pacific Railroad has accomplished more for the advancement of this State than all other causes combined. The men who conceived and consummated this project of a transcontinental railroad have done more to develop this State than any hundred other men who have ever done business in it. Ours was an isolated position on this almost unoccupied coast. We, who were the pioneers, who had dared the perils of a hazardous journey to reach it, who appreciated its beauties of climate, its variety of productions, its wealth of mines, forests, fisheries, and quarries, its commercial, agricultural, and manufacturing possibilities, and who for nearly twenty years had lived in exile from Eastern homes, scarcely dared to hope that the time would come in our lives when so magnificent an achievement as a transcontinental railroad would be consummated. Messrs. Stanford, Edward and Charles Crocker, Mark Hopkins, and Huntington, all of Sacramento, men of daring and enterprise, though not of large fortunes, were bold enough to harness themselves to the accomplishment of this great work. At this time the project was one of stupendous dimensions. It challenged the best efforts of the most courageous men. It required nerve of the stoutest kind. Its cost was estimated into millions, that only governments could afford to expend. As an engineering experiment, it challenged the boldest confidence. As a business enterprise, it was looked upon as one of doubtful success. The frontier of civilization was then the western side of the valley of the Mississippi. Between this fringe of western pioneers and California's adventurers, and between the settled farm-lands and the occupied ranchos, there stretched a great wilderness of desolation. The Rocky Mountains reached down with their eastern and western slopes as grazing grounds for the wild herds. In the Sierra, the miner and the grizzly bear contended for supremacy. Nevada had not disclosed her silver wealth, nor Colorado her golden treasures. The city of Great Salt Lake was but a rural village. Denver was unoccupied, and along the route of towns, thriving villages, and farm lands, where corn now grows and cattle thrive, there was broad desolation, broken only by the savage Indian and the wild beasts of mountain and plain. These men had the courage to attempt the realization of California's dream. The war came, and the nation demanded the construction of a railroad as a war necessity. Statesmen saw in the coming time the prudence of binding the Union together with bands of iron. The political economist considered the necessity of a railroad for the future use of the Government in the transportation of its troops, its munitions of war, and its mails. The Government, for reasons of its own, desired this work to be done. California wanted it. Mr. Stanford, the two Crockers, and Messrs. Hopkins and Huntington undertook to accomplish the work, and entered upon the enterprise. To obtain the charter was an easy task. It was had for the asking. To obtain the money necessary to build it, these parties asked certain advances by those municipal governments in California whose interests were to be promoted, and asked of the General Government a loan of its credit and a gift of certain lands along the line of the road whose values would be advanced by its construction; and in consideration thereof agreed to build a railroad, to carry mails, and transport troops and munitions of war. All this was a matter of contract. It was a bargain between the Government and individuals. The individuals were to build a railroad, much needed for public convenience, and the Government, under certain conditions, was to issue its bonds, which were to be security upon the road when built. These were to be issued only in sections as the road was built, the corporation to pay the principal of the bonds at maturity with interest. This contract was entered into fairly, openly, and understandingly by the Congress of the United States, with responsible citizens who had the brains, the resolution, and the nerve to perform what they agreed to perform. The road has been built. All the contracts and obligations have been kept by the builders. The Government of the United States has never advanced, expended, laid out, or in any manner lost, one single dollar in this great national enterprise. It has advanced and risked its credit by the issue of some twenty-seven millions of dollars in Government bonds, and not one cent of interest upon this vast sum of money has ever been in default. For the full payment of both principal and interest the Government has ample security. These bonds, when the Government first began to issue them, were at a very low price. The first bonds were sold at forty cents on the dollar, netting the railroad builders here thirty-eight cents in gold coin. As the railroad progressed, and the war was drawing to a conclusion, the price of bonds advanced, till the last issue was quoted as salable at ninety cents on the dollar. The average cost realized by the corporate builders of the Central Pacific Railroad was seventy cents on the dollar. For these bonds so used and sold the company obtained money to go on with the work. The bonds bear six per cent. interest per annum. This interest is now being paid by the company, and is equivalent to eight per cent. per annum upon one of the largest advances ever made by a government to an individual firm for the accomplishment of a public work. We know of no other instance in the financial history of any government in modern times, where so large a credit given to individuals has been so honorably protected and so promptly and conscientiously met. In the dealings between the corporation and the Government there have been differences of opinion, and there have been lawsuits; but whenever an adjudication has been had, and a decree rendered by a judicial tribunal, the company has yielded to the decision, and performed all the requirements of the judgment of the court. It was Government credit, undoubtedly, that made it possible for these men to successfully accomplish so great a work; but this credit was obtained at a tremendous cost. The bonds sold for an average of seventy cents on the dollar, and the company is now paying eight per cent. per annum for the money thus obtained, and will continue to do this until the thirty years shall have expired. Money is now worth less than four per cent. per annum for large amounts with Government guaranty. This road was completed more than six years in advance of the time contracted for, and it has answered the full expectations of the wise and prudent statesmen who, in a time of war, had the courage to provide for the future a great national highway.

In declaring that the railroad corporation has complied with all its agreements entered into with the Government, we are not unmindful of the controversy and litigation over the Thurman Bill. This matter is concluded; but is still the subject of misrepresentation by journals and individuals who have ulterior objects to accomplish by such falsifications. An editorial in the Chronicle of September 27th, criticising the "Railroad Tax Decision," says, in speaking of the Central Pacific Railroad Company: "They will claim that under the Thurman Act the Federal Government has an interest in their gross receipts, and that therefore the State can not tax them—i. e., the gross receipts. It is true they have not observed the Thurman Act, but they will set up 'the objection all the same.'" There frequently appears in the daily press a statement of similar effect to this, so that it is probably believed by nearly all but the writers of the editorials themselves. If they know anything about the act in question, or its history, they must know that it is not true that the Thurman Act has not been observed by the railroad companies. It has been, and is, observed promptly, and to the letter. By the original acts of Congress, aiding the construction of the Pacific railroads with a loan of United States bonds, it was agreed that the bonds and interest should be repaid by the annual payment of five per cent. of the net earnings of the road, and one-half of the amount received for transportation of United States mails, troops, and property. By the Thurman Act, of May 7, 1878, (20 Stat., 56,) the railroad companies were required to pay twenty-five per cent. of their net earnings into the United States treasury, thus arbitrarily changing the terms of the contract, and requiring the payment of a debt before it became due. Upon the trial of the constitutionality of the act three judges dissented from the finding of the court. The change made by the Government, violating the terms of its agreement with the railroads, was a part of the Granger movement of the time against railroads. The terms of the Thurman Act are commented upon by Mr. Justice Strong in his dissenting opinion, as follows: "No one can deny that they materially change the contract of loan and borrowing previously existing between the Government and the railroad companies, and change it at 'the will of the creditor alone. Nor can it be denied that they impose upon the debtors new and onerous burdens that they never agreed to assume.'" Such is the Thurman Act in its nature. It was, however, decided to be in harmony with the constitution, and has since been executed to the letter. The annual report for 1881, to the Secretary of the Interior, signed by Joseph K. McCammon, United States Commissioner of Railroads, says (p. 7): "The general books of the Central Pacific Railroad Company in San Francisco, California, have been examined and compared with statements sent to this office. . . . It is gratifying to state that free access has been granted by all these roads to their books and accounts, which are kept in 'good business-like order, and in such form that an expert accountant would find no great difficulty in ascertaining 'the true condition of the financial affairs of the companies.'" On pages 9 and 10 the condition of the accounts between the railroads and the Government, under the Thurman Act, is stated, from which I quote: "The cash payments which have been required from the companies, in addition to the retention of the entire compensation for services, are as follow: Central Pacific, one million two hundred and three thousand one hundred and fourteen dollars and fifty-three cents. . . . The Central Pacific has deposited the above amount of one million two hundred and three thousand one hundred and fourteen dollars and fifty-three cents in the Treasury." This report (the last yet published) is but a statement of the relations existing between the Pacific railroads and the Government, and if examined will show that every obligation due the Government under the Thurman or any other act has been promptly fulfilled. In the annual report of the Central Pacific Railroad for the year 1881, on page 5, the president of the company states that: "The amounts as found due the Government by the United States Commissioner of Railroads, under the various acts of Congress, have all been promptly paid by the company into the United States Treasury." Then follows a statement of the accounts, showing the annual payment for 1881 to have been one million thirty-eight thousand nine hundred and thirty-five dollars and twenty-four cents.

It may not be inappropriate here to observe that we have but little respect for that class of Pacific statesmen who were intent upon so interpreting the contract, and so legislating, that the burden of paying this debt should have been thrown upon this generation. We can not appreciate the motive of Pacific Coast men who complain that Government should have aided this enterprise. Men from Maine or Florida might criticise congressional legislation in aid of the construction of the road; but most assuredly such carping was not appropriate to a Californian. It indicates a narrow and jealous mind. We now consider the fact that San Francisco, having the opportunity, and having agreed to subscribe six hundred thousand dollars to the stock, repudiated the contract; and, having fought the proposition in law, compromised by paying four hundred thousand dollars, which only a part went to the Central Pacific, and this four hundred thousand dollars San Francisco received, in the advance of its property, its income.

wealth, and its increased population, the value of a hundred millions of dollars. Four hundred thousand dollars would not construct one-tenth part of the edifices built by railroad men to adorn our city. It would not pay a fraction of the cost of grading and filling the land around the Mission slough. Whatever complaints other localities and other communities have to make against the Central and Southern Pacific railroad corporations, the city and citizens of San Francisco have none. As the terminal point of the roads, it has been largely benefited. If other places have been avoided by the road builder, all roads have led to San Francisco, and every mile of main and branch has contributed to our prosperity and growth. If there has been discrimination on freight or passengers, it has been in our favor. If wrongs have been done to other localities, they have been done in our interest. If the State of Nevada, or the merchants of Reno, have just cause of complaint, the State of California and the merchants of San Francisco have no such cause. Those peddlers of merchandise, those journalists, politicians, and grumblers, who have aired their complaints on the rostrum or in the newspaper, each and every one of them, without exception, have been controlled by some personal and selfish motive. That these men have crawled to the top, and made their clamor seem to be the public voice, is not creditable to a city that owes so much as does San Francisco to its railroad builders. The Goat Island scare illustrates to what absurd extremes a vicious press and unprincipled demagogues may lead a brainless mob. This island, lying within our jurisdiction, in easy access to our water front, midway between San Francisco and Oakland, in the very highway of commerce, at the entrance of our Golden Gate, was sought by the railroad corporation for the point of the receipt and distribution of their business. They would have spent millions of money, and anchored the commerce of ocean and continent in the very heart of our city. It was defeated through a passionate and vindictive opposition that now, in looking back upon, we find difficult to explain. Railroad business has gone to an inconvenient suburb, to which every merchant must pay for hauling his goods. The wheat trade, with its vast warehousing accommodations, has gone to Port Costa, Oakland, Vallejo, and elsewhere, while San Francisco has lost an expenditure of millions within its jurisdiction, and allowed a magnificent depot on made-land to be erected and become taxable at Oakland. Then the railroad asked that upon its own lands in Mission Bay it be allowed to so arrange the streets that it could fill them with solid earth, and upon this created land build their shops, depots, and warehouses. After a bill had passed the Legislature allowing this indispensable change, Governor Irwin, in obedience to that senseless clamor that demagogues never fail to listen to, and in fear of that vote of which all small politicians stand in awe, vetoed the bill, and to-day the Mission Bay is a useless, unsightly, and stinking pond within our city limits, where there might be solid land, where trains could be made up, warehouses built, and business be done, if it were not for the prejudice and the senseless, blind, and passionate opposition that is the growth of the teachings of such men as John T. Doyle, such journals as the Examiner and Chronicle, and such political demagogues as Estee, Sumner, and Foote. Placer and Sacramento counties gave certain donations in aid of the road—not donations, but subscriptions to the stock of the company. These counties have sold their stock, made money by the transaction, and pocketed a profit. Their taxable wealth has been largely increased. The great stagnant puddle in Sacramento, where frogs and Chinese washermen flourished, has been filled. An elegant depot has been constructed, great workshops erected, two thousand mechanics kept busy, and yet there are Placerville-ians and villains in Sacramento who still grumble and find fault with the only element of life that flows through their else dead channels of business. The State paid interest for twenty years on $1,500,000, but all this argument of favors rendered, gifts made, and subsidies given is answered by this statement: In no one single year, since the completion of the road, has the company, and the roads under its control, paid in taxes a less sum than all the aids it received by donations from counties and the State. The road has been of incalculable benefit to the State. It has saved millions annually to the General Government. It has added to the wealth, population, prosperity, and comfort of our State and all its parts. It has encouraged and drawn to our port the commerce of India, of the Pacific Isles, the Australian continent, and the Mexican and South American coasts. The roads are well and cheaply constructed. They are ably administered. There is no system of roads of equal length upon this continent that is more economically managed, or where passengers and freight are more comfortably, safely, and cheaply transported. Upon the same length of roads in New England freight and passengers are not more cheaply carried. The road was built under most adverse conditions. When the time is considered, and the character of the country across which these roads are built, with its mountains and deserts, the construction seems a miracle of enterprising achievement. Sacramento, as the base of construction, was away from supplies. Railroad material was to be brought around the Horn, or, as in some instances, at great expense, across the isthmus. Two locomotives, coming by way of Panama, cost the company $165,000. They are now built at Sacramento at a cost of $8,000 each. Three hundred miles of iron was brought across the Isthmus at four cents per pound freight. It cost one hundred and twenty dollars a ton to deliver, and then it was pushed to the front. Such freights now cost fifteen dollars per ton. When the road was completed it had a bonded debt of some $30,000,000, and a floating debt of nearly $10,000,000. It was a great and daring work, splendidly pushed, and successfully accomplished. It is a monument to the enterprise, courage, and genius of its promoters. It is the pioneer of other roads. It was begun under difficulties, when railroad millions had not become familiar words, and when railroads could not command unlimited credit. The Government aided with its credit, and the corporation has paid its debt, protected its credit, lived up to its contracts, and has honorably and honestly fulfilled all its obligations. It has paid its taxes to the extent of $5,970,000 58. It is still prosecuting its work in the construction of other roads—the Southern Pacific Railroad to the Gulf of Mexico, the road east from Mojave, and the road north to Eureka. With such a record in the past, with its busy present, and with its promising future, how contemptible and mean seem this small, snarling band of grumbling malcontents, who are hissing in stump speech and printed column at the only live enterprise that is now at work upon our coast. Mr. John T. Doyle rides at ease over the road from country-seat to business office, and writes interminable diatribes against an institution that makes his otium cum dignitate with vine and fig-tree possible. Estee has taken up the hobby of opposition to the railroads, whose servant he has formerly been. On his part it is calculating, dishonest, and inconsistent demagogism. And from out the political grass on all sides we hear the chirp, rattle, and snap of the small snakes who hope to attain the distinction of undeserved notice by the strength of their vociferation against railroads—not railroads in general—not Peter Donahue's railroad, belonging to a Democrat and an Irishman—but the Central and Pacific roads, belonging to native-born Americans and Republicans.

"These men make too much money," says this organized band of political malcontents and journalistic frauds. The appeal is to the selfish, that, because they make money, they should reduce fares and freights. We do not think they are making too much money, nor would we be mean enough to institute this inquiry so long as all their profits are being expended in the construction of other roads, all of which are necessary to the system of which San Francisco is happily the terminus and centre. The "American Annual Cyclopaedia," of 1879, says: "The gross earnings of the Central Pacific in 1877 were $16,000,000; operating expenses, $7,444,418; other expenses, such as interest, taxes, miscellaneous, and legal expenses, discount on currency, leased railroads, etc., $7,288,186," leaving an amount too small to declare dividends, and this was subject to the still further deduction of $1,200,000 under the Thurman act. This is the showing of 1877, when no dividends were paid. For the year 1881, as per the annual report of the company, the operating expenses were nearly $14,000,000; interest, $3,500,000; taxes, general and legal expenses, engineering, land department, etc., amounted to nearly a million more; dividends $3,556,530, leaving a balance of $1,337,227—not a very large surplus of earnings upon a property worth $150,000,000, and which has a funded debt of $54,276,500, a floating debt of nearly $5,000,000, and owes the government $27,855,680. These amounts seem large to editors, attorneys, importers of Milwaukee beer, machine politicians, and mendicants in search of office in which to earn their daily bread and hourly cocktails. That these railroads pay their taxes upon all their property assessed by the officials in which their property is located, is admitted. It has an assessed value of $36,000,000 upon which they pay, and upon which the corporations have paid in round numbers, $6,000,000. The only part of their property upon which they have refused to pay, and properly refused, and which refusal is sustained by the United States courts—Judges Field and Sawyer sitting—is the franchise, the roadway, the rails and rolling-stock, assessed by an illegal State Board for an excessive amount—a board which refused a deduction for mortgages as is by the law accredited to all property in like condition. When this vicious clamor shall cease, and reason resume its sway; when demagogues shall have been driven to the obscurity whence they emerged; when the small-minded politician shall find it unprofitable to agitate against railroads; when the business men of the community shall be permitted to make business arrangements on business principles between themselves and the common carriers; when the courts and the law shall be the tribunals to which are referred all controversies between merchants and railroad men; when the roads shall be permitted to withdraw from politics, and be free from blackmailers and lobbyists—the sooner will all disputes and disagreements be reconciled and settled upon a basis mutually advantageous to railroads and to the communities in which they are doing business.

Autumn: The rain has cleared the heavens. The hills are sharply defined and realistic. The harvest moon appeared last month, according to tradition. The roads are now clean and tolerably smooth. The country is more enjoyable in October than in June. The early rains have started the young grass. The meadows and lowland pastures are already green. The early rains have made October a beautiful month. Autumn in the forest is better than spring. Then there is a suggestion of abounding life. There are rank growths. There is a riot of nature. In the autumn there is an unbroken serenity. The growth of the year is accomplished. The watering-places are deserted, except by a few who remain behind. All the country is still and restful.—Extracts from the Autumn Editorial of the San Francisco Evening Bulletin for October 17, 1882.

It will surprise many Englishmen, says the London Figaro, to learn that during the past twelve months American newspapers were received in this country per post at the average rate of rather more than twenty-eight thousand a day. Seeing how seldom an American paper is seen out of London, the fact that England absorbs ten millions or so annually seems well nigh incredible.

A Calcutta gentleman, Babu Lok Nath Ghose, has conceived the idea of compiling a "Peerage and Landed Gentry" for India. He proposes to give the genealogy and family history of all the native chiefs, great and small, and also some account of the many native gentlemen upon whom the honorific distinctions have been conferred by the British Government.

"Moody in Paris!" exclaims the Christian Intelligencer—"The Paris of Clovis, and Louis Quatorze, and Napoleon III.; of Abelard, and Voltaire, and Eugene Sue; of Mirabeau, and Philip Egalité, and the Commune; of Richelieu, and Coligny, and McAll; of the Bastille, the barricades, and the Bois de Boulogne."

Victor de Lesseps, son of his father, tells of this performance of his father: "But my august father was not wanting to the occasion. He had round his neck a false collar of English make. He did not hesitate for a moment. He tore it off, and danced on it. This was his response to the insolence of the invader."

LITERARY NOTES.

A lately issued work is entitled "Extracts from the Writings of Thackeray." The contents of this volume have been chosen with great care, and consist chiefly of philosophical and reflective passages, including some few poems. Published by J. B. Lippincott & Co., Philadelphia; for sale by Joseph A. Hofmann, 208 Montgomery Street; price, $1.75.

"What is Bright's Disease?" is by Seth Pancoast, M. D., of Philadelphia. The author discusses the question of the curability of this dread evil, and comes to the conclusion that it may be cured, even after the kidneys are seriously disorganized, provided the inflammation is removed, and the energy of the organic nervous system reestablished. Published and for sale by the author.

"The Cleverdale Mystery" has attracted considerable attention in the East. It is very timely, considering the present crisis in New York. It discusses the political and infamous system of "bossism," and, while dealing with no recognizable party, shows up the corruption and darker sides of the matter. Woven in between is an agreeable love story, which serves to add to the interest. It is written by W. A. Wilkins, editor of the Whitehall (N. Y.) Times, who is said to have had an extended experience in the scenes which he describes. Published by Ford, Howard, & Hulbert, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

Les Recreations Philologiques, for October first, has arrived. It contains among other articles notes on the translation of the "Vicar of Wakefield," and "Alice in Wonderland," besides the explanation of a number of French idioms and their relationship to corresponding English phrases. Edited by Dr. L. Sauveur, 33 North Main Street, New York; price, $2 per year.—Le Français for October is at hand, and contains among other articles "L'Education des Femmes au XVIIe Siècle," by Mademoiselle De Scudéry, and the usual discussion of French words and phrases. The translation of "Marjory Daw" is still continued. Edited by Jules Lévy, 17 Story Street, Cambridge, Mass.; price, $1.50 for nine months.

Juvenile readers never seem to tire of reading about the "Bodley Children," concerning whom Horace E. Scudder has already written five large volumes. But now a new series of delights is opened to them in "The Bodley Grandchildren," the first volume of which is just out, entitled "Their Journey Through Holland." The Bodleys are supposed to have grown up and to have children of their own. After devoting some time to the study of their ancestry in New York, they decide to take the children to Holland, and there let them study the habits and haunts of their Dutch forefathers in connection with American history. This they do, and the book describes their experience. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.50.

"The San Francisco Argonaut," says the Critic, "challenges our statement 'that most of Mr. Howell's titles are taken from Shakespeare.' 'Give us some examples,' it says. As it is the province of the Critic to enlighten the unilluminated, and as Shakespeare's plays and the Cowden-Clarke Concordance are presumably inaccessible to the Argonaut, we willingly grant its request." And then the Critic kindly tells us that "The Undiscovered Country" is from "Hamlet," "A Foregone Conclusion" is from "Othello," and "A Modern Instance" is from "As You Like It." All of this, strange as it may seem, we know. What we "challenged" was the Critic's statement that "most of Mr. Howell's titles are from Shakespeare." This we doubted, and asked in a humble—a Pacific Coast manner, so to speak—for examples. We have received them. But still we are not convinced that most of Mr. Howell's titles are from Shakespeare, for here is a list of his works: "Venetian Life," "Italian Journeys," "A Fearful Responsibility," "Suburban Sketches," "Their Wedding Journey," "Dr. Breen's Practice," "A Chance Acquaintance," "The Lady of the Aroostook," "Poems," "Out of the Question," "The Parlor Car," "Choice Autobiography," "A Foregone Conclusion," "The Undiscovered Country," and "A Modern Instance." They foot up fifteen, and only the last three are from Shakespeare. As for "Out of the Question" being taken from Shakespeare, it might with as much reason be said to be taken from anywhere else—from an old almanac or from the Critic, for instance.

Announcements: A new novel by Miss Laffan, authoress of "Hogan, M. P.," is shortly to appear, and is looked forward to with considerable interest in Ireland, where she is regarded now as filling the place Lady Morgan once held—of national novelist.—The new story which the author of "Cape Cod Folks" is about to publish deals with life in a New England village, and her characters do not this time wear real names.—Mr. Aldrich's novels have been translated into French, German, Dutch, and Swedish; yet he has never got a penny for them.—Mr. Conway says, "except a small sum from London, and a substantial one from Tauchnitz."—The book on Corea which Mr. Griffis has written, and the Scribners are about to publish, does for that little known country, it is said, what Wallace's work does for Russia. It is exhaustive, as far as it is now possible to be. It gives the latest particulars in regard to Corean life, wars, and national affairs, having been brought down to include the recent events.—Mr. Julian Hawthorne intends, it is reported, to present for public inspection photographed pages of the forthcoming romance which it has been declared is not his father's work.—Mrs. Oliphant's loving and poetic sketch of the wanderings of a "Little Pilgrim" after death is to be published in book form by Roberts Brothers. Mrs. Oliphant, it is well known abroad, is a strong believer in the doctrines of Spiritualism, as are many English men and women distinguished for rank or for literary service. Not the least notable are Queen Victoria and Mr. Tennyson.

Miscellany: The scene of Mr. Howell's story, "A Modern Instance," is in Fryeburg, Maine, the old town in which Daniel Webster once taught school for three hundred and fifty dollars a year.—The Academy notices that the reprints by Messrs. Harper of the "English Men of Letters," cost twelve and a half cents more than the English originals.—Mr. W. M. Laffan has gone to live in London as the literary representative of the Harpers. Mr. Laffan is the brother of Miss May Laffan, the clever author of "Hogan, M. P.," and "The Honorable Miss Ferrard"—novels which give a clearer idea of Irish life and character than can be found elsewhere.—The late Doctor Pusey knew little of any modern literature, which, as he used to say, was after his time. With Tennyson and the various late schools of poetry which flourished during the last generation, he was almost, if not wholly, unacquainted. To Sir Walter Scott he remained faithful to the last, and knew him as Lamb knew Shakespeare.—The fact that "Lorna Doone," Mr. Blackmore's most popular novel, is to be honored with an édition de luxe (making the twenty-first edition published) serves to recall to the editor of the London Figaro "the circumstance that the MS. of the tale in question was sent to, and rejected by, several publishers (the number was four, I think) before it at last found an appreciative reader in Mr. Sampson Low Jr." He liked the story much, and published it with readiness; but it looked for a long time as though his less appreciative brethren had been well advised in their refusal of "Lorna"; for it is an admitted fact that in its three-volume form the novel was a loss. This, in many instances, would have been the end of it; but Messrs. Low resolved to give it another trial, and so published a six-shilling edition. The result we all know. Slowly but surely the novel was read and talked of, and now its twenty-first edition is to assume the form of a gorgeous volume, the illustrations of which are taken from water-colors painted and presented to the author by a devoted literary admirer. Mr. Blackmore, by the way, when at home, is a market-gardener as well as a novelist, and is passionately devoted to the practical operations pertaining to the former calling. If rumor is correct, Mr. Blackmore meditates a long visit to the neighborhood of Pembroke, it being his intention to make that picturesque and interesting locality the scene of a coming novel. And it is always his practice, I may add, before writing a story, to acquaint himself by a stay, extending over many months if necessary, in the neighborhood in which he lays the scenes of his story.

OBSCURE INTIMATIONS.

"Lilian."—So you want to know "the name of the young gentleman whose poem to 'L. K.' was mentioned in last week's 'Obscure Intimations,' do you? Come now, Lilian, it wouldn't be a fair shake, now you know it wouldn't. We don't mind telling you, however, that it was addressed to a Lulu, and not to a Lilian. Perhaps he is a giddy thing, and is running two rackets, but still we wouldn't give anybody away—not even a poet. N. B.—We have confiscated your stamp.

"To the Comet of 1882," L.—Your lines are not as backneyed as Shakespeare's. But then that is the only merit they have. And what do you want a comet to speak for? Why is its "silence painful to the world"? A comet can't speak. According to Webster it is "a hairy star, moving in an eccentric orbit." Were it to begin to speak, it would be pushing eccentricity to the verge of madness.

"H." Tombstone, Arizona.—That story about the Lord's Prayer and "now I lay me," may be new in Tombstone, son, but it has been heard elsewhere. It was dug up out of the sub-carboniferous stratum of the Paleozoic age. If you could send us something from the Aztec, now, there would be some chance for it. People would have forgotten it.

"F. K. U."—We think an article of the kind you indicate would be extremely interesting. We would be pleased to publish it.

"On Michael Angelo's Statue, etc."—Accepted. Will shortly appear.

"Gus," Ukiah—"What I Know About Girls." An unexpected pressure of ads. on our columns prevents us from printing your production in its perfection. We give a few excerpts however:

What I Know About Girls: Girls are beautiful creatures. There are all sorts of girls. Some thick, some thin, and some neither thick nor thin. Girls and sofas are associated in the minds of most men with their happiest hours. Often you will see even staid old married men gaze on the sofa and fall into a reverie, and how pleasant it is then to see the smiles come and go on their faces, as from the dim chambers of their brains those pleasant memories come trooping back to them. Some girls, so delicate that they can not wash dishes, will dance all night and be quite fresh in the morning, and then you will see dear creatures, who are like a fiddle—they never sound sweet except with a beau. The girl of to-day does not blush much. The fact is that her complexion has been buried long ago, and when a blush finds its way to the surface, why is it like the second filling of the tea-pot? Because it's very weak.

This is very good. But, Gus, why is your MS. like a girl's blush? Ah, you sly rascal. We knew you'd guess it.

The individual who sent us a copy of Mrs. Mullock's poem, "Alma River," requesting its publication, will find it in the "Old Favorites."

"S. S."—If you have heard that we "make it a rule to decline all work from amateurs," you have not heard aright. Anything we consider good, (and available in other respects,) we accept, regardless of the writer's experience. It is true that editors are frequently biased by extrinsic considerations. If MS. is so evidently from an amateur that it is written on both sides of the paper with a stubby lead-pencil, or on the pasty side of a poster with a pointed stick, an editor sometimes feels a slight prejudice against the MS. and a strong one against the author. It is to be done up in a tight roll so that it has to be flattened out by a sad-eyed editor sitting thereupon, he sometimes sits upon the sender. But never mind, S. S. We were all amateurs once. Horace Greeley was. So were we.

The following note has been sent us:

EDITORS ARGONAUT: You would confer a favor on many of your numerous readers by publishing the text of the letter sent by Pope Pius IX. to Cardinal McCloskey, some three years ago, in which the head of the Roman church advocated the abolition of public schools in the United States. SAN FRANCISCO, October 17, 1882. T. P.

Does any one of our readers possess a copy of the document in question?

The publishers, Messrs. J. K. Gill & Co., Portland, Or., have sent us a copy of their "English-Chinook and Chinook-English Dictionary," for which they will please accept our thanks. It has been referred for review to that member of the staff who has made a study of the Chinook language and literature. He is now engaged in translating that grand epic beginning:

"Klāt-a-wa me-si-ka Kó-pa le-bál o-coke ten-as-po-lak-ly?"

"Not-wake o-coke ten-as-po-lak-ly."

"Klosbe ten-as-po-lak-ly."

"A Subscriber" writes as follows:

Will you print, or can you give me the words of a poem by Charles Dickens. I can only give the first line:

"When the lessons and tasks are all ended."

If you will print this among your "Old Favorites" you will greatly oblige me.—P. S.—What has become of Zulano? Is he going to die because somebody complained at his sneering? Let us hear from him again, and often.

The poem you ask for is called "The Children."

We have printed it elsewhere in this number. It is not by Charles Dickens, but by Charles M. Dickinson.

It is our impression that Dickens wrote but one poem—"The Ivy Green."—Zulano will probably reappear when we have more space to spare. Up to the election we shall be a little pressed by purely political matters. After that we shall have room for more love-stories, more weak poetry, more poor jokes, and more Zulano.

The only surviving daughter of the famous Emperor Souloque will arrive in Paris very shortly, says London Times. She calls herself simply Madame Lubin, having married a Frenchman on whom Souloque, gracefully bestowed the title of Duc de Pétitionville, but who was wise enough to keep to his own name of Lubin. When Souloque reigned as Emperor of Otatibi, under his official name of Faustin I., about the year 1832, he surrounded himself with a galaxy of peers of his own making, whose titles seemed to have been taken from some Drury Lane pantomime. There were the Dukes of Lemonade and of Marmalade, Count Number Two, the Prince of Sweetbeats, etc. Speaking of Souloque, he wisied one day for some ornamental plates to adorn the bushes of the grenadiers of his body guard, and a too facetious French dealer sent him a whole consignment of these head-dresses decorated with the labels taken from disused boxes of preserves; so that when Souloque proudly passed his troops in review before a stranger, the new-comer read, with intense amusement, on the bearskin caps, the following inscriptions: "Sardines, X— & Co.," "preserved ginger," "first-rate lobster!"

DRAMA.

What can they have been doing to "Van, the Virginian," which, when it came to town before, was such a cleverly constructed and interesting play? The new dénouement is more satisfactory, but a lot of un-welcome changes have been made, difficult to locate unless one be thoroughly familiar with the play as it stood, but felt indefinitely by one who has once enjoyed it, throughout the entire performance.

Every one knows the familiar newspaper tale of the traveler going home from the war, who stops at a wayside forge to have his horse shod, and recognizes in the blacksmith's wife, as she gives him a glass of water, his own wife, to whose welcoming arms he has been hastening. Bartley Campbell constructed a very pretty play out of so much material. The newspaper left him at the cardinal situation of the play with a new Enoch Arden upon his hands, to do with him as he liked. It would never have done to leave him with a great heart in his bosom, like Enoch's, the brave fisherman, who,

"the dead man come to life, beheld
His wife his wife no more, and saw the babe—
Hers, yet not his—upon the father's knee,
And all the warmth, and peace, and happiness,
And his own children tall and beautiful;
And him, that other reigning in his place,
Lord of his rights and of his children's love.
Then he—though Miriam Lane had told him all—
Because things seen are mightier than things heard,
Staggered, and shook, holding the branch, and feared
To send abroad a shrill and terrible cry.
Which, in one moment, like the blast of doom,
Would shatter all the happiness of the hearth."

So he went out upon the waste and fell upon his knees, and prayed for heaven to give him strength "not to tell her, never to let her know."

A man is very apt to act that way in a poem, but in hard prose he is more likely to be like Mr. Richard Calvert, the returning husband in Mr. Bartley Campbell's play. Mr. Bartley Campbell equipped Mr. Calvert with a singularly unlovely disposition, of which a snarling, ugly temper is the chief component part. The actor who played the rôle this week saw fit to add to these charms a make-up as extraordinary as it was unbecoming. He first stained himself a deep Pompeian red. Pompeian red is a very correct color in these decorative days, either upon the walls of a room or the roof of a house, but as it has not yet come in in complexions, the effect may be said to have been a trifle bizarre. His hirsute adornments were of dense Egyptian blackness, and consisted of a painfully defined rim of tufted beard, and a lowering bang of Puie thickness. A pair of pale rolling eyes and a hoarse voice contributed to the unexampled ferocity of his appearance, and when he loomed upon the peaceful scene the audience seemed to be in a state of bazy uncertainty as to whether he were a very funny had man, or a very heavy villain, and only cut the Gordian knot by alternating and taking him now one way and now the other, as the spirit moved them. This spirit of facetiousness in the air had the effect to somewhat dampen the pathos of Van, the Virginian. If memory serve, there is a moment in the old play when the sympathy turns to Calvert; when he tells of how he languished in the Southern prison for his northern home and for his waiting wife, it did cross the mind of the audience that the man had some rights; but, in the new version, he is simply a black fiend whose intrusion every one resents, and whom every one wishes well out of the way. Artistically, this is a mistake. It is the nicely balanced difficulty which excites interest to its highest tension. Who ever knows how to choose between Enoch Arden and Philip Ray? For when Philip "hears the lie-laden hunger in his heart," one wishes that he could have had his Annie; and when the strong, heroic soul of Enoch keeps him silent, one almost wishes that Philip might have a little shipwreck of his own. But in Van, every one is for Van. The big, brave, curly fellow wins all hearts, partly because the play is written that way, and partly because Frank Mayo is the only actor in his troupe. And yet he suffers from his own bad judgment in surrounding himself with such a group of hopeless incapables. Everything is awry, except, perhaps, pretty Miss Clancy, who plays Kate Vernon infinitely better than she does Eleanor Vaughn. In point of fact, it must be that she plays the first act with a shade too much feeling. Her woe over the death of Richard Calvert seems to have been heavily overdone when that individual stalks upon the scene after his resurrection. A Virginia walk-around would have been a fitter expression of feeling under the circumstances, but as it would have been neither dramatic nor conventional, perhaps it was as well it was left out.

Mrs. Calvert-Vernon's rhetorical flourishes must have been rather petrifying to both her husbands; for, whether in the forge, the tavern, or in that amorous ménage wherein her husband attempts to brain her with a gilt reception-chair, she expresses herself with a finished elegance and completeness of speech which would do credit to the principal of a seminary, while neither of her encumbrances is distinguished for well-rounded periods.

Van is the rough, tender, honest hero, whom one always expects of Frank Mayo, and always finds; and Kate is a nice little woman to sit upon a man's hearthstone and make him happy, with perhaps an exaggerated sense of duty in a country where there is a convenient Indiana, but a very proper amount of spirit when her supercilious husband begins to reduce her to proper submission with the parlor furniture. But for the rest of the troupe, where can they have been burrowed from? Even the child is uninteresting, and a good three years older than she ought to be; for people always will go into a sort of primitive mathematics in a theatre when they are boldly challenged with such perplexities. And, according to all the rules of arithmetic, an investigating group of us agreed that this child antedated the Van episode by three years.

It is well to wonder how old Father Calvert maintained himself; for he stood about in speculative attire, turning the progress of scenes in which he was interested, with a long whip in his hand, and did not remove his hat even in the gorgeous atmosphere of the Calvert drawing-room, where gilt reception-chairs and bronzes abounded. He looked like a cattle-drover; but cattle-drovers do not keep mansions full of gilt chairs, and the gilt chairs in such a play should be accounted for. The unities of the drama demand it.

As a side issue, a pair of ingenious young lovers have been thrown in. As an evidence that they are not strictly amateurs, they wear blonde wigs. All ingenious stage-lovers take refuge under a blonde wig. The importance which this article of wear has assumed upon the stage can not be over-estimated. A manager might as well try to run his theatre without gas, as without a proper supply of blonde hair. It is the beautifier of the plain, the rejuvenator of the aged and wrinkled, the sign manual of comedy, the necessity of burlesque, the regalia of the ingénue.

Charles Fechter wore it because Hamlet was a Dane; the first burlesquers, because they played Ixion, and the gods and goddesses of high Olympus were fair of skin and yellow of hair, according to the Greek mythology; Lady Audley wore it because a dozen years ago the blonde female villain was a daring innovation.

These lesser people must wear it because, so far as one can see, it is the one and only step in their profession which they have learned.

It is only when people are high up the ladder that they dare to disdain it, for Modjeska played Juliet, when she was here, in two long dark braids of her own hair; and she was almost passé then, for she had a great son, sixteen years of age, always with her, of whom she was very proud and fond. Yet who ever saw a lovelier Juliet, excepting always the radiant, peerless Neilson, who was the "one entire and perfect chrysolite" in this one part at least.

To return to my ingenious lovers, who had a very strawy effect when they put their heads together. They were backed by yet another pair, for love-making seemed to go through Van's household like a pleasant contagion—if such things be. I have a wild, weird idea that comedy was the idea these two also intended to convey. Mr. Gingle's comedy consisted in an abbreviated pair of trousers, a nose frescoed with Vesuvian red, and an airiness of manner which seemed the result of a metaphysical force-pump. The chubby little soubrette has nothing to recommend her but a pair of bright eyes and a steadfast determination to do the very best she knows how.

But, alas, in the theatre this will not go for much until she does know how. In fact, this pretty play, what between injudicious revision and indifferent acting, has been severely mangled. An idyl, the bills call it, and it is a simple home-spun story; a play strong in dramatic construction they promised it, and it has been weakened; a great cast, and it was so small it was downright funny; magnificent scenery, and we have a forge and a homely little parlor; wondrous realistic effects, a lot of white cotton on the wheels leaning up against the smithy. The hills are less elaborate in their promise for next week, and there will, perhaps, by consequence, be more fulfillment, for they say nothing more than that we are to have the romantic drama, "The Isle of St. Tropez." It was as a romantic actor that Frank Mayo first became known to fame, but his popularity in his new line, to which a certain magnetism of his own has contributed quite as much as any elaborate art in his acting, will not permit him easily to drift back into his old groove. St. Tropez! The name has a ring of the olden time, when Davy Crockett was unknown, and Raphael, and Claude, and all the brotherhood were familiar heroes. BETSY B.

Boiled Onions, Egg-plant, Sweet Potatoes.
Roast Venison, Currant Jelly Sauce.
Boiled Ham, Lettuce, French Dressing.
Lemon Pie.

Apples, Figs, Peaches, Pears, Oranges, and Grapes.
SWEETBREADS, LARDED AND STEWED.—Take three fine sweetbreads and parboil them for five minutes. The water must be boiling when they are put in. Plunge them immediately into very cold water. Let them lie in this five minutes, wipe them dry, and lay them upon a cool dish until perfectly cold. Lard them closely with strips of salt pork; sew them gently in a cup of thick rich veal gravy, for twenty-five minutes; add the juice of half a lemon, one tablespoonful of mushroom catsup, a small pinch of cayenne pepper, and, if needed, a little salt. Lay the sweetbreads in order on a dish; pour the gravy over them, and garnish with lemon laid in the triangular spaces left between three-cornered bits of fried toast.

A pleasant addition to this dish is force-meat balls of chopped beef, or veal very finely minced, and worked to a paste with lard; boiled yolk of egg, a little crumbed bread, a spoonful or two of butter. Season very highly, work in the yolk of a raw egg, and make into oval balls a little larger than olives. Flour these, and lay on a floured plate, so as not to touch one another; set in a quick oven until they are firm, and hissing hot. Garnish the dish with them instead of sliced lemon, and pour the hot gravy over them and the toast as well as the sweetbreads. Place an outer circle of parsley as a garnish to all.

If fine weather this afternoon, a band will play in the Park, beginning at one o'clock. There have been four of the open-air concerts noticed in the Argonaut of a month ago. The last was given on Wednesday afternoon. It is now proposed to have them twice a week, Wednesday and Saturdays, when the weather permits. The band numbers only twelve instruments, but, for its size, is effective and plays well together. At any rate, it is a good beginning of what ought to become a feature of musical pleasure-giving in this city.

Mr. W. C. Morrow, whose exciting stories, written from time to time for the Argonaut and other periodicals, have created much interest, has in press a novel, entitled "Blood-Money." It deals with a vital social problem, and those who have seen it predict for it great success.

Carl Formes left on Thursday for the East, accompanied by four pupils, whom he intends to introduce to the New York public—Misses Gleason, Mahoney, McLellan, and Greenwood.

SHERIFF'S SALE—EXECUTION.
THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Plaintiff, vs.
JAMES DALY, ET AL., Defendants.
Superior Court.
No. 22,921.
(Late 4th District Court.)
ALIAS EXECUTION.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN
Alias Execution issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the 11th day of October, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, where The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Daly and Michael Hawkins, defendants, on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1879, for the sum of Six Thousand ($6,000.00) Dollars, lawful money of the United States, which amount is entitled to a credit of $2,788.18 made on two former executions, with interest thereon and 6cts, etc., I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the sixteenth day of October, 1882, the day upon which the hereinafter described property was levied upon in the above entitled cause, or which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter described property situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said City and County in the names of James Daly, Michael Hawkins, John O. Kane, and A. J. Noon, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Broadway Street, 95 3-12 feet easterly from Baker Street; thence running westerly along said line of Broadway Street 95 3-12 feet to the easterly line of Baker Street; thence running northerly along said line of Baker Street 136 feet; thence easterly parallel with Broadway Street 61 5-12 feet; and thence southeasterly to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, the 13th day of NOVEMBER, 1882, at 12 o'clock noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the 16th day of October, 1882, the day on which the above property was levied upon, as aforesaid, and which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the above described property, to the highest and best bidder, for lawful money of the United States.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

The Bell.

When the first faint breeze of morning
Through the window softly blows,
And a gem of dew's adorning
Every violet and rose;
When the lily on the lakelet
Flutters like a frightened dove,
And the batter for the casket
Stands beside the kitchen stove,
And the trees their blossoms sprinkle
On the windlet in the dell,
Then how lovely sounds the tinkle
Of the jolly breakfast-bell. —Puck.

Lines to Walt Whitman.

Being a Plea against the Good Gray Poet's Lawless Paces.

Wherefore scorn the tuneful measure
Like a lout,
Drowning Art's melodious pleasure
In a shout?
As the Moenads corymbant
Used to wound
Beauty's eyelids, in their frantic,
Reckless round?
Must not every Muse deny him
For a churl,
Who will hut-ward haste to hie him
From the whirl
Of the rhythmic cadence, speeding
On the dance,
Lads and lasses gayly leading
In its trance?
'Tis not cornu mirum's blaring,
Saturnine,
All their senses is ensnaring!
But—the Nine!

—Sam Ward in the World.

Lines to Sam Ward.

Being a Plea against the Lascivious Playing of a Lute.

Therefore, chant the Lydian measures,
Mi, sol, fa,
Man the monkey always treasures,
La di da,
Rare enough the rash intruding
Of the few,
Swarms the graceful hoop-de-dooden,
Doo-dee-doo,
When the heart its longing chaunteth
On the rack,
Is the one thing that it wanteth
Bric à-brac? —Dramatic Times.

Two Letters.

HIS.

My dear Miss: If you'll only be mine,
You shall have, every spring, a new hat;
And we'll live in the cosiest rooms
To be had in the gorgeous new flat.

HERS.

My dear Sir: I don't want to be yours,
Though, of course, I should like the new hat;
Yet I never could make up my mind
To inhabit a flat with a flat.

Couldn't Take a Joke.

I slyly pulled the pins from Nellie's hair,
One summer day, when she and I together
Sat in her sunny parlor, in the rare,
Sweet influence of our California weather.
Down fell its folds, (like Danae's shower of gold
Whipped into finest gossamer—or, rather,
A sheaf of sunshine loosened from the mold
That held its rich luxuriance in tether.)
Over her lissome form in splendor fell
The silken shower on arm, and neck, and shoulder,
A veil so rare, I hesitate to tell
Its wondrous beauty—I being sole beholder.
In awe I stood a moment, when I saw
What I had done. Then, suddenly grown bolder,
Felt fear of naught, ('twas either peace or war!)
And in my arms proceeded to enfold her.
And she? She lifted arm with rarest grace;
Its fellow-member quickly raised to aid it,
And then, with jeweled fingers—slapped my face,
And said, "You wretch, you've snarled my hair;
Now, braid it!" —Percy Vere.

My Photographs.

Here's number one:
A sweet child's face tanned brown by wind and sun;
Unruly curls, and eyes that flash with fun;
My first love-dream, "the sweetheart" of my youth—
Ah, how I worshiped little winsome Ruth!
Girls grow so fast! I am my father's son,
And step-son of my "number one."

And number two:
Oh, how we loved, and swore by all things blue—
Blue eyes, blue skies—forever to be true!
And did all other foolish things and sweet
Which lovers do—too sacred to repeat.
All that is past; a gentle moneyed Jew
Is owner now of "number two."

And number three:
A vanished summer-time comes back to me;
A country lane, and wood, and trysting-tree.
Fair Jenny Lee, that sunny summer time,
Was one swift spell of sensuous, sumptuous rhyme.
She's known to fame as "Jane Minerva Lee
On Woman's Rights"—my "number three."

And number four:
Ah, let me look upon this face once more!—
The royal, loyal face of "Reine Lenore."
A regal Reine, the loveliest of all queens;
We both were mad when we were in our teens.
She's really huge and happy with Le Gore;
And twins three sets—has "number four."

And number five:
Soft lines and shadings, which at once revive
Dear memories of angel Annie Clive.
Too frail for earth, too pure for mortal love,
Death took her to the better life above.
She ate too many pickles well to thrive,
And so she left me—"number five."

And number six:
Long eyes my wandering mind transfix,
Down to thoughts of Ellen Dix.
Our youthful dreams are o'er;
We're wrecked upon a rocky shore,
That I married Ellen Dix——Harrison Robertson.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY RELIEF OF

Fever and Ague, Intermittent Fever, Chill
Fever, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical or Bilious Fever, etc., and indeed all the affections which arise from malarious, marsh, or miasmatic poisons.

Has been widely used during the last twenty-five years, in the treatment of these distressing diseases, and with such unvarying success that it has gained the reputation of being infallible. The shakes, or chills, once broken by it, do not return, until the disease is contracted again. This has made it an accepted remedy, and trusted specific, for the Fever and Ague of the West, and the Chills and Fever of the South.

Ayer's Ague Cure eradicates the noxious poison from the system, and leaves the patient as well as before the attack.
It thoroughly expels the disease, so that no Liver Complaints, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dysentery, or Debility follow the cure. Indeed, where Disorders of the Liver and Bowels have occurred from Miasmatic Poison, it removes the cause of them, and they disappear. Not only is it an effective cure, but, if taken occasionally by patients exposed to malaria, it will expel the poison and protect them from attack. Travelers and temporary residents in Fever and Ague localities are thus enabled to defy the disease.
The General Debility which is so apt to ensue from continued exposure to Malaria and Ague, has no speedier remedy.

For Liver Complaints, it is an excellent remedy.

mature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French

SAN LEANDRO VILLAGE CARTS

Manufactured by

JACOB PRICE,

...AT THE...

SAN LEANDRO PLOW WORKS

The above cut is a diminished copy of the working drawing from which my two-wheeled Phaetons are built, and is the first of a series that will appear weekly on this page of the Argonaut, illustrating the various styles in which these popular vehicles are made. They are divided primarily into two classes—the Phaetons, illustrated above, and the Piano Boxes, a cut of one of which will appear next week. Peculiarities in the construction of these make the different styles.

The sudden popularity and large demand for these vehicles have been a source of astonishment to those familiar with the facts, and of embarrassment to myself, as I was not prepared to fill orders one-quarter as fast as they came in. (This trouble, however, exists no longer, as I now have a large force of men, who are daily becoming more familiar with their work, enabling me to fill orders promptly.) This (to me) agreeable state of affairs is due doubtless to several features in their construction, peculiar to my carts alone; but it costs too much to recite them all here, so I confine myself to a few:

First—When requested, I give a written guarantee as follows with each vehicle:

I warrant it to be wholly free from that ludicrous and annoying bubbling motion common to other two-wheeled vehicles, which tires the occupant and hurls the horse's back, and to ride as smoothly and easily as the best buggy. I think no other responsible maker dare give such a warranty.

Second—My Patent Leveling Device simply perfects two-wheeled vehicles, and makes my Village Carts, in connection with their admirable system of springs and link-hangings, equal in every important respect to a four-wheeled vehicle. The Leveling Device enables the occupant to level the body in a moment, whether a large or small horse is used, and entirely prevents the seat from tipping backward or forward. This advantage is peculiar to this vehicle alone.

Third—The body is independent of the shafts, and can move up and down freely 10 or 12 inches, remaining level while doing so.

VOL. XI. NO. 18.

SAN FRANCISCO, OCTOBER 28, 1882.

PRICE, TEN CENTS.

A HOUSE OF SPOOKS.

The Strange Ghosts that a Clergyman's Family had to Harbor.

Early in January, 1879, clerical duty called me into the northwest of England. In the midst of a heavy fall of snow my family and I took possession of the official residence provided for us.

It was an old stone house of one story; roofed, in part with ancient stone slabs, in part with modern slates, and standing in a garden bare of trees. A wide passage ran back from the entrance toward the kitchen, where there were two doors; the one leading into the yard, the other into the larder, which was, in fact, a roomy cellar at the foot of a flight of very old stone steps. The five bed-rooms all opened on a square landing.

My wife has the weak habit of going to "tuck up" her boys after they are in bed. One night their voices sounded so angry that she ran up in haste to see what was wrong. On entering their room she found the two elder boys sitting up in bed, hurling injurious and derisive epithets at some person or persons unknown.

"Let me just find out who you are, and you'll get such a jolly good licking as you'll remember," announced Primus, gazing wrathfully at the ceiling.

"Oh, you blooming idiot! I wish I'd your boots. I'd throw 'em at your head. Be off! I'm taking a sight at you," shouted Secundus, nose and fingers up-turned in the same direction.

"Are you both mad?" inquired the stern maternal voice. "It's that fellow, mother, that I told you about. He's on the roof again. Just listen to the row he makes."

"I've heard no row on the roof," remarked mother, with dignified emphasis, and, having performed the usual ceremony, she departed, and came and told me of the whole affair, concluding with: "I wonder if it can be rats."

"Not a doubt of it."

Next morning the boys were full of their nocturnal visitor, and declared that no sooner had the drawing-room door shut than the scrambling and tramping began again.

"Rats, father! Why, we know the sound of them well enough. And they run between the ceiling and the roof. But these are unmistakable boots, with plenty of hobnails in them, too, on the outside of the roof."

"Come out and have a look," was my reply.

There lay the white marble, smooth and glistening in the sunshine, and untrodden by so much as the foot of a tomcat.

The boys looked at each other in amazement. "I don't care," said Secundus, defiantly; "I shall always believe it was a boy."

That evening, just as we were about to begin prayers, we were all startled by some tremendous blows on the cellar door. My wife, thinking there must be some one at the back door, told Stillwater, the maid, to go and see who could be knocking in that outrageous way.

The girl did not stir. After a moment she said: "It's the cellar door."

"Impossible," said her mistress; "go quickly and see what it is."

We heard the unlocking and relocking of the yard door. When the girl came back she said there was no one there. Presently, while I was reading, there came more hard blows, as if struck by a heavy fist; and unmistakably against the cellar door.

When prayers were ended, we went to make acquaintance with our mysterious captive. On opening the door, there was nothing to be seen but the flight of stone steps.

My wife and I exchanged glances which said very plainly, "A sweetheart." So, as the youth appeared shy, I gave him an encouraging invitation to come forth and show himself. No reply.

"I am determined to know who you are," said I, nobly plunging into the abyss, the boys at my heels. Nothing whatever to be seen, and not a corner in which anything bigger than a mouse could hide. The window? It was tightly closed up for the winter, and was, besides, blocked with snow. I was certainly mystified; but I sent the young ones off to bed with an assurance that wind, in an old house, was capable of making the most extraordinary noises; and, in illustration, we all in turn shook the door; not, however, producing anything like the previous effect.

In the course of the night we were awakened by the agreeable sound of "drip, drip, drip" in one corner of the room. My wife put a basin beneath, with a towel in it, to deaden the sound. Presently, "drip, drip" again, just outside the door, which we always kept open.

"There's a sudden thaw, and we're in for it," said I. "Let's go to sleep. It won't hurt the floor-cloth."

But there was no going to sleep, for the drip came faster than ever, until it increased to a little stream. There were no matches in the room, but I managed to find my bath, and to set it, with a blanket inside it, under the spot whence the sound came. When, at breakfast, I announced the sad news of the sudden thaw, there was a chorus of exclamations: "Why! everything is as hard as iron," etc., etc. The mother, meanwhile, was directing her hand-maiden to dry up the water which had come in during the night. The girl stared.

When she came into the room again her mistress asked her what she had done with the wet blanket. She stared more expressively, and was mute.

"Don't you understand?" "Yes, ma'am. But there is no wet blanket, and no water to wipe up."

Up stairs went mistress and servant, and in two minutes back came my wife, looking quite bewildered.

"There's not a trace of water anywhere," said she; "and yet, after you were asleep, I heard it drip fast upon the counterpane, just at my feet."

When Tertius was being tucked up that night he asked: "Who was that person who came and looked at me after I was in bed?"

"Stillwater, I suppose."

"Oh, no! It was an old woman, and she had a funny cap on."

"You dreamed her, dear."

"But I hadn't been to sleep. And I turned my head to the wall, and when I looked for her again she had gone away."

"You must have been half asleep. Now, go to sleep quietly and finish the dream."

The next night Primus began: "Mother, I wish you would tell that old party not to come into my room without knocking. I had just got into bed, happened to glance across to the drawers, and there she stood, coolly looking at me. I was disgusted and turned my back upon her. Presently I looked out of the tail of my eye to see what she was doing, but she'd cut."

My wife called to Stillwater, to ask if Mrs. Brown or Mrs. Jones had been in that evening. She was answered that no one had been.

Night after night we were roused by the voice of this or that child. Their mother always went to them, and always found them sleeping peacefully, though, a minute before, there had been sobbing and moaning. It was bitterly cold, and I persuaded her not to go at the first call. Then there was whimpering on the stairs.

One night we had both been lying awake for some time, listening to what seemed like cautious steps, first on the landing and then in our room itself. We tried to persuade ourselves that it might be mice. But no; there were distinct steps, as of a person walking. Yet, though we followed the sound with our eyes, we saw nothing. Suddenly there was a howl of anguish, like the cry of a large animal in pain.

It thrilled us with horror, for it came from our daughters' room, though it was not possible for it to be their voices. When we reached their bedside they were calmly sleeping, and were not even roused by our entrance with the light. I made quiet observations next day, both inside and outside of the house.

"If you please, ma'am, may I have my sister to sleep with me?" said Stillwater to her mistress.

"Are you afraid to sleep alone?" "No, I'm not afraid."

"Then why do you wish it?" No answer; only a very earnest look.

"Why, Stillwater, you look as if you had seen a ghost," said her mistress, laughingly.

"Yes, ma'am, I have," she replied, very quietly.

"And what did it look like?" "Like Mrs. X—the lady who used to live here, just as she was of afternoons. She had on the same sort of cap she always wore, and the same dress and white apron. I lay still and looked at her, and then I sat up and looked at her hard, and presently I could not see her."

"It was no doubt a dream, and you will probably never have such another."

"No, I am sure it was not a dream. Besides, I have seen her twice before, when I was walking about. One afternoon, toward dusk, she came and looked at me through the window. I wondered how she could be there, and I looked at her for a good little time."

"And then?" "And then she was not there. And I went to the window and looked out, but she was gone."

"What was the use of going to the window, when you knew she was dead?"

"I don't know. She looked just as if she was alive. The other time I was kneeling down on the rug, making your fire burn up. She passed straight before me."

"Oh, nonsense! She would have set fire to her clothes."

"It was not a fancy, either of the times, ma'am. I did see her; I did, indeed. I hope you will believe me."

"Yes, I quite believe that you think you saw Mrs. X. You may have your sister to sleep with you."

Now, it is not a pleasant thing for any man, still less for one of my profession, to confess that he has felt "creepy" on account of certain inexplicable sounds. But, as this is a perfectly true account, I am compelled to acknowledge that it happened to me again and again, during the time of my dwelling in the Old Lodge. And I also declare that my wife and I were perfectly well in health, and that we had never before been the victims of similar terrors. Furthermore, though we spoke of the noises, we at first abstained from mentioning our sensations to each other.

After an hour's sleep I would be aroused, as if at the command of some person, unseen indeed, but certainly in the room. Then a small something, say a marble, would be gently dropped, more than once, on the carpet close at my bedside, sometimes on the floorcloth just outside the open door. Then the marble would be gently rolled on the boards of the room and up against the skirting board.

It was an immense relief when, one night, we encountered each other's eyes as we lay listening, and both made a clean breast of our terrors. Yes, nothing short of that word will do. We agree that the first sufferer shall wake the other. But my wife found it not always possible to carry out this determination.

"What did you hear?" I asked her once.

"The chest of drawers was dragged over the floor," she replied. "I am thankful you spoke to me, for I have for some time been trying to wake you, but was not allowed. In fact, I have been kept perfectly motionless."

I had heard precisely the same sound, yet the drawers did not appear to have been actually moved. The sounds were so distinct that we always connected them with some special article. Now it was a chair, or the towel-horse, that was moved. Now it was the loud snapping of a thick stick in the hall. Now it was a violent blow on the hall table, struck as if with my own walking-stick, which I remembered to have left there, and which I found there in the morning. Once, the heaviest book on my writing-table appeared to be dropped, as if from the height of a man, on the floorcloth in the hall. Then a smaller one. I always myself shut the doors of the rooms leading into the hall.

Of course, I tried in every way to account for the mystery; but, after a time, I could only resign myself to lie awake and wonder. The nights were bitterly cold. On one occasion, when there had been a persistent dropping of nuts in a corner of the room, I jumped up, in desperation, and held the light close to the spot. In a second, the sound was behind me. I whisked round, but—tapping to right of me, tapping to left of me, tapping in every direction, without a moment's intermission. No sooner did I look toward one spot than the dropping of nuts was at the other end of the room. It was as if some mischievous elf were enjoying himself at my expense.

Our boys had gone to spend a day or two with some friends; and their mother, not liking the look of the empty room, had closed the door in passing, giving it a push to make sure that it was fast. That night we heard the door shut with a tremendous bang. Even had it been left open there was no wind to move it.

It was not only during the night that the noises were heard. For instance: I was reading by the fading afternoon light, when a chair on the other side of the room seemed to move from its place, so that I instinctively turned my head to see who had entered the room. Again, I was about to go down the cellar steps, in the afternoon, when I heard a heavy pickling pan dragged along the stone floor below. I quite thought some one was down there; but, as usual, there was no one to be seen, and the pan was in its place.

At eleven o'clock A. M. my wife and Still were on the landing. The girl was telling her mistress that she had heard Mrs. X—'s voice the evening before. Her mistress told her she was giving way to fancies.

"But Mary Jones heard it, too. She had just brought in the eggs, and stood listening to the singing in the drawing-room. Then I heard Mrs. X—'s angry voice again, on the stairs, and Mary said: 'Who's shouting?' I said I didn't know. And she said: 'It must be missis. Lor! how angry she is to holler like that. Doesn't she like 'em to sing?'"

"In an old house like this," began my wife, "there may be many noises caused by—"

Suddenly a noise as if a shower of small pieces of the ceiling came down sharply on the floor-cloth, caused mistress and maid to start back in a fright, and, involuntarily, to look up. There was not a crack to be seen. Then the two pairs of eyes searched the floor in every direction, their owners cautiously standing within the shelter of two doorways. Not a morsel of any kind could they discover.

"What was that, ma'am?" inquired Stillwater, fixing her sleepy gaze on her mistress.

"I can not tell," was the only reply that occurred to that intelligent lady.

One morning the post brought me orders to "move on." Instead of grumbling I hailed them with delight; for we seldom got a decent night's rest, and my wife's nerves were beginning to be weakened by the constant strain upon them.

The Old Lodge had been for years in the charge of a highly respectable old lady, with the drawbacks of being somewhat misanthropical and very avaricious.

I am perfectly aware of the ridicule with which stories of this nature are generally received. I can only repeat that I have related an absolutely true experience, for which I am utterly unable to account. I have no theory on the subject. I have always felt a strong distaste for so-called spiritualism. I perceive the inconsequence and even childishness of my story; and yet it will always remain, to the story-teller, a serious fact.

THE JERSEY LILY'S ROSALIND.

How Mrs. Langtry Disappointed the Golden Youth in London.

One of the chief events of the fortnight has been the appearance of Mrs. Langtry as Rosalind, in "As You Like It," at the Imperial Theatre. The fact that England was on the eve of losing her Jersey Lily to America for six months lent an additional attractiveness—were any needed—to the "hose and doublet" side of the character, when portrayed by the famous beauty, and many were the runs up to town for a day or two undertaken by gentlemen, both young and old, who were never known before to express a desire to pass a night in London from August to December. Various were the excuses offered and reasons given for the unseasonable sojourn in the metropolis. The expected return of the Household Cavalry and Guards from Egypt, and the ardent wish to be on hand to "welcome the fellows back, you know," furnished the avowed motive in the majority of instances, while by a coincidence of dates, as curious as it was fortunate for his royal highness, was the Prince of Wales enabled to come down all the way from Abergeldie, to be present at the funeral of the late Dean of Windsor, on the very day of the evening on which Mrs. Langtry made her first bow as Rosalind before the London public. Therefore was the audience on the first night as marked for its quality in the boxes and stalls as for its quantity in the gallery and pit. The Prince of Wales didn't let it get out that he was going, but everybody knew he would be there all the same; and though not a word has been said in the papers about his being there, it was not a difficult matter to recognize his well-known face and figure, much as he may have contrived to keep it concealed behind the box curtains. With him was Lord "Charlie" Beresford, the young hero of Alexandria, who had that morning arrived from Egypt, Lord Suffield and Colonel Teesdale, of his suite. In the stalls were the old Duke of Beaufort, who is still as great a young buck about town as he was thirty odd years ago; the young Duke of Portland, Lord Lonsdale, Lord Shrewsbury, the Marquis of Huntly, (who seems to be regaining his foothold in society despite his escapades), and many other lesser lights in the peerage's fashionable galaxy. In fact, it was about the sort of audience that Nelly Farren, at the Gaiety, or Florence St. John, at the Avenue, might have longed for at the top of the season, but one which neither have ever yet achieved.

Everybody knows that the interest of the play does not really begin till the action takes place amid the green boughs, the wooded glades, and the mossy carpet of the Forest of Arden. Never, perhaps, was less interest shown than on the present occasion. Men talked together in whispers, the stalls quizzed the boxes through their eye-glasses, and the boxes quizzed the stalls, while old Adam whined through his dreary plaint, and, as the wrestling went on, several stifled yawns were perceptible almost to the verge of being audible. But as the ringing up of the curtain on the forest scene of the act drew near, it was curious to note the hush of expectancy that hovered over the half-poised loggnettes all over the house, and that told but too plainly to be mistaken wherein lay the attractiveness of the character to the men, from the Prince down. Something more than mere idle female curiosity, too, showed itself in the anxious faces and stretched necks of the ladies when the cue for the entrance of Rosalind (as Ganymede) was given.

But, alas! as Rosalind's familiar words, "O Jupiter, how weary are my spirits!" spoken by Mrs. Langtry in her sweetest tone, partly in the wings, ushered her upon the scene, there was an audible sigh of disappointment from pit to dome that was almost ludicrous, while the sly twinkle in Rosalind's eye told how thoroughly she enjoyed a situation which her natural spirit of humor as well as native womanly modesty had suggested to her the planning of. Never had there been a Rosalind costumed so. Doublet there was, no doubt, if a long, tunic-shaped blouse, reaching well down to the ankles, could be called one, while the hose—little more of which was disclosed to view than is shown in the rustic dress of Hester Grazebrook—consisted of a pair of brown silk stockings.

For the combined forces of the jeunesse dorée and the vieuxlards of the London "Crutch and Toothpick" brigade, whose recollections of Neilson led them to expect a more extensive exhibit of tight-clad limbs, and who had come with such intent, it was, perhaps, one of the best sells they have been subjected to for many a long day, and people bave not stopped laughing over it yet. How the part was played had been a minor consideration, but now it was all there was to consider; and though from a certain point of view, and with people of a certain cast of thought, the character in Mrs. Langtry's bands might be deemed to have lost much, if not the greater part, of its attractiveness by her non-observance of the traditional, though none the less indelicate costume, she is entitled to all credit for the possession of the womanly delicacy which dictated and the independence of character which carried out, when everybody supposed her only too willing to do the reverse, her determination that, unlike the great actresses whom she is advised to copy, and who have preceded her in the part, she would not sully the portrayal of one of Shakespeare's most refined heroines by the display of personal charms at other times hidden, and for the exhibition of which the character of Rosalind is too often employed as a means by ladies of the theatrical profession. To such Mrs. Langtry has taught a lesson and set an example by which they might well profit.

As to her acting of the part, it may be said, despite the harsh criticisms which most of the papers have indulged in, that, considering her experience, it was quite wonderful. Its very straying away from the stereotyped models, which the critics complain of, gave it a breezy freshness of its own, as enjoyable to the Helen-Terry-surfeited looker-on as it was censurable in the eyes of the critic enamored of stage traditions and conventionalities. It is true, one could not once forget it was Mrs. Langtry playing Rosalind. But that is hardly to be wondered at. Her face and form are too firmly fixed upon the popular retina to ever let them be mistaken for any one else's. Unlike the common run of actresses, she was famous ere she went on the stage; besides, her conception of the character (unlike that of Helen Faucit, England's greatest traditional Rosalind) is in the spirit of comedy, and the same airs and graces, pretty ways and winning smiles, which have always enhanced her natural beauty in real life, were observable in her portrayal of Rosalind on the stage. She acted, in fact, as though she regarded her life in the Forest of Arden as a huge practical joke.

The performance was not wanting in incidents not set down in the text. When Mrs. Langtry spoke the passage: "Alas the day! What shall I do with my doublet and hose?" a voice in the gallery called out: "Put 'em on." Again, in the epilogue, when she said: "Were I a woman, I would kiss as many of you—" and then paused for a moment; the hiatus was quickly filled up by a stentorian "Oh, take us all in!" from the back benches of the pit. There can be no doubt that Mrs. Langtry is as great a favorite with the London theatre-going public as she is, or rather was, in society, the theatrical critics of the London press to the contrary notwithstanding. There is the same subtle charm of expression, pose, and manner on the stage as in the drawing-room, the same magnetism of fascinating ensemble that unconsciously draws back the eye of the beholder from its wanderings elsewhere. As on the stage, where her simple appearance holds the attention of the audience, and she has but to stand and be looked at to as effectually "fill the stage" as the years of study and rigid adherence to tradition of other actresses enables them to do in their most intense scenes of powerful domestic interest, so will hundreds of men and women tell you that while in a ball-room with her in her society days, you couldn't help keeping on looking at her, and following her with your eyes whichever way she would turn. As an illustration of her peculiar power in this respect, I will give you an instance which I know to be a fact.

The Earl of Ducie, though a married man, is what is known in common parlance as a "woman-hater." When Mrs. Langtry's fame as a popular beauty was at its height in London, and her name and doings were on every tongue, he went so far in his expressions of disapproval of what he termed the popular craze as to declare he would neither willingly go to a ball where she was to be present, nor be introduced to her should chance throw him into her company. Now, it so happened that dining one evening at Lord Sherborne's, there was a dance after dinner, as is frequently the custom during the season, to which about twenty or thirty friends besides those constituting the dinner-party had been invited—among them Mrs. Langtry. Coming into the drawing-room to join the ladies with the other gentlemen, after the port and claret had taken their customary double tour around the table, Lord Ducie, before he knew it, found himself face to face with the Jersey Lily. Setting his teeth hard, he was turning to go, when Lady Sherborne, who saw the action and determined to punish him for his all but rudeness, quickly advanced, and ere his lordship could realize what she was doing, introduced him. Of course, he had to stop and say something. He had intended to slip away after a minute or two. But he didn't. People who knew his opinions were surprised to see him linger on as the minutes flew by, talking away in his happiest mood. The minutes lengthened into hours, and—well, to make a long story short, his lordship never left the dreaded beauty's side the entire evening, except when he had to relinquish his position to the partners who claimed her for a dance, and ever since has been one of her stanchest and truest friends and admirers. And yet, people who were there, and watched the little incident, say she didn't go in the least out of her way to be agreeable to him, but just looked at and talked to him as she does to everybody else.

One can not but think when a woman's negative powers of fascination are such, what must her positive efforts be when she chooses to exert them. It is well, therefore, that young New York should be on their guard, for soon will she be among them, as she sails next week. She is looking forward to her American tour with anticipations of much pleasure. To use her own words, she says: "I am sure I shall like the Americans, they are so much more generous and courteous than the English. They seem to me to resemble the French in politeness, and that is why I like them, I suppose." To the young men of America who lost their heads and hearts over Neilson, and the old boys, too—for, if report speaks true, there were a few maimed ones among the graybeards—I would say, beware! Neilson wasn't a circumstance to Mrs. Langtry, and don't find it out too late. As the engagement is for a six-months' tour, it is more than probable that it will take in San Francisco. COCKAIGNE.

LONDON, October 7th, 1882.

It is a common fallacy among the general public, says Chambers's Journal, that it must be a very difficult matter to find news to fill each day's paper. So far from this being the case, the ingenuity of editors and sub-editors is continually on the stretch to find space for even a selection of the most important news at their disposal. In the office of a leading daily newspaper there is often more matter thrown into the waste-basket, or struck out of manuscripts, than would suffice to fill the paper; while interesting telegrams, for which not only the post-office, but the correspondents who have sent them, will have to be paid, are consigned to the same receptacle almost every night, simply because it is impossible to find a corner for them. The calculations of the editor, moreover, are liable to be upset in a hundred different ways. Some great crisis, storm, crime, or disaster occurs, or an important debate suddenly arises in Parliament, or some great man dies, or there is an extraordinary and unexpected influx of advertisements—perhaps a combination of these—and all the arrangements of the office are correspondingly disturbed.

The æsthetic movement has more than once furnished a theme for the dramatist; it has now found an historian. The author of the work which professes to set æstheticism—now, since the departure of Oscar Wilde, rather moribund in London—once more on its legs is Mr. Walter Hamilton, a young gentleman who appears to be more "utterly utter" than the renowned Oscar himself. He abuses Du Maurier and Robert Buchanan in forcible terms, and maintains that there is no such thing as literary or artistic taste outside the charmed circle of æsthetes. Mr. Hamilton is himself a resident in the unæsthetic neighborhood of Clapham, sacred to cockneys, and never before remarkable for devotion to fine art.

Fontenelle had a brother, an abbot, who loved good wine. A gentleman asked him one day: "What is your brother doing?" "My brother," said he; "he is a priest." "Has he a living?" "No." "How does he employ himself?" "He says mass in the morning." "And in the evening?" "In the evening," rejoins Fontenelle, "he don't know what he says."

Thomas McWhirter, of San Antonio, Texas, was lately the hero of an experience which he would, no doubt, be glad to keep secret. Becoming somewhat heated with work about his yard, he took off his coat and laid it across the fence, without considering the proximity of his robust and resolute goat. Presently he turned around, and beheld the coat in the mud, and the goat on the roof of the chicken-coop joyously munching what looked precisely like the red morocco pocketbook in which Mr. McWhirter had placed two thousand dollars in government bonds. The thought of a four-dollar goat eating a two-thousand-dollar breakfast almost drove him crazy. The goat saw blood in his eye, and ran, with McWhirter in pursuit. At last the animal was caught, killed, and dissected, but almost the only thing not found in her capacious stomach were the bonds. They were safe at home, in the pocket of another coat.

A minister, says the New York World, whom a needy politician has bored for an office, at last sends him a positive refusal and incloses a note for five hundred francs, in case the applicant should have any unexpected expenses to meet. Next day he receives a letter couched in the following indignant terms:

SIR: I sought an opportunity of serving my beloved country in some capacity, no matter how humble. I did not come cringing to you for alms. You can insult my poverty. You can not purchase my independence. I send you back your bank-note, which you must have meant for somebody else.

The minister whistles in mingled admiration and surprise, then looks on the floor to see if the bank-note spurned by the patriot had fallen out of the letter when he opened it. He can not find the enclosure, and that for the best of reasons—it had never been enclosed. However, the writer had shown the letter to a dozen people before mailing it, so his Spartan integrity was fully established, and the minister's attempt to disprove the return of the money was very justly regarded as a rascally attempt to destroy the character of the man he had failed to corrupt.

Two Alsatian farmers had attended a "Kirchweih," or "wake," as we should say. One was about to walk home and the other to drive home, when the latter offered his neighbor a seat in his wagon. It was somewhat late, and both had drunk pretty freely of a local wine more remarkable for its strength than for its flavor. The sky was intensely clear, and the two men sat silent for some time gazing at the stars, and apparently absorbed in their contemplation of the splendor of nature. At last one gave the other a thrust, and observed: "Sepp, I will tell thee all I want—just one matt (meadow) as big as the firmament over yonder." "And I," returned Sepp, "will tell thee all I want—just as many cows and sheep as there are blinking stars up there." "Thou dummer teufel," observed his friend, "what could a man do with so many cows and sheep? The world would never grow fodder enough for them all." "Ay, that may be," said the other, with a shrewd look, "but I should drive them into thy big meadow." "That thou should'st never do, Sepp; not a hoof of anybody else's cattle should tread upon it." Sepp declared that he should contest the dog-in-the-manger claims of his neighbor, asserting that heaven belonged to everybody, and that a pasture as big as heaven would be a gigantic common. The two men, who were usually the best of friends, passed from words to blows in their absurd vindication of the rights of property on one side and the privilege of trespass on the other. The conflict ended by the owner of the wagon being knocked out of his own vehicle. This led to a complaint before a local court, and the ridiculous conversation in the cart at midnight was solemnly reproduced as part of the evidence.

Father Stimson, an aged Kansas parson, owned a good horse, but the keeping of the beast was somewhat of a drain on the dominie's pocket, and he was in the habit of dropping a hint to his parishioners once in a while that a little hay would be acceptable. One day a church member asked him to bring Mrs. Stimson to dinner. "Certainly," said Father Stimson; "and as it's haying time, I guess I'll put some hay on the wagon when I go back home." "All right, father," replied the church member; "but bring a one-horse wagon." Father Stimson took his wife to dinner in a wagon with an ample hayrick that would hold a haystack. "See here," said the parishioner, as he helped Mrs. Stimson out of the hayrick, "you said you were going to bring a one-horse wagon, and now you've appeared with the most capacious hay apparatus I ever saw." "Oh, I've brought the one-horse wagon," said Father Stimson; "but the hayrick—that's a two-horse hayrick." He drove away after dinner with twenty-two hundred pounds of hay. Parson Stimson was the first to use gospel-tents in the West. He put them up himself. A fellow who passed him one morning as he was hard at work on his tent, called to him in a loud voice: "Hallo, there! Are you going to have a circus?" "Yes," said the parson, continuing his work without looking up; "and I'm looking for a baboon. Don't you want to hire yourself to me?" The parson was chaplain in the Ninth New York Cavalry in the war. The colonel was fond of leading the soldiers through deep puddles at the regular drill, and the chaplain one day rode around the puddle, and thereby fell out of the regular order. The colonel noticed it, and at the close of the drill, when the officers came together, said, with a sneer: "If Chaplain Stimson is afraid to ride through muddy water for fear of soiling his clothing, I will carry him across the puddles myself." "Thank you," the chaplain said; "but as the Government provides horses, I don't see any reason why I should ride on a jackass."

ENGLAND AND AMERICA.

By Charles Dudley Warner.

In an estimate of the prospects of England one must take into account the recent marked changes in the social condition. Mr. Escott has an instructive chapter on this in his excellent book on England. He notices that the English character is losing its insularity, is more accessible to foreign influences, and is adopting foreign, especially French, modes of living. Country life is losing its charm; domestic life is changed; people live in "flats" more and more, and the idea of home is not what it was; marriage is not exactly what it was; the increased free and independent relations of the sexes are somewhat demoralizing; women are a little intoxicated with their newly acquired freedom; social scandals are more frequent. What are the symptoms of decay in England? Unless the accumulation of wealth is a symptom of decay, I do not see many. I look at the people themselves. It seems to me that never in their history were they more full of vigor. See what travelers, explorers, adventurers they are. See what sportsmen, in every part of the globe, how much they endure, and how hale and jolly they are—women as well as men. The race, certainly, has not decayed. And look at letters. It may be said that this is not the age of pure literature—and I'm sure I hope the English patent for producing machine novels will not be infringed—but the English language was never before written so vigorously, so clearly, and to such purpose. Art also keeps pace with luxury, and shows abundant promise for the future. For myself, I like to see the English sort of civilization spreading over the world, rather than the Russian or the French. I hope England will hang on to the East, and not give it over to the havoc of squabbling tribes, with a dozen religions and five hundred dialects, or to the military despotism of an empire whose morality is only matched by the superstition of its religion. The relations of England and the United States are naturally of the first interest to us. Our love and our hatred have always been that of true relatives. For three-quarters of a century our amour propre was constantly kept raw by the most supercilious patronage. During the past decade, when the quality of England's regard has become more and more a matter of indifference to us, we have been the subject of a more intelligent curiosity, of increased respect, accompanied with a desire to understand us. In the diplomatic scale Washington still ranks below the Sublime Porte, but this anomaly is due to tradition, and does not represent England's real estimate of the status of the republic. There is, and must be, a good deal of selfishness mingled in our friendship—patriotism itself being a form of selfishness—but our ideas of civilization so nearly coincide, and we have so many common aspirations for humanity, that we must draw nearer together, notwithstanding old grudges and present differences in social structure. Our intercourse is likely to be closer, our business relations will become more inseparable. I can conceive of nothing so lamentable for the progress of the world as a quarrel between these two English-speaking people. But, in one respect, we are likely to diverge. I refer to literature. In that, assimilation is neither probable nor desirable. We were brought up on the literature of England; our first efforts were imitations of it; we were criticised—we criticised ourselves—on its standards. We compared every new aspirant in letters to some English writer. We were patted on the back if we resembled the English models; we were stared at or sneered at if we did not. When we began to produce something that was the product of our own soil and our own social conditions, it was still judged by the old standards; or, if it was too original for that, it was only accepted because it was curious or bizarre, interesting for its oddity. The criticism that we received for our best was evidently founded on such indifference or toleration that it was galling. At first we were surprised; then we were grieved; then we were indignant. We have long ago ceased to be either surprised, grieved, or indignant at anything the English critics say of us. We know that since "Gulliver" there has been no piece of original humor produced in England equal to "Knickerbocker's New York;" that not in this century has any English writer equaled the wit and the satire of the "Biglow Papers." We used to be irritated at what we called the snobishness of the English critics of a certain school; we are so no longer, for we see that its criticism is only the result of ignorance—simply of inability to understand. And we the more readily pardon it, because of the inability we have to understand English conditions, and the English dialect, which has more and more diverged from the language as it was at the time of the separation. We have so constantly read English literature, and kept ourselves so well informed of their social life, as it is exhibited in novels and essays, that we are not so much in the dark with regard to them as they are with regard to us; still we are more and more bothered by the insular dialect. I do not propose to criticise it; it is our misfortune, perhaps our fault, that we do not understand it; and I only refer to it to say that we should not be too hard on the Saturday Review critic when he is complaining of the American dialect in the English that Mr. Howells writes. How can the Englishman be expected to come into sympathy with the fiction that has New England for its subject, when he is ignorant of the whole background on which it is set; when all the social conditions are an enigma to him; when, if he has, historically, some conception of Puritan society, he can not have a glimmer of comprehension of the subtle modifications and changes it has undergone in a century? When he visits America and sees it, it is a puzzle to him. How, then, can he be expected to comprehend it when it is depicted to the life in books? No; we must expect a continual divergence in our literatures. And it is best that there should be. There can be no development of a nation's literature worth anything that is not on its own lines, out of its native materials. We must not expect that the English will understand the literature that expresses our national life, character, conditions, any better than they understand that of the French or of the Germans. And, on our part, the day has come when we receive their literary efforts with the same respectful desire to be pleased with them, that we give to like their dress and their speech.—Century Magazine for November.

The Bride's Toilette.

(The Conciergerie, 1793.)

"Dame! how the moments go,
And the bride is not ready!
Call all her tiring-maids—
Paul, Jean, and Thédie.
Is this your robe, my dear?
Faith, but she's steady!
The bridegroom is blessed who gets Such a brave lady.

"Pardi! that throat is fair;
How he will kiss it!
Here is your kerchief, girl;
Did you not miss it?
Quick! Don these little shoes,
White as your foot is.
Ho, Jean, Saint Guillotine
Loves these fine beauties!

"Now these long locks must go—
Monsieur is waiting;
Short is the hour he gives
To wooing and mating.
Thédie, you fool, the shears!—
Time this was ended.
Down falls the golden hair,
Once lovingly tended.

So from her prison doors
Forth went the lady;
Silent the bridegroom stood,
Not a sound made he.
Oh, but he clasped her close!—
'Twas a brave lover.

"Dance, dance La Carmagnole!
The bridal is over!"

Faith's Fortitude.

With but a sail and bank of fragile oars,
And only stars to guide their aimless aim,
The ancient Northmen crossed the seas, and came Triumphant to our sunny unknown shores.
It was the legends of these dauntless rowers—
Vague legends giving no man place or name—
Which kindled in Columbus' breast, like flame,
His dream of western lands of boundless stores.
Such ocean lies around our little life,
Trackless, and deeper than our fathoms run;
We, brave, launch out, and steer by sails or sun;
Of fiercest storms we take the brunt and strife;
To later voyagers our wrecks are rife
With good, long after all our pain is done.

The ignorant Sepoy soldiers, when they saw
The pontoon bridges tossing frail and light
Upon deep waters rushing swift and white,
Marched on them, tranquil, with no doubting awe;
Their faith and fine obedience had no flaw.
But, halting, terror-stricken at the sight,
The elephants, immovable from fright,
Refused to cross. By dull material law
Their clumsy instinct reckoned and was bound.
They would not trust what they had never tried.
So faith, to calm obedience allied,
Transports our souls triumphant over ground
Where reason halts; across abysses wide
And deep, which reason can not span nor sound.

Our selfish hearts rebel and chafe at this;
And take a specious refuge in pretense
Of comprehending God's omnipotence.
Our one sure safety we reject and miss,
When once we make our good the test of His.
His final ends surpass our feeble sense;
His plan is greater than our preference;
Who told us we had any right to bliss?
Our tears are but our arrogant conceit.
Two things that grow and yield the sweetest sweat,
The lofty cocoa-palm and sugar-cane,
As well on waters salt as on fresh rain
Will thrive, and in their sap and fruit complete
No lurking taste of bitter will remain.

Tapestries.

CLEOPATRA AFTER ACTIUM.

Crouched low, at bay; her vesture rent apart;
Ungirt the fair false breast where Antony lay,
Lord over half the world but yesterday;
Her bloodless fingers twined above her breast;
Her tawny hair athwart her brows—a net
Wherein no more she should be snared or slain;
Her cheeks like pale blush-roses after rain;
Her cruel lips, like marble, carved and set;
And gray wan eyes, forgetful of their guile,
As through the tangled fringes of their lids,
Lost in some dream of palms and pyramids,
They spy, at last, the hooded worm of Nile.

THE HEADSMAN.

The white-faced priest, thrust back by brawny bands,
Gasps forth, unheeded, the remnant of his prayer,
With lifted crucifix. The wistful air
Tugs at her shroud-like mantle where she stands.
Her eyes, which dare not look, for utter fear,
Are bent upon her bruised, unsundered feet;
Almost her waiting heart forgets to beat.
Then, without voice, or tread to fright the ear,
O'er the strewn sand begins to glide and run
A shadow, nameless, stealthy, swift—forecast
By that advancing shape, most dread, and last
That e'er shall come betwixt her and the sun.

SALOME.

Brown folded arms; sleek shoulders, brown and bare;
And bare her lissome ankles, brown and slim;
Her swart brows lowered, and her eyes made dim
Beneath the cloudy ambush of her hair;
Scarlet her tunic, and in threefold strand
Gold lustrous serpents coiled on wrist and throat;
Thus, before Herod—whose dull eyeballs gloat
On her lithe beauty, whilst, on either hand,
His bearded lords stretch eager necks to see—
In the cool dusk of awnings that uplift
To show far palm-trees through a shining rift,
Bows low the dancing maid of Galilee.

THE BAZAARS OF PARIS.

How their Proprietors Spread Nets for the Butterflies of Fashion.

In a few days, says the New York Sun's Paris correspondent, the Gil Blas newspaper will commence in its feuilleton the publication of Zola's new novel, which is entitled "Au Bonheur des Dames," and in which the author will trace the development of the old-fashioned silk store of "Pot-Bouille" into one of those immense caravansaries, like the Louvre and the Bon Marché, where all the riches of the earth are spread out for the temptation of women. These gigantic and permanent fairs have become a feature—some would say a curse—of Parisian life. On busy days a shop like the Bon Marché will have seventy thousand visitors. The secret of success rests in the coquetry and the cupid of woman. The men—men of genius, if you like—who run these stores, set out with the idea that woman is their prey, and a prey to be taken with any kind of bait. It is curious again to observe with what cynical knowledge of woman's nature the organizers of these bazaars set their traps. Most of them absolutely ignore the men—husbands, fathers, brothers, or lovers. The word "Monsieur" does not exist in their vocabulary. On their invoices, labels, address cards, you always find "Madame." If a man buys things and has them sent home, they arrive addressed to "Madame X." More than ninety per cent. of the customers of these great bazaars are women, and yet the proportion of the employees is ninety per cent. men, and ten per cent. women and girls. Why? Because the big spiders who spin the dazzling web of a dry goods store have remarked that you must have men to coax and conquer women, and to wring out of them all their substance. The more men you have the more women will come to be wheeled out of their money. The women prefer to deal with men. If you ask the women why it is so, they will say that it is because women are jealous of each other. A wealthy lady, for instance, will come and try on a mantle; the shop-girl will throw the mantle over her shoulders, and pirouette before the glass with an air that the wealthy lady will try in vain to attain. Hence irritation on the part of the wealthy lady; sharp words; spiteful rejoinders. Furthermore, some women are so jealous and irritable that a pretty face is enough to make them foam with rage. And so it happens that at present the departments of millinery, corsets, and trying on are alone in the hands of feminine employees. Men preside over the counters of morning-gowns even, and in some of the stores men take the measurements for dresses. Both the men and the women employed in these great stores have a bad reputation. The big spider who runs the web does not trouble himself about the morality of his aids. All he cares about is sale, and to attain this end he wants smart clerks and pretty shop-girls. One of his axioms is: The public likes pleasing faces. For that matter, the big spider has remarked that of the ten per cent. of men who come loafing about his web, at least one-third come simply to ogle the pretty shop-girls, and the big spider has further calculated that out of a hundred of his shop-girls ten are married, ten remain chaste, and the other eighty do not fall under those categories. The number of thefts committed by the public in these big stores is astounding, and the thieves are invariably women, and of all classes of society. In each store feminine thieves are arrested, rarely professionals, but women who have yielded to the permanent temptations of the riches displayed around them. They have arrested by their own police or the police force four or five thieves a day, and they know that at least forty other thieves escape unnoticed. The arrest is a very simple affair. The theft is observed, the lady followed directly into the street, and then the policeman taps her gently on the shoulder and invites her to return. She is led directly into the board-room; an electric bell tinkles in the various departments, and the principals of the establishment arrive. If the culprit denies the theft, one of the shop-girls is called in to undress her. Some of the thieves are handed over to the police, others are simply taxed according to their social position; that is to say, the establishment promises to say nothing about the affair provided the culprit pays a certain sum to the poor. A whole department of the store is devoted to returned goods. An elegant lady will come and choose two bats. "Send them to-morrow morning," she says, "at such an hour, and I will make my choice. If I am not there, let the man leave them and call the next day. I shall certainly keep one." Of course, the lady is absent when the man calls, and when he calls again the next day the lady has changed her mind. The hats are too dear. She will keep neither. The hats are returned without a word. They are not damaged, but slight traces of powder, an agreeable perfume, a slight deformation, show that they have been worn. The explanation is that the lady wanted a fine hat to go to a wedding; so did her friend, and she borrowed two hats, had them sent home and taken back to the shop, and did not pay a penny. Another way in which they take their revenge is at the sideboard and in the writing-rooms of the great stores. The amount of writing paper they use for their love-letters is astounding, and the quantity of syrups and cakes that they absorb free of cost is still more astounding. On grand days, I am told, the Louvre serves out more than one hundred and fifty pints of syrup and three thousand cakes. The women simply fight their way to the sideboard. I will mention, in conclusion, one of the powerful combinations that the big spider of the dry goods store has invented in order to draw the women into his web. It is the periodical exhibition. Each exhibition is prepared months beforehand, and announced by colossal advertising. The order is the same in all the stores. September, the time of the return from the seaside and of preparation for winter, is the month of the carpet fair. The whole store is sacrificed during a fortnight or so to carpets. There are carpets from Asia and carpets from Europe, embroidered silks, old stuffs, velvets, the wreck of past centuries, the bric-à-brac of whole countries that have been carefully scoured by the emissaries of the store. In October we have the exhibition of winter mantles and dresses; in November, the furs; in December, toys and presents for the new year; in February, gloves, flowers, lace, and white goods; in March, the summer novelties; in May, curtains and country furniture; in June, straw hats. Finally, in July and August—the dead season, when "all Paris" is in country—the store takes two months of relative repose.

SOCIETY.

Notes and Gossip.

The Misses Cutter are still visiting at their uncle's in Contra Costa County, but will soon return. Miss Bessie Raymond has returned home. The Misses McMullin will return to the city next week. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Staples have been spending a portion of the present week at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. A. L. Tubbs and Miss Nettie Tubbs have also been at Monterey during the present week. Lieutenant and Mrs. Dillingham came down from the Navy Yard Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. R. S. Baker have returned to Los Angeles. Mrs. Alexander Forbes and Miss Bella Forbes went to Monterey on Saturday last to remain a few days. Eugene Dewey left for the East early in the week, contemplating permanent residence in New York. Mr. and Mrs. David Brown, who have been sojourning in Alameda since May last, have returned to the city for the winter. W. E. Brown arrived in New York on Wednesday last. Mrs. R. B. Woodward, of Oak Knoll, has taken up her residence at the Palace for the winter. S. W. Backus has been at Monterey during the week; also F. W. Sharon. Surgeon G. W. Woods, U. S. N., who was recently detached from the Mare Island Navy Yard, left for the East on Saturday last. Mrs. M. L. Hamilton left for the East on Tuesday last on a visit to her son. Assistant Paymaster Wilcox, U. S. N., left for the Arctic station on Saturday last. Miss Dora Miller has been visiting at the Navy Yard. The San Francisco Yacht Club gave their closing dance of the season on Saturday last; the Pacific Yacht Club have their closing party to-day. Charles Crocker and family have returned to London from their continental trip, and will leave Liverpool for New York on Monday next. Mrs. S. W. Holladay and her daughter are in Paris. Mrs. Colonel Eddy and Miss Eddy are in Madrid. Swiss Consul Berton is shooting canvas-backs at Clear Lake. Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Bachelder have returned from Monterey. On Thursday evening last, the 26th inst., Mr. Ernest A. Leigh and Miss Ella Lees, daughter of Captain Lees, were married at the residence of the bride's father in this city. Mrs. General McDowell received her friends at her new residence on Van Ness Avenue on Thursday last, and will be "at home" hereafter on Thursdays. Mrs. Judge Sanderson arrived in Paris yesterday; she will soon return with her daughter. Colonel Harney and family, of Menlo Park, will return to this city for the winter on Monday next. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Gallatin, of Sacramento, are at the Grand Central, New York. Miss Tolsen, of the Navy Yard, and Miss Allie Hawes, of this city, who has been visiting Mrs. Lieutenant Richman, at Mare Island, came down from the Yard on Monday evening last, and will return to-morrow. Miss Sprague of Angel Island, and Miss Steele, of San Francisco, are visiting Mrs. Commander Boyd, at the Navy Yard. The Ranger leaves the Navy Yard on Wednesday next, and will anchor in the bay in front of the city until the following Friday, and then sail for the lower coast. Mr. and Mrs. F. O. Layman, who have been spending the summer in Alameda, will return to the city in a few days. Mrs. John C. Fall has returned from Wyoming. Mrs. Lloyd Tevis and family, who have been at Monterey since June last, will return to the city next week. Paymaster McDaniel, U. S. N., has been detached from the Wachusett. Mrs. M. E. Porter, of Oakland, is visiting Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Dodge, accompanied by their vivacious niece, Miss Mollie Dodge, will return from the East on or about the 15th of next month. Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Crocker, who have been in the Eastern States for the past six months, are expected home next week. Mr. and Mrs. William Ward have returned from Monterey. Mrs. Susan Kellogg, of Oakland, has gone East. Mrs. S. J. Taylor, of Alameda, has returned from the East. Mrs. William M. Stewart, after a tarry of a few days at Denver, has arrived in Washington, and is contemplating spending the winter in that city; should she do so, Captain and Mrs. R. C. Hooker will pay Mrs. S. a visit after the holidays. Captain Rodman, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Friday last. Captain Wherry, of General Schofield's staff, is expected here in a few days. General McDowell was given a reception on Thursday evening last by the Associated Veterans of the Mexican war, during which Captain William Blanding read an appropriate address. A delightful party was given by Mrs. Julius Reis, at her new residence corner of Sacramento and Laguna streets, on Thursday evening last, and among the ladies present were a number from Oakland and Mare Island; the apartments set apart for dancing and promenading were tastefully decorated with flowers, and on the whole it was one of the most charming parties of the season.

The Art Association Reception.

On Tuesday evening last the Rooms of the Art Association were thrown open to members and some guests, the occasion being the first exhibition of the Nahl collection. The attendance was very large and fashionable, the rooms being crowded during the evening. A string band was stationed in the Art Rooms, and in the rooms of the Bohemian Club, on the same floor, the large and complete band of the First Artillery, U. S. A., alternated with the strings. A number of the officers of the regiment dined at the Bohemian Club that evening, and the colonel very courteously placed the band at the club's disposition. The rooms were thrown open, and after leaving the art exhibit the guests promenaded through the spacious and elegant quarters of the Bohemian Club. The affair was a most successful one, and was enjoyed by all.

Engagement.

We have the best authority for announcing the engagement of Miss Mary B. Williams, daughter of General Thomas H. Williams, of Oakland, to Mr. Frank S. Johnson, of this city. Both the young people are very well known here and across the bay. The wedding will take place at an early date.

"The Fête of Nations."

When the proposition of "Carnival" was made, as the only means of exciting the public to generous intent, it was with discouragement on every hand; predictions of failure, artistically as well as financially, opposition from the institute directors, disinclination on the part of the former booth-managers, with their well-bought experience, to participate; no Mr. Locke with his theatrical experience, though questioned executive ability, to superintend; yet, notwithstanding these deterring circumstances, the lady managers have most effectively demonstrated what tenacity of purpose and perseverance can do. While deliberating over these drawbacks, and questioning the advisability of the enterprise, time, which waits for no man, left little opportunity but for immediate action. Out of chaos, things have assumed shape almost as magically as did Aladdin's palace, the representation of which is so appropriately included in the programme. After but a little over two weeks of rehearsal and preparation, the looked-for event opened most auspiciously. Although the details of each booth were still not completed, to a casual looker-on it was scarcely a matter of criticism, for, charity being the object both of the effort and of the support, it was but consistent to be charitable. Securing the services of Chief Burke as president was a happy inspiration, for with his more than ordinary executive ability, and his known desire to serve the ladies, he has made more than a presiding officer—a most valuable assistant. Carnivals have been condemned for their tendency toward cultivating among the rising generation theatrical tastes and inclinations; still, it may be said in extenuation, the educational advantages to both participants and lookers-on more than counter-balance the prejudicial result. The building, though smaller than the old one, gives the idea of more space. Also, the interior completion and decoration have a more finished effect, while the grand stage is divested of the former barn-like appearance, upon which anything less than colossal effects were lost. It was a happy suggestion, the arrangement of Bon-bon, Floral, Military, and Executive booths with reference to enhancing the effect of the garden, as well as giving more room in the centre of the building and an unobstructed view of the grand stage. In a brief notice—such only as we have space for—one could hardly single out one booth, to the exclusion of the others, to make mention of. Each has its especial attraction. The French is under the auspices of the French Benevolent Society, with its musical salon, and nightly varied programme—the Café des Champs Elysées, with its foliage and colored lights, almost persuading you into the belief that you are, in fact, in the centre of the French Capital; while on the opposite side of the booth from the salon is a stage devoted to tableau representations of French authors, such as Hugo and Dumas, most artistically superintended by the Russian Consul and R. Weill. The Japanese booth, with its characteristic theatrical performances, and with pretty Japanese girls selling tea and bric-à-brac, is most attractive. The Terra Cotta is a novel feature, and the grouping well done. A very appropriate manner of serving oysters in a cavern by the sea is the Jules Verne Oyster Grotto. One of the most attractive features are the little ones of the Kate Greenaway booth, in their quaint costumes, singing Mother Goose melodies and dancing to music of a hundred years ago, when they should be singing "O, put me in my little bed." The charity for which they appeal meets with a sympathetic response from all. The Chaucer booth, with its "Tabard Inn" and "Canterbury Tales" representations, forms a jolly crowd. The Washington Irving and Longfellow booths deserve especial mention. Then the Doré, with its gorgeous drapery and effects, and beautiful women so suited to Biblical representation. To do Doré justice requires an artistic hand, as it evidently has in its arrangement. The Homer booth, with its classical costumes, lovely women, and brave men, all in a halo of a mythological past, is more than good. The Chinese booth, with its magnificent properties and costumes, so kindly loaned by the Chinese capitalist who recently imported them for the Chinese Theatre, fully demonstrates what the ladies of the Silk Culture Society, under whose auspices it is, could do. The Pre-Raphaelite tableaux are a good imitation of what the artists, Millais, Hunt, Rossetti, and others of that school, have done in art. The Court of Louis Seize is one of the most gorgeous pageants of the Carnival. The number of participants, the brilliant costuming, the number and variety of effects, show what experience and repetition can accomplish. With dancing and social enjoyment, one imagines one's self in the gay court presided over by Marie Antoinette, before the dark hours which followed. The Kenilworth with its Scotch lads and lassies comes next; and lastly, and by no means least, is the Warwick, matronized by the duchess herself, Mrs. Montanya, and assisted by her ladies masquerading as milkmaids. The pretty girls, the nice attentions, and the ice cream, ought to be an attraction to that booth which will aid to swell the coffers of the Carnival fund. The music, under the directorship of Hinrichs, who has postponed the next Philharmonic Concert in consequence, is most excellent, and, irrespective of other allurements, a promenade to the music of such a band, and to exchange courtesies with the friends innumerable one meets, should be inducement enough to add one's mite to the steadily increasing call of charity. Let us suggest, if there be another Carnival—and we hope there will every two years—a change of name, as there has been a gradual departure from the original idea—Authors' Carnival. There has been the introduction of the military, the representations of artists' productions, the pre-Raphaelite, Doré, and terracotta manipulation. Even the musical authors have been made more numerous and more popular. This is no objection, however; for it lends variety, and the public taste is to be catered to in an entertainment of this kind, where the motive is charity.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: In your political editorial in to-day's issue of the Argonaut, in which you undertake to name the Democratic nominees in this city for Assemblymen, you give my name as McShaffer, no doubt with a view of producing the impression, with some at least, that I am an Irishman. Had I Irish blood in my veins (my only Celtic blood comes from the Maxwells of Scotland), I should be proud of it, as the history of the world shows I might well be; and were I a Catholic, as I am not, I should be far from ashamed of my religion, for that faith has many of the very best people in the world as its followers. I trace my genealogy in the United States of America for four generations on my father's side, and five generations on my mother's side. My forefathers on both sides were soldiers in the revolution, and I think I may safely claim to be an American. I feel that your love of justice and fair play will cause you to correct the erroneous impression you may have made. Respectfully yours,

THE CITY OF THE CZARS.

Notes from a Wandering Californian in Moscow.

We have been in this city for the past four days, seeing the many interesting sights and enjoying the most imperial weather. Under the direction of our commissioner—an unfortunate Polish count now compelled to earn his bread—we have attended service in several of the largest and most attractive of the churches of the Kremlin, have breakfasted in genuine Russian style at several of the most noted restaurants, and have conscientiously inspected the Grand Exposition now in progress in this city. Last evening, as we were driving in our droskies on the other side of the river, just at sunset, for the purpose of seeing the gilded domes of the Kremlin illuminated by the splendors of the sinking sun, we learned from our count that the emperor had arrived in Moscow. What a chance, to be here at such a time! I confess that if we had known of the coming of his imperial highness, we would have deferred our visit, as we have not had any special wish to share in the possible embarrassments of the occasion. We count ourselves very fortunate in having had the past four days to devote to the sights of Moscow, and particularly the Exposition, which is to be closed to the public, and reserved for the inspection of the imperial family to-morrow and the day following. It is, however, exceedingly interesting to see the change which, as by enchantment, has swept over this city since yesterday. At early dawn special chiming of the bells ushered in the day. First one great tower and then another gave forth its volume of clangor. Never was there a city with such resources in the way of bell-metal, and if there were any evil spirits in the air, it is to be believed that so much ding-donging of consecrated bronze has ere this well exorcised them. It is reported that the emperor is to attend the grand "Te Deum," at the Church of the Assumption in the Kremlin, at 1:30 P. M. This information has reached to the utmost limits of great dreamy Moscow; as a result, thousands and thousands are filling all the spaces in the vicinity of the fortress as well as all along the route of the procession. Just where the emperor was last night I have not yet heard. It does not matter. He comes to the Kremlin to-day, and from the balcony of our apartments in the Slavianski Bazar Hotel we have a commanding view of the line of march. Already the flags are out and up in all directions. The bunting seems by no means lavish for the occasion. Soldiers stand in unbroken line on either hand and mounted police at regular intervals. Back of these necessary guardians of the imperial safety there is a dense mass of humanity, expectant and patient, and it at least ought to be grateful for the perfect autumn weather that synchronizes with this unexpected holiday.

It is very difficult to speculate as to public sentiment in Russia. Perhaps it is unnecessary. All the world loves a spectacle, and Moscow will feel herself complimented according to the splendor of that event which is now upon us. For ourselves, emperors being somewhat scarce, we shall be glad to see his imperial highness, and so much the more so if it be going to and coming from his coronation. In view of all possible embarrassments, I regard the balcony of a hotel as preferable to the crowded and jostling street. In these days, when presidents are shot and sovereigns are shot at, it is difficult to repress entirely a certain degree of anxiety for the results of a day like this. I have just learned that the first ceremony of to-day is not the "Te Deum" at the Assumption, but a visit of the emperor to the small but greatly venerated Chapel of the Iberian Mother of God, where he is to perform the usual worship and kiss the hand of the celebrated picture of the Virgin of that chapel. Yesterday we paid an undevotional visit to the place, and witnessed the extreme reverence of the populace, who were thronging in crowds to the shrine. From the shrine of the Virgin the emperor proceeds to the Cathedral of the Assumption for the grand "Te Deum," and thence to the imperial palace in the Kremlin, where his majesty holds a great reception, and in which residence he is to remain until the coronation. I am on the watch every moment to see the movement of the crowd, which will indicate the coming of the monarch and his escort. As yet only a humble and exceeding unostentatious water-cart slowly parades up and down the space reserved, and does its acceptable service upon the abundant dust. Ah! There is no mistaking that sound! The multitudinous voice of the populace! We rushed to the balcony just in time to see the emperor and empress pass quickly along in an open Victoria without guard or escort, except the single footman, in imperial livery, upon the seat by the side of the driver. The quickly trotting span of dappled greys gave us, however, time to remark the scarlet uniform of the emperor, and the brocaded satin of the empress, with parasol and hat of the same—all in white. Certainly there was nothing lacking as to personal courage in the royal personages passing thus ungarded through the crowded streets, and unquestionably this display of confidence in the affection and loyalty of the people will have the effect of increasing immensely the popularity of the sovereigns. A long line of other carriages followed the imperial equipage, and the greatest enthusiasm greeted the advance of their majesties to the portal of the chapel, where they passed from our view. A few minutes later and we heard the huzzas which resounded again as they passed into the Kremlin. And now the great space between us and the Grand Menage is relieved of its guards and resumes its wonted appearance. The lovely autumn day sheds its hazy light over all, and Moscow is herself again, with an emperor in the Kremlin. Let us hope, for the happiness of a brave man and a beautiful woman, and for the welfare of a vast empire, that the period of mutual confidence and affection between sovereigns and people has at last arrived, and that this propitious day is the symbol of a future alike serene and auspicious.

If an all-wise and beneficent Being created man, and does not permit a sparrow to fall without his notice, what inference is to be drawn from the fact that He has created and now maintains four hundred millions of Chinese and only five millions of Irish?

EDITORIAL NOTES.

We shall be grateful when this political campaign has closed. It has—and unnecessarily so—become an angry and uncomfortable contest. The State and San Francisco has been well governed during the past four and two years. Governor Perkins and all the State officials have, without exception, contributed to give us a most excellent administration. It would have been well that they could each and all have been continued in office. It would have been well if all could have been renominated and reelected. It is the fault of our political system that this condition of things must be interrupted by an entire change. It is the fault of ambitious men and party rings within the Republican party that this opportunity of change was seized upon by them to advance their selfish, ambitious, and mercenary designs.

The city of San Francisco has been exceptionally well governed in its municipal affairs during the past two years. There has been no case of defalcation or abuse of trust. Taxation has been kept within rational bounds. The city has been orderly. The Mayor and Board of Supervisors, differing in opinion upon some matters of detail, have in the main well agreed, and have cooperated in a friendly and courteous manner. Our Sheriff's, County Clerk's, and Recorder's offices have been well administered. Our common schools have flourished. The relations between the authorities and the gas and water corporations, having been fixed by the courts, have been adjusted upon terms that were reasonable, and not unacceptable to the tax-paying people. The election of two years ago had driven the Higgins machine out of the Republican party and into harmless obscurity. If it had not been for the Bulletin's personal war against Spring Valley, it would not have entered into an alliance with the bosses which gave the machine new life; we should have been spared this unseemly political wrangle, the officials would have been renominated, and San Francisco would have had the assurance of two years of good government and political repose.

This is no time to regret the existence of laws authorizing too frequent elections, or to shrink from the duty of choosing new officials for State and municipal governments. Nor do we regard the political condition as in any sense serious, as presented by the State campaign. It is only just to say of General Stoneman, and the gentlemen associated with him upon the Democratic ticket, that they are fairly representative of the intelligence and respectability of the State. General Stoneman is a gentleman, educated at West Point, has served his country with distinction, has been for several years in private life and civil employment, was honorably nominated, and has as yet done nothing to evidence that, in event of his election, the interests of the State will suffer. We wish Dunn, candidate for Controller, had fewer poor relations, and that the Honorable Edward Marshall, of Kentucky, was as good a lawyer as he is a blackguard; that Gildea was not Pope's Irish; that W. W. Foote had more political sense; that General Rosecrans did not love the Pope half as much as he has demonstrated that he loves the country; and that Charles Sumner was not a crank. We wish the Democratic platform did not favor selling whisky and lager on Sunday. Still, if the Democratic party is elected, the earth will revolve upon its axis, the sun will give us light and heat, the seasons will, we trust, give us their changes, and the soil its grains, and fruits, and flowers, pretty much as usual.

If the Republican party nominees are elected—and we hope they may be (all except Estee)—the State will continue to be well governed, as it has always been under both Republican and Democratic administrations in the past. We oppose Mr. Estee because of the manner of his nomination, and because there is nothing sincere, genuine, or reliable about him. His whole political life is one of tergiversation, deception, misrepresentation, and intrigue. He is faithful neither to party, to principle, nor to political friends. He is untrue to his promises, and utterly infidel to every pledge that he deems it to be for his interest to avoid or break. He does not know to-day, or he dare not state, whether he is in favor of, or opposed to, closing whisky and beer saloons on Sunday. If he answers in one way or the other, he dare not give his reasons therefor. He dare not say whether he favors the cultivation of the vine in this State and the manufacture of its product into wine or brandy. He dare not state whether he thinks the gravel-sluicer has the right or not to destroy the property of the valley farmer. He is a temperance apostle at Hanford; he is a groggery advocate at San Francisco; he is a Stalwart to Stalwarts, a Half-breed to Dolly Vardens; he is all things to all men; he is on every side of every question; he is Morris M. Estee. He was attorney for Spring Valley, and we should be glad to have him define his position toward that company in an open letter to the Bulletin. He was the friend of corporations, other than municipal, in the Constitutional Convention. He is now endeavoring to outbid Foote, Doyle, and Sumner, in demagogism against them. And yet, if elected, the march of the celestial bodies will continue in their grand and harmonious procession; the laws of gravitation, centrifugal and centripetal forces will keep the orbs in their accustomed places; the earth will survive; ocean tides will ebb and flow; the Mercury man of San José—the ladies' friend—will be appointed State Printer; Higgins will be in the kitchen cabinet; the Chronicle will have the public printing and be the administration organ, and in four years we shall forget how unhappy we all were in the memorable year of 1882.

Some of us who don't fear the League of Freedom Dutchmen, or the Pope's Democratic Irish; who are not ashamed that we are of American birth; who would not attempt to escape the pains of purgatory by dodging through a priest's ear; who were early Republicans and have been driven out of the party by the latter-day ruffians of the machine, under the direction of Irish bosses; who are not poor enough to steal, and are ashamed to beg; who resent the rule of Irish politicians and think that nine Irish Catholic senators, four Irish Catholic judges, and a majority of Irish-born members of Assembly ought to justify an American party; and who are not admirers of the cowardly policy of the Democrats or the Republicans who refuse to declare themselves in favor of amending the immigration and naturalization laws, have determined to vote for Doctor McDonald for Governor, and James McM. Shafter for Congress, if the comet does not by a switch of its blazing tail knock us all out of existence before the opening hour of the polls on the 7th day of the coming melancholy November. We are brave enough to dare the consequences of casting an individual vote for an old Republican like Doctor McDonald, whose only public crime in life has been to cure drunkards with Vinegar Bitters, and who has had the manly courage, although a Kentuckian, to have been a member of the Republican party since the days of abolition, and to have been loyal to the Union of his native land all through the dark and dismal days of the civil war. We are brave enough to dare to stand upon a platform, and the only one, that has the courage to uphold the law and abide the decisions of courts in reference to all property; that places corporate wealth, and individual possessions, and personal liberty, under the protection of just and equal laws; that has the courage to declare that the unregulated traffic in alcoholic drink is a crime challenging the attention of all humane people, and demanding legal restraint; that has the courage to attempt to wrest the American Sabbath from the desecration of German fiddlers, lager-beer drinkers, and Irish whisky-bloats; that has the courage to declare that the reasons therefor are that Christians may on Sunday have the opportunity to worship God without being interrupted by the noisy clamors of the worshippers of the drunken god Silenus, or the votaries of King Gambrinus; that is brave enough to declare that the Papal church, pope, priest, or Jesuitical layman shall not lay its prehensile ecclesiastical paw upon one dollar of the school fund, or introduce an ave, bead, prayer, sign of the cross, or genuflection into our free public schools. These votes will not make a governor, but they will influence the making of all the governors that shall come after. We shall not win this fight, but we shall dig the trenches, plant the bastions, and build the fortifications behind which other battles shall be fought and won. In our ranks there will be no man wounded, and from the field there will be carried no man dead. The 7th of November will be neither an Austerlitz nor a Waterloo to the prohibition party, but it will be a white day marked in the calendar of reform; and the time will be when every man—especially every Republican—will be proud of the fact that he contributed to the chastisement of a party that had gone astray through cowardice, and had fallen into the leadership of unprincipled party bosses. The same whip of scorpions is now being wielded for the chastisement of the Republican party in Ohio, New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana.

"Social Life in California."

Under the above heading there appears in the November Lippincott an article, which, were it not for a certain heavy earnestness about it, would be taken for a satire, written by a Californian. But it is evidently written by a stranger. Some extracts from it will be entertaining. The writer says:

San Francisco is by no means the social centre of California, nor do Californians so regard it. There are three sets—the Knob (sic) Hill and the professional coteries. Knob Hill is geographically exclusive, for one has to be drawn up on an endless-chain street-car. There dwell the bonanza kings and millionaires. When they want to go up or down they drive around a circuitous route; but access to the heart of the city can be had in ten minutes by the cars, which run in trains of two. One of these is open, and in this the seats are placed back to back, giving the occupants a good opportunity to view the palatial residences they are passing. The routine of fashionable life in San Francisco is an early breakfast and drive in the park and to the Cliff House or Woodward's Gardens, an hour or two's shopping at the White House, lunch, visiting, dinners, and a ball, frequently preceded by the theatre or opera.

Woodward's Gardens in San Francisco is not unlike the Jardin des Plantes in Paris in this respect at least—the cits never go there. You can find gray-haired Parisians who have never seen the Jardin des Plantes. And the notion of a "drive" to Woodward's fills a San Franciscan with mirth. But our scribe goes on:

Every lady has a reception, and invitations to festivities are easily obtained for strangers visiting the city. Professional circles draw their lines a little closer. Their members entertain hospitably, and one who has a talent for society may easily obtain the entree; but wealth, as mere wealth, is ignored.

The fact that "wealth as wealth" is ignored in this city will have the charm of novelty to most of us. The gilding on the calf need not be very thick to make us fall and worship him. But the writer goes on to define the gradations of "our society":

The real centre of California society is at San José, one of the oldest settlements in the State, and a point to which Americans flocked long before they began to settle in San Francisco. All through California one hears San José referred to as the high seat of wealth, culture, and refinement. It is quite an introduction to respect to say of a lady: "Her family came from San José."

This, we must admit, is true. It can not be denied, however, that the aristocracy of San Andreas takes the pas of the San José noblesse, while to say of any one, "Her family came from Milpitas," stamps her at once as being of the caste of Vere de Vere.

The writer then proceeds to explain the superiority of the bucolic aristocracy:

It is not because there is really more money in the Santa Clara Valley, of which San José is the chief city, than in other sections—indeed, there are very many richer places—but here the capital is anchored. It is in tangible things, like lands and cattle, it has been in families for several generations, and it is accompanied by social and educational advantages. There are not the same fluctuations of family circumstances that are seen elsewhere, and in a perfect climate and amid the luxuries of life the young women of the Santa Clara Valley develop into the most charming specimens of their sex. They escape all the irksomeness of housekeeping, for the Chinese were introduced early, and have become habituated to the routine of living. Another thing that facilitates this comfortable experience is that in the matter of clothing there are no changes of seasons to provide for, and the burden of shopping is lessened in geometrical proportion.

This also can not be gainsayed. The lily-white hands of San José maidens never toy with dirty dishes, nor wrestle with the turbid flap-jack batter. They sit at the window, like Sister Ann, and smile upon the San Francisco drummer; and if he cometh not, they sally forth in phaetons, drive around the railway station, and proceed to mash him from afar. As to the "burden of shopping" being lessened, no unprejudiced observer, after comparing San José and San Francisco girls, can deny that the former do a great deal less of it.

THE NAHL COLLECTION.

II.

A second visit to the rooms of the Art Association reveals many interesting works, which, beside the larger and more conspicuous pictures, become modestly unobtrusive unless the searching glance of the observant visitor coaxes them from their obscurity. Chief among these is a small painting by Thomas Wyck (71), showing the study of a philosopher in the dim half-light peculiar to the Dutch school; the central figure, illuminated by a sheet of strong light breaking through the open casement, looks up from the work whereon he has been engaged, in a startled manner, as he suddenly becomes aware of the presence of Death, who grimly looms behind his armchair. The remarkable treatment of the transparent shadows, the accuracy of drawing and perspective, the intelligent breadth of handling, while they carefully preserve every detail of the mediæval interior, characterize this work as one of the finest examples of that school. No. 65, by Van Ruysdael, belongs to the same epoch in art, and shows a similar treatment as applied to outdoor subjects; it will amply repay a careful study, and will prove particularly interesting to artists. Franz Snyders, one of the greatest and most prolific of still-life and animal painters, whose works grace every prominent gallery in Europe, is represented by but one painting in this collection—No. 67. "Fox and Hound"—but that one is very happily chosen. Though scarcely less than two hundred and fifty years old, the colors in this picture are strong and distinct, bringing out the boldness of handling and conception in refreshing contrast to later, more timid, and generally weaker work of the same class. No. 20, "Lucretia and Tarquin," by Giorgio Barbarelli, is the best illustration in this collection of the true quality of the old masters. The flesh is soft and mellow, with a peculiar life-like glow which modern artists constantly strive for, and seldom attain. Whether this is owing to the rich maturity of the carefully ground pigments, or whether it is due to the superior judgment of selecting the same, or whether the careful "handling" is the cause, the fact remains that the more one contemplates that work the stronger grows the impression of form, of life, of action, of emotion, until the admiration of the work ends in true reverence for the master who wrought it. The expression of mingled fear and loathing in the features of Lucretia does not detract from the charming beauty of her classic profile; the soft contours seem to stiffen with the effort at escape, and the figure leans out of the couch from which it is partly raised, and seems almost to hang out of the frame.

Nos. 10 and 11 are peculiarly mated humors by Gerard de Laivasse. Painted probably at periods widely apart, his career as an artist extending over more than forty-five years, it seems almost as if No. 11 were the caricatured maturity of the first conception. In No. 10 the boy Bacchus is carried upon the back of one of his playmates, the incarnation of innocence and infantile sport, the entire scene lacking but the echo of their laughter to complete the idyl; while beneath, in his "Bacchus appearing to drinkers," the revel and the extravagance, the flush of intoxication, and the coarse ribaldry of a full-fledged orgy are faithfully and graphically represented; Bacchus has exchanged the playmate for a cask of wine, and is astride of the same in anything but a steady or dignified attitude, while the playmates of his youth are changed to first-class guzzlers, and the pure grape of his childhood is transformed into glittering carafes filled with fiery liquor. As an illustration of French art of the latter part of the seventeenth century these two works will prove highly interesting. A Magdalen, evidently a painting belonging to the first years of the sixteenth century, the work of Badile, the teacher of Paul Veronese, has not as good a place as it deserves, but is strong enough to show, even so high above the line, the beauty of its modeling.

No. 30, a Carlo Cignani, represents "The Monks of St. Cajetan converting their monastery into a hospital," and the religious idea, that their charity meets with manifestations of approval by the Deity, is babbly conceived and very well rendered; there are portions of this painting which are masterly in execution, and will prove very gratifying to the student. In the "Stoning of St. Stephen" (No. 53) by Van Laer, the crouching figure in the foreground is particularly impressive and remarkable; and though the picture as a whole is not well composed, there are some single figures that make it well worthy of a careful study. An unquestionably genuine sketch by Rubens, "Samson in combat with the lion," ought to arrest the attention of artists. It is evidently a very hasty memorandum of a great idea; yet one which shows his style and manner distinctively and well. No. 49, a portrait by Gortzius (about 1580), is an exquisite flesh-painting, but suffers in common with some other works in this collection from the ravages of the would-be restorer, who in this case carried high-lights of flesh color over flesh-tints mellow with age, and thereby marred a really enjoyable work.

But it is outside of the catalogued works that the art-lover finds the most enjoyable objects in this collection. A pencil-sketch of a sleeping infant, by Van Dyke, with a face and attitude full of the sweetest repose, suggested, no doubt, his great picture of the "Holy Family," a first-print of which is found in the same frame. It is interesting to compare the executed work with the sketch, and to miss much of the first inspiration in the elaboration. Two exquisite sketches by Poussin need only be discovered to call forth the liveliest interest of any one in sympathy with art. An original study in red ochre, by Correggio, is so powerful and so full of feeling and beauty that any praise bestowed upon it would sound hollow and inadequate; another sketch by the same hand, executed in sepia, is a wonderful bit of realism conceived in his imagination, and should be studied for its conscientious self-correction outlined upon the same leaf. Two remarkable water-colors, by Eli, both so highly finished that the minutest examination will find them true to nature, and yet so well arranged that they possess the rare quality of making, an excellent ensemble, should not be overlooked. The copies of the friezes of the Pantheon alone are enough to provoke more comment than this space admits, and the case of curios and cameos in the same room would remunerate an hour's observation, not to say anything about the many interesting prints and drawings that crowd that little ment.

YORKER'S PARD.

II.

The day had broken and a few stragglers, momentarily increasing in numbers, were making their way to the hotel for their matutinal sustenance—liquid, of course. But few knew or recognized the mud-spashed man who sat with head bowed nearly to his chest. Sleepily the hostler lounged in for an "eye-opener." Yorker roused to give directions regarding some oats for his cayuse, and then sank back again, and, with stolid indifference to the noise steadily increasing about him, dozed till summoned to breakfast.

Eight o'clock saw the two men ride away from the bar. Two o'clock found them by the sick man's side.

"Pretty badly used up," said the doctor, laying his finger gently on the swollen wrist, in which the fevered pulse leaped and surged.

"Doc, cure him and name your figgers. I'll cover it to the limit of my pile."

"I think that I can have him around in a week."

A flash of joy irradiated Yorker's face, and a deep sigh of relief told of the fears which had filled the true heart. Grasping the doctor's hand with painful earnestness, Yorker turned away. The doctor's prediction was not an over-confident one. How could he succeed in so short a time? Briefly, salicylic acid did it. You doubt it? May you never have to prove it. The fact remains that, at the end of a week, Wade was convalescent. The surgeon left at the end of two days.

"Now, understand me, Mr. Wade," said he, upon leaving, "no more mining this season. Quiet and rest, with a trip to Yreka when you feel able to stand so long a journey. Drink very moderately and smoke in proportion. Live well, and keep up your spirits. Good-bye." And he stepped carefully into the canoe Yorker held for him.

Wade followed these directions in all particulars excepting the last—he did not keep up his spirits. It was no easy matter, passing long days of enforced idleness while the rain fell with that apparently eternal persistence, gliding down from the gray mist which spanned the gorge, day after day, till earth and rock, tree and shrub, everything in nature bore that desolate aspect so trying to the cheeriest disposition.

Sitting at the door of the cabin, Wade watched with listless, moody eye the drops as they splashed sullenly into the yellow flood and were whirled away, until he felt almost tempted to plunge in and court oblivion from self. Now and then he would crawl down to the claim and watch the work, at first even trying to do a little himself. But that idea he soon gave up. His efforts were rewarded by such pigmy-like results that shame kept him idle.

Yorker was a host during those dark days; always cheerful, submitting to the sick man's caprices with a rare patience, which seemed almost to have an element of expiation in it, so guarded and gentle was it; beguiling the long evenings with his many adventures; planning more pleasures for both when the season should have closed, and Wade be able to travel; always on the look-out for some bit of news to interest a sick man's fancy, even giving up his exclusiveness and cultivating men who would be companionable to Wade.

Regularly he set aside Wade's half of the "clean-ups," and the pile grew and grew. Yorker's did not increase in equal ratio, however. Books from Frisco; delicate food to tempt a fickle appetite; softer bedding for a tired frame; a great easy-chair, in which Yorker had never been known to sit; these and many other things appeared quietly and unobtrusively, almost unperceived by Wade, for he had fallen into a morbid state from which it was difficult to rouse him.

So the long winter passed on, and Wade gained slowly in strength, even getting as far as the camp on sunny days. But Yorker was always on hand at dusk, to help him home, and lighten the pull up the bills, and ease the rough descents.

One day in early spring the weather suddenly changed, and a heavy fall of snow whitened the Siskiyou and draped the hills with ermine. The miners on the river bars looked anxious. A sudden melting of the snow would raise all the streams, and the Klamath would "boom." If so, good-bye to work. A sudden rise would flood all diggings, and wash away flumes, wheels, and windmills. Renewed activity took possession of the camp. Immediate steps for a general "clean-up" were taken.

The result of the season was most satisfactory. Wade's share had grown from hundreds to thousands. He had uttered a protest when the result was made known to him; but Yorker's remonstrances and his own indifference settled the matter quietly.

The two men had decided to start for Yreka, on their way to San Francisco, in a few days. One day Yorker said:

"Pard, I've got everything fixed now—got a boss outfit—and we can up stakes and make a break to-morrow, if yer say so."

"All right, old man, we will make a start to-morrow. Going up to the cabin now? Well, I'll be up in an hour or so," and, with a nod, he sauntered away.

Yorker looked frequently at the sky, as he made his way up the trail. He did not like its appearance. The wind had shifted to the south, and was growing sensibly warmer. Clouds were creeping slowly up over the crest of the range, and the sun shone fitfully. Yorker shook his head, and muttered: "Ought'er lit out a week ago."

It was a task with an element of pain in it for Yorker to put things in shape in his little cabin for an indefinite absence. He lingered over the packing and arranging with an almost womanly care.

Noon came, but Wade did not. Yorker stood at the door, looking across the river and down the trail for the familiar figure. He advanced to the edge of the ledge, and stood watching the yellow water. It was rising rapidly. It was evident from the brushwood, and huge logs, and tree-trunks, which from time to time came sweeping by. A splash of rain fell upon his hand. He looked up quickly, and saw that the sky was dark and lowering. Another drop fell upon his cheek; it was warm, and was followed by others quickly.

"Too late!" muttered Yorker. "I wish the youngster would come. It's like to be hard gittin' over the river afore night."

The rain was falling heavily now, and the wind, which had been, drove it in sharp, wavering lines across the yellow flood, which grew darker and more turbulent as the hours passed.

"It's been rainin' for all that's out up the river, I'll bet my life. That water never came from this shower. Old Klamath will be a holy terror by mornin', if it keeps up this lick. It's gittin' dark fast. I wish that Wade would come. What in thunder can be a-keepin' him?" and Yorker blew the smoke from his lips impatiently. A faint halloo seemed to answer his query, and, hastening to the edge of the ledge, he could faintly discern a figure on the opposite bank.

"Thank God, it's the boy!" exclaimed he, fervently, and, hastening to the canoe, he pushed off, and with no little difficulty gained the opposite shore.

"I'm glad that you're here, pard. An hour later an' I doubt if I could have made the riffle. The old Klamath is boomin', for a fact."

Wade made no reply, and Yorker, looking at him more closely, saw that his eyes were bright with power and excitement, and his lips had a new expression of firmness and energy about them. He looked older and sterner, and no trace of his recent physical weakness was evident. When the canoe touched the bar, he sprang out, and strode away up the trail with a quick, nervous step. Yorker watched him uneasily, muttering: "What the devil has come to the boy? Reckon he has been at the tarantula-juice."

The river was rising fast, and log, and trunk, and stump followed each other in quick succession. Here and there fragments of flumes, wheels, and cribs showed that the bars above were being rapidly submerged. Now and then some huge tree would dash madly against the ledge, and, sullenly rebounding from the dull shock amid a shower of spray, surge back, and be whirled away in the gloom.

It was quite dark when Yorker entered the cabin. Wade was pacing restlessly to and fro, and looked up quickly, saying: "Is this likely to delay our trip much, Yorker?"

There was something sharp, almost fierce, in his voice, and he paused, anxiously awaiting an answer.

"Wall, pard, I'm afeared we won't git off much under a week," replied Yorker, filling his pipe. Wade scowled blackly, and resumed his restless tramp. Yorker sat down and smoked silently. At length Wade spoke in a voice of repressed excitement: "By heaven, Yorker! I can't remain here idle for a whole week. I must get away somehow. Must, do you hear?"

"Why, pard, what's come to yer? Have yer had a row in camp?" said Yorker, anxiously.

"No; nothing of the kind. By heaven, Yorker! I can hardly tell you what is the matter. I am nearly mad, I believe. It's about Charley," then, with a sudden burst of rage: "My God! to think that he was murdered! Murdered, and yet not avenged. Shot like a dog, and by a man who owed him everything. But I swear, by Almighty God, that I will follow that hound to the ends of the earth, and I will have his life."

"How did yer hear of it, pard?" asked Yorker, huskily. "Met a man to-day, who was in Sacramento at the time, and knew of the whole affair." Then turning suddenly upon his friend, he asked, sharply: "Where were you, Yorker, when Charley died?"

"I—I was sick myself in Sacramento."

"But you must have known something about the affair?"

"Yes, pard. I did know about it."

"You knew about it, and have kept me in ignorance all these months, while that hound still lives? You, a friend of Charley, and you let that black-hearted scoundrel escape your vengeance? My God, what friendship! Curse all such!"

"Pard, perhaps yer ain't altogether got the rights o' that affair," said Yorker, gently.

"Rights? No, by God, I have not; but let me but once meet this Ewing and I will have," returned Wade, with sinister meaning, and going to the locker he poured out a full glass of whisky. Yorker rose hastily. "No more of that stuff to-night, for God's sake, pard!" and he advanced as if to enforce a command. Wade looked him over contemptuously, and deliberately emptied the glass. Yorker flushed and turned away. There was a hardening of the stern lines about his mouth, and something of despair in his eyes as he resumed his seat by the fire. Wade paced the cabin with restless, unsteady stride. The fiery liquor was doing its work rapidly.

"To-morrow I start. Do you what you choose," said he, savagely.

Yorker rose slowly and stood leaning heavily against the stone chimney. He was very pale, and there was a hunted look in his eyes. His voice sounded dry and old as he said, painfully:

"Pard, I will help you to find—this—Ewing. I—I know him—well, and I—I know whar he is."

Wade whirled around, and exclaimed:

"Your hand on that, Yorker. I was wrong; forgive me," and he advanced with extended hand. But Yorker shrank from him, and stretched out his arm as if to avert an attack.

"Wait, pard," said he, huskily. Then by a supreme effort he drew himself together, and, looking Wade full in the eyes, said, simply: "Pard, I am your Ewing."

Wade suddenly recoiled from him—doubt, dread, rage depicted on his face.

"You? You are the man who killed my brother?"

"God help me! I am."

A flash of sudden fury, of terrible exultation sprang into Wade's eyes. He was wild with rage and liquor.

"Heel yourself!" he exclaimed with deadly earnestness. "Heel yourself, Yorker, for, by God, I'll kill you!"

"Pard, for God's sake, give me time; let me explain," cried Yorker, pleadingly.

"Damn you, heel yourself, you cowardly hound, or I'll shoot you where you stand!" cried Wade, savagely, snatching his revolver. Yorker's pistol was in his hand in an instant. Wade saw the flash of his eyes and fired quickly. Yorker staggered a little, but still stood erect. Wade raised his pistol again, the instinct of self-preservation strong upon him. Yorker stretched out his hand.

"Hold on, pard. You have shot straight. Don't waste good powder." And, tossing his unused weapon upon the bunk, he pressed his hand to his breast and sank into a chair, slipping thence to the ground, where he lay white with agony. Wade was sobered now, but a sense of stern justice had succeeded his wild rage. He advanced and knelt by the wounded man's side. A blood-stained hole in the breast of the blue shirt showed where the bullet had entered.

"Through the lungs," Wade muttered to himself.

"Yes, pard, you've called in my checks, for a fact," murmured Yorker, faintly.

Wade tore up some linen and tried to bandage the wound. The bleeding was slight—fatal sign. Making a pallet on the floor near the fire, he helped Yorker to it; threw some bark on the falling embers, and then gloomily sat down by his companion's side.

His brain was in a whirl. A year seemed to have passed since that morning. Justice! Vengeance! The two words were burned on his brain. Justice! Yes, he had it; but at what a cost—the death of his friend! Stay, not his friend. The murderer of his brother, and the hard lines settled about the stern mouth once more. Vengeance! Yes, he had avenged his brother, even by the sacrifice of his friend. That he had sacrificed his friend to his sense of duty, seemed to breathe an element of comfort into the horrible reality of his act. He strove to feel that he was but a blind instrument in the hand of an avenging fate. Pitiful fool!

A terrible silence seemed to brood over them as the minutes slipped by. The rain pattered ceaselessly upon the roof, and the river hoarsely murmured in the night.

The wounded man breathed fitfully and moved restlessly. Some assistance must be obtained, and at once. Wade leaned over his companion, and said, gently:

"Yorker, I must go for help. I can not let you die in this cold-blooded manner."

Yorker opened his eyes suddenly. Grasping Wade's hand, he said, eagerly:

"Not yet, oh, not yet, pard. Don't leave me; I've got somethin' to tell yer, pard, if yer'll let me. There aint no one can help me—I'm down to hard-pan an' workin' out fast." Then turning his wan face so that he might watch his companion's, and gently holding his passive hand, he said: "Pard, won't yer let me give you the rights of this unfortunate affair? I'll allow that you've got your rights; but, pard, I want mine." Gloomily resting his head on his disengaged hand, Wade assented, and Yorker continued:

"Pard, I'll allow that yer brother was a white man, an' staked me when I was flat broke an' cleaned out. He took me up in Colorado, in '59, when the Pike's Peak excitement had busted me, and put up the dust to take us both to Californy. Thar we went to minin' on the American River, an' struck it rich. We worked for all that was out that season, made our pile, an' cleaned out our claim. Then we made a break for Sacramento, intendin' to have a regular tear so long as the dust held out. We was goin' to Frisco, to take in the town an' show 'em how to live. Well, pard, we struck Sacramento in the fall of '59, an' it was a lively camp and you hear me! Charley an' I was never separated; an', pard, we never had a word which warn't perlit an' kindful. We put the dust in one bag, an' each took his pinch without no countin'.

"Pard, if there was one thing more'n another yer brother staked his pile on, it was his game of poker. I'll allow that he was a terror, an' could clean out most professionals, but thar was one man that could go over him invariably. That was me. But, pard, we never had no words about it. The dust always went back into the bag.

"One night—we had both been howlin' for a week, an' was purty nervous—one night Charley had cleaned out a couple of poker sharps, an' was chock full o' pride an' tarantula-juice, an' nothin' would do but I must play him then and thar. I begged off, but he got mad about it, so I took a hand.

"We was both in a bad way, an' I never seed him so on-reasonable afore. Wall, I was rakin' in his slugs, as usual, an' he was gittin' hotter an' more reckless every minit. I wanted to stop, but he wouldn't.

"At last, pard, I had called him on a straight flush, with all his dust in the pot. He seed he was busted, and got white. I had three straights that game, an' at the last one he swore I was playin' a brace on him. Pard, it was just luck; an' I got mad at once, an' called him a liar—as wasn't perlit, I'll allow. Pard, he was allers a quick man with his gun, an' the first thing I knowed I had a bullet in my left breast. I don't know what follered; I was mad with the pain, for I shot him the next minute. He lived two days; an' afore he died he allowed that it was not my fault, an' that he got the drop on me first. I stood trial before the committee, an' was acquitted. Here's the mark of his bullet, pard," added he, simply, and drawing aside his shirt, the depressed scar was plainly visible on the broad chest. "Gimme a little whisky, pard, I—I'm kinder faint."

Wade rose wearily, brought the drink, and administered it gently. His hand lingered on the damp brow and dark hair streaked with gray, and in his eyes was a terrible longing—the birth of remorse.

"Pard," continued Yorker, in a weaker tone, "when I found out that you was Charley's brother I'll allow I oughter told yer at once what I have told yer. But when I seed how heavy you was struck, an' the bad fix you was in, I thought as how I'd wait a spell, and git you braced up a bit, and in the meantime I thought—I thought I might be able to—to make it up to you—a little—yer loss—seen' as I was the one as had brought it to yer. An', pard, I did try—first, 'cause I felt it was yer right; but after a time, 'cause I loved yer, pard," and the voice sank almost to a sob.

Wade was down on his knees now by the dying man's side. The hot tears ran splashing down on the brave breast he had so cruelly wounded.

"My God, Yorker, you are killing me!" he groaned. "God in heaven, what have I done! Dear old fellow, so brave, so tender, so true. What a horrible return for all your kindness to me—all your tender care?" and, casting himself prone upon the ground, he was convulsed with heart-breaking sobs.

Yorker's rough hand stole out, and rested lovingly upon the soft, fair hair. Its touch seemed to soothe the repentant, remorseful man. He grew calmer, and, moving gently at last, took the caressing band, and, seating himself by the pallet once more, said in a voice, tremulous still, and at times pitifully tender: "Dear old fellow, God knows how bitterly I regret my terrible haste; how willingly I would lie in your place. If you had only fired first, and saved me this horrible mistake!" and he shuddered.

"I calculated to disable yer, pard; but yer got the drop on me," said Yorker, simply.

"There is no one of your many acts of kindness which does not come back to me now, dear old fellow, and I now feel the tenderness which prompted them as I never did then. It is a fearful thing to have the weight of all this accumulated care and love come upon me at once. Oh, Yorker! Yorker! what have I done? A lifetime of service could not repay you, and I have killed you!"

"Pard, dear boy, don't take it so rough. If yer can only say honestly that I have in any way made up yer loss to yer, ever so little, I'll not mind this. But, dear boy, I'd kinder hate to leave yer, feelin' as how I'd made a misflicker of the whole business."

"Dear old fellow," said Wade, laying his hand wistfully against the rough, bearded cheek, "no one could have done more to expiate a fault which was no fault. You have been more than a brother to me; for you have been brother and friend."

"Pard, don't say no more. Just let me think o' them words. I'm satisfied," and with closed eyes and a gentle smile on his lips, Yorker lay softly smoothing Wade's hand. Suddenly the closed eyes opened, and there was an expression of fear in them. The dying man's ears had caught a strange and ominous sound.

"Ned, old man—look at the river—quick; tell me how it stands," he gasped. Wade moved quickly to the door.

"My God, Yorker, it is up to the edge of the ledge. I must see to the boat," and he disappeared in the darkness.

It was a terrible scene which met his view as his eyes became accustomed to the gloom. Out of the darkness above sprang great swirling, toiling waves, which hissed and madly tossed their yellow crests as they rushed by and were suddenly absorbed by the gloom below. Huge stumps with wide-spreading roots plunged heavily on, turning over and over like some creature of destruction abroad in the wild storm which had given them birth. As far as the eye could pierce the gloom, the tossing surface of the yellow flood seemed strewn with weird, indefinable shapes instinct with savage life. Black masses reared majestically above the seething waters, and suddenly sank utterly from view, dragged down by unseen mysterious forces. Over all hung the gloom of a starless heaven from which fell the rain ceaselessly.

The opposite bank was rather imagined than seen. As Wade gazed, awe-struck, on the grand scene before him, a faint, fitful flame gleamed on that unseen shore; then slowly expanding to a broad blaze, cast a lurid glow across the night. Here and there moving objects could be distinguished clustered together. Then Wade knew that their peril was known to the miners. The roar of the waters deadened all ordinary sounds, but a faint cheer told Ned that he was seen. He found the canoe beating dangerously against a rock in the eddy, and drew it carefully upon the ledge. Frail was the chance of escape it offered in that mad swirl of water.

He hastened back to the cabin. Yorker was resting on his elbow. The stamp of death was on his face.

"Yorker, old man, we must get out of this at once," said Wade, hurriedly. "It is one chance in a thousand that we will get through, but we must take that chance. Can you help yourself at all?"

"Pard, I don't need to cross the river—to save my life. I'll pass in my checks soon now—I feel it comin' over me. You must go at once. Don't try to cross in the usual way, or you'll get swamped sure. Let her run down with the current, an' perhaps yer can dodge the logs and make an eddy on the other side. Hurry, lad, yer haven't a moment to lose."

"What!" cried Wade, "leave you here in that cowardly manner! We go together or not at all." And he sat down doggedly by Yorker's side.

"For God's sake, pard, don't throw away your life in that way," exclaimed the dying man, earnestly. "I'm goin' fast, an' couldn't make the raffle any way. Dear old fellow, do go. Think of all the long life yet before you. Don't throw it away just for to stay with a played-out old cuss like me. Good-bye, old fellow, good-bye," pressing the hand he held. Wade bent down quickly and softly touched the pleading lips with his, and went out. The dying eyes followed him with a tender, heart-breaking longing in them, and two tears stole down the wan cheeks.

A shout greeted Wade's appearance upon the ledge, over which the water was creeping in greedy, snaky waves.

The crowd saw the canoe pushed into the river, and held its breath to witness the fearful embarkation. Where was the other partner? What were they waiting for? Why, in God's name, didn't they hurry? Each moment threatened destruction to the frail cabin. The fire flamed luridly. Suddenly a groan burst from the hushed multitude. The canoe was seen to shoot out into the flood, but it was empty, and the solitary figure on the ledge watched it for an instant, and then turned and walked slowly to the cabin and disappeared. Yorker started and gazed anxiously in Wade's face as he reëntered.

"The boat"—began he.

"—is gone," said Wade, quietly resuming his seat.

"Pard, you didn't go an'—", and Yorker paused, and gazed into his friend's white, quiet face. Wade laid his cheek close to the rough beard, and said, softly: "Dear old fellow, I am, oh, so thankful to be saved a life-long remorse and loneliness."

A faint hand-clasp was Yorker's mute reply. The gloom deepened, the fire went out with a hiss, the rain fell sorrowfully, and the dull boom of the flood sounded a dirge for the friends, who, hand clasped in hand, awaited death.

The catastrophe to the canoe had roused the assembled miners to renewed efforts for rescuing the imperiled men. Heavier boats and ropes had been sent for. Many methods had been discussed and abandoned. Each moment was precious now. One inexplicable problem was the theme of every tongue: the strange inactivity of the occupants of the cabin. It was destined soon to be solved.

A daring attempt to cross the river above the bar, attain the cliff which overhung the cabin, and by means of ropes lowered from thence to rescue the men, was about to be made.

The rescuing party were on the point of starting. Grim farewells were being said during the last hurried preparations. The fire had died down, and a heavy shadow concealed the ledge. A dull thud, followed by a rending and crashing, came shudderingly out of the darkness. A great hush fell on the crowd. The fire blazed once more luridly. The yellow flood dashed against the base of the cliff unchecked. The ledge was empty.

October, 1882. HARRY W. LEAVENS.

VANITY FAIR.

There was a time when the European pilgrim could be instantly known by the cut of her clothes; but these delightful ear-marks can be no longer monopolized by ladies who have crossed the raging main to secure them. The stay-at-home wears as chic a toilet, though she pays double what it would cost abroad. The distinction is felt in the pocket; but it is not observed in the street.

This is the sort of costume a young woman wears in France when she pays afternoon visits to the country: The color is blue, in four shades, none of which are bright, and the short, round skirt is trimmed with fifteen narrow frills, each frill being one of the four shades. The bodice is dark at the shoulders and waist; the sash tied at the back is of wide silk ribbon, with shaded stripes, in which the four tints are reproduced. Mademoiselle also wears a Spanish toque, with a bouquet of roses at one side, and a blonde mantilla tied on the bosom and carried to the back, where it is again knotted.

That loveliest of laces, valenciennes, is coming in again for evening wear. Imitation can not reach these new designs for flouncings, one of which is of curled feathers intertwined and crossing each other, and another, as artistic, of a series of shells forming the border of the flounce. Seen among new fancy laces is a treatment of raised flowers—a species of appliqué—which is very rich and novel. A fine piece of oriental lace has large raised harebells scattered over it; and another pattern, shaped into a grand Veronese collar, is sprinkled with roses and tiny leaflets.

A lady at White Sulphur Springs is said to have worn a pair of shoes that cost thirty-nine dollars. Her stockings cost ninety dollars. They were black silk, and midway between ankle and knee was a green tree embroidered in silk, and resting on the branches of the tree were brightly-plumed birds, some in the act of flying. On the "bulge" or largest part of the stocking was a huntsman, clad in red shirt and trousers, taking aim at the birds in the tree. Upon the instep was the monogram of the lady wrought in gold letters. Between the knee and the upper part of the stocking were eighteen narrow bands of many varying hues.

Strange are the vagaries of fashion! Among the latest of its freaks is said to be the introduction of "prayer rugs," to be used by fashionable ladies. They have come from the misty East, along with Japanese goods, hashish, attar of roses, and other delectable things, and the aroma of "Araby the Blest" is supposed to cling to them, even when they are bought from an Irish Turk on Broadway. They are described as being similar to those used by the Mohammedans, are usually about three by four feet in size, and can be distinguished by the design, which always represents some large figure at one end, and is pointed at the other. Places are indicated for the hands and knees. Devout women procure the real things from an importer, and, without facing Mecca, bumping their heads on the floor, or removing their shoes and stockings, like the sons of the Prophet, still actually do use them to kneel on while praying. They are said to be a great comfort.

No one who visited Newport this season, says the New York Times, after a few years' absence, could fail to be struck with the astonishing wave of luxury which has rolled over that abode of American fashion. This season there were probably thirty people who had cooks at salaries of from fifty to one hundred dollars a month, and whose monthly expenses for living were not less than five and six thousand dollars. Many of these families have altogether twenty servants, of whom half are men, several being in livery; in fact, the town is alive with smart grooms in buckskin and top-boots. And yet it is not long ago that a lady was almost mobbed in New York for riding with a groom similarly equipped behind her. And even ten years ago very few owners of carriages ventured on anything in the way of livery beyond trousers of what was deemed a "horsey" hue, and a bit of velvet ribbon—a remarkably stupid and inappropriate piece of ornamentation, by the way—around their servants' hats, while there certainly were not five people who drove with two servants on the box.

The New York Herald gives the following regarding gentlemen's fashions for the coming fall and winter: In silk hats, the bell-crown is worn in two heights, both lower than last season, and with heavy, rolling brim. In evening dress suits, the swallow-tail coat is made from black West of England cloth, or fine Wales worsteds. The collar and lapels are cut narrower; the roll is not quite so extended; the skirt a little shorter. Both shawl and notched collars are worn and silk facings are decidedly the choice. The vests are cut to button four buttons, with rolling collars. For demi-dress suits the double-breasted frock-coat, or, as it is sometimes called, the Prince Albert, is used in making morning calls, promenading, and, in some cases, at weddings, especially when the bride is dressed in traveling costume. Very many stylish young men wear colored worsteds made into double-breasted frock-coats. The colors most in demand are browns, grays, and olives. Under the head of walking-coat suits come the single-breasted cutaway coats, one, three, four, and five buttons. The waist remains about the same length, but the skirts are longer than last season. Business suits are also made with the above-mentioned form of coats, but the single-breasted saque-coat is the most universally worn. All coats outline the figure closely at the back, especially those intended for full and half-dress. The number of buttons is limited to four on most coats. Trousers continue to be cut nearly skin tight, with a tendency to a slight increase in size at no distant day. Vests are cut straight across at the bottom, quite short, single-breasted, and buttoned up high, without collar, or with a small rolling collar. In overcoats the single and double-breasted over-saque, and also single and double-breasted surtouts will be worn. The coat most generally worn will be the single-breasted saque. The single-breasted surtout, with very long skirt, will take the place of the ulster to a great degree.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

A Good Little Boy.

Charles was a little boy who loved his Mother dearly, and whenever she told him anything he was very careful to Obey.

One day in the Spring, when the birds were singing and the buds on the apple-trees were almost ready to burst into beautiful white blossoms, Charles asked his mother for Ten Cents to buy Marbles, for the ground was getting dry, and the other boys were beginning to enjoy their favorite Sport. "You can have the money, my son," said the Mother, "but you must promise me not to play for Keeps, and every night that you can come home and tell me truthfully that you have not disobeyed your Mamma, I will give you a Large Red Apple." And then she kissed him Fondly, and he went gayly away to School.

But before Charles had gone very far he met Thomas Tough, who was a Bad boy. Charles told Thomas about the Ten Cents that his Mother had given him to buy Marbles with, and also told him that he could not play for Keeps unless he was willing to go without the Red Apple.

When Thomas heard this he said: "Give me the Marbles that you are going to buy, and I will play with them for Keeps, and after School is out we will Divide what I have won, for I am a Superior Player. Then you can truthfully tell your Mother that you have not been playing for Keeps, and will receive the Red Apple."

So Charles gave his Marbles to Thomas, and after School was out asked him how many Marbles he had Won.

"I did not Win," replied Thomas; "I struck a Hard Crowd, and lost."

Then Charles was sad, for he was a pretty Tight-Fisted little boy, and began to Cry. But presently he said to Thomas: "You are a naughty boy, and I hate you Very Much."

And then Thomas hit Charles in the Nose, and threw him down in the Dirt, making his new panties look very bad indeed.

So when Charles reached home he told his Papa all about his troubles. When he had finished, his Papa said to him: "You don't know as much as Thompson's Colt, and I am going to take a Crack at you myself."

Then he gave Charles a good Licking, and sent him to bed without any Supper. And when Charles had lain on his Stomach for a while, because he felt more Comfortable that way, he said to himself: "No more Blind Pools for me."

Do you not think he had a Great Head, children? I do.—From "Tales for the Toddlers," by Joseph Medill in Chicago Tribune.

The Trotting-Horse Reporter.

"Want an obituary?"

A rather short man, whose naturally cheerful face wore a look of studied grief that was in strange contrast to the ruddy glow of his cheeks, stood in the doorway.

"Has another old citizen passed away?" inquired the horse reporter. "I never knew one of them to die," he continued; "but every little while a passing away occurs."

"The deceased," said the man in the doorway, "was certainly an old resident; and I may say for purity of—"

"Oh, I know what you are going to say," interrupted the horse reporter. "You were about to remark that, 'for purity of purpose, strict fidelity to the principles that ever guide the man of honor and probity in dealing with his fellow-men, our friend, whose loss we mourn, stood preëminent among his business associates.' Isn't that it?"

"That is certainly the tenor of what I had in mind; but there are other things to be said. He was an aff—"

"You bet he was," said the horse reporter. "I know all about that, too. 'He was an affectionate husband, a kind parent, and nowhere will his loss be more keenly felt than within that hallowed spot where human love is ever strongest, human sorrow ever the most poignant—the sacred precincts of the domestic circle.' Isn't that it?"

"Well, I certainly did intend to say something like that," replied the short man; "but that wasn't all. In the hum—"

"That's right," again interrupted the friend of Maud S. "In the humbler walks of life, our friend who is now no more was often found giving freely of the means with which a kind Providence had endowed him, to alleviate the sufferings of those whom misfortune had ever held within its iron grip. Doesn't that cover what you were going to tell me?"

"Yes," said the short man, "that's something like it. But now that Death—"

"You're right again. 'But now that Death has stilled with his icy breath the heart that such a little time ago was pulsating in the vigor of healthful manhood, and laid prone beneath his silent but irresistible blow the rugged form that had withstood so bravely the assaults of time, there is nothing left to us but a pallid tenement of clay—frail emblem of the proud structure so instinct with life—teaching to all of us, with mournful directness, the sad lesson that in the midst of life we are in Milwaukee—no, in death, I mean—and that this sad event should impress upon us all the necessity of being prepared to meet, with a clear conscience, the summons that calls us away from a life of turmoil and trouble, to one where white-robed Peace stretches forth her broad wings, where sorrow and strife are unknown, and where our departed brother now awaits our coming.' How does that size up with what you were about to remark?"

"Why, that's it exactly," said the visitor, with a sunny smile. "You've got it down pretty fine, haven't you?"

"I should surmise that I had," replied the horse reporter. "I dropped on to this obituary racket early in the action, and if anybody can ring one in on me he can have the bun."

"I guess I won't print the obituary," said the visitor. "The deceased was only a New Jersey man, any how, and they say he never more than half provided for his family, and went to lodge about five nights in the week. Some say he removed to this State from the penitentiary, but I don't know anything about that. He's dead, any how, and dead men can't do anybody much good, can they?"

"Not a great deal," replied the horse reporter.

"Well, so long," said the short man.

"Bon jour," responded the horse reporter. "I don't know what bon jour is, but I heard the literary editor say the other day, and he's far too fly to make any mistake."—Chicago Tribune.

A few months ago a small quantity of wheat was shipped by the Southern Pacific Railroad, via St. Louis and New Orleans, to Liverpool. We are not advised of the charges for the conveying of wheat, nor are we able to state the probable tariff that will be placed upon wheat transported by rail from California to New Orleans, and thence by ships to England. But this fact should challenge the attention of all wheat-growers in this State: viz., before the road was built seventeen dollars a ton was charged for wheat from San Francisco to Liverpool. Wheat is now carried for nine dollars per ton, and it is believed that when the southern road is completed and in working operation, from the Bay of San Francisco to some convenient shipping point on the Gulf of Mexico, the freight, per ton, of wheat will be reduced to seven dollars. This fact is one that ought to impress every farmer in California, and is an answer, complete and satisfactory, to very much of the misrepresentation that politicians are now indulging in with reference to the management of railroads. To the freight-charges by sea, each farmer was compelled to add the amount that was chargeable against his crop for moving it by rail or other mode of transportation from his farm to San Francisco. When the Southern Pacific road is built and fully equipped; when it shall have secured its own docks, wharves, warehouses, and elevators at some convenient Gulf harbor; and when it shall have made its final arrangement for a fleet of wheat-carrying ships from that port to Liverpool, Bremen, Havre, or elsewhere in Europe—the wheat-grower will have secured for himself a system of transportation that will give him the very best of carrying facilities for his crops, and he will have it transported at the very minimum of cost. When this work—one of the most important of all the railroad enterprises as yet undertaken upon the continent—shall be completed, and the rail comes into active and practical competition with the sea, it will produce a revolution in the State. Not only the wheat-raiser, but the wine-producer, the wool, fruit, and bone-growers, and every one of all our industrious producers of any article for shipment, will feel the direct benefit of the only possible competition that could be provided for them. Not only will their productions be cheaply transported, but the market will be brought to their harbors. The small farmer will find a home market which will give him a price for every salable thing grown. In addition to this scheme of carrying outward freights to Europe, it is proposed by the managers of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company to so build their ships that the fleet carrying outbound cargoes of wheat and farm produce will be so arranged that they will accommodate immigrants on their return, thus affording the most speedy, safe, and economical mode of direct European immigration. The difficulty of our immigration problem heretofore has been the fact that immigrants landing at Castle Garden have been induced at every step of their westward passage to stop short of California. The great interior west presented its broad and fertile lands as inducements for homes. The immigrant agent hesitates him at every step. The Eastern railroads are interested that he shall stop along their lines. The Union Pacific was directly interested in the settlement of a vast country tributary to them, so that every possible hindrance was placed in the way of the immigrant destined to California. At every junction along the Union Pacific road, an agent stood ready to offer cheap lands as an inducement for them to make their homes before seeing our State; and when they arrived at our border, the Oregon land-owner was ready to switch them northward to the fertile valley of the Willamette, or the attractive lands of Washington Territory. When this new arrangement is perfected, such cheap through fares will be offered as will give every immigrant an opportunity to see the character of our State before he is compelled, for want of funds to pay excessive railroad charges, to stop short of his destination. We may not fear that the attractive lands of Texas, or the dry plains of New Mexico, or the deserts of New Mexico, will come into serious competitive rivalry with our equable climate, lovely valleys, and broad productive foot-hill lands. And will the Southern Pacific Railroad managers do this thing? When completed, will not some greed of gain or some combination suggestive of avarice come in between the people and their good intentions? We answer with confidence that no such thing will happen. This confidence is begotten of no confidence in railroad builders. We speak from no personal acquaintance with their intentions. We rely upon no promises. We put faith in no moral qualities. We simply declare our belief that these people will carry cheap freights and bring immigrants on easy terms, because it is to their interest so to do. These men are human, like ourselves, just as honest and no more honest than other men, and, in the nature of things, they will take that course that is best for them, and in this particular it is best for them to do that which is best for the producers and best for the land-owners of the State. They will reduce the cost of transportation to the lowest possible rate to secure the carrying trade, and then reach out to get all they can. They will extend branches, side-roads, and feeders, in order that they may stretch their tentacles to the remotest valley and most inaccessible hill-side of our State for business. They own a large area of land—millions of acres. These lands are now worthless to them, because unoccupied and unused. Every acre, or every farm of a hundred and sixty acres, to which the corporation can bring an industrious family, is to it a source of profit. The price obtained for the land, and the cost of bringing an immigrant family to it, is insignificant when compared with the ultimate profit that shall come from transporting the productions of this family to market. There is no institution or industry in this State so intimately connected with, and dependent upon, its general prosperity, as the transportation interests.

We heard a mole-headed politician declare the other day that the railroad people desired to destroy the navigation of the Sacramento River, in order that the railroads might carry the productions of that valley. Governor Stanford would be an idiot if he did not recognize the fact that where sufficient miners' debris is poured into the Sacramento River's channel to destroy its navigation, the overflowing waters will inundate and destroy the valley itself. Its agricultural productiveness would be ruined, and this great, rich valley, that holds a relation to this State similar to that which the fertile valley of the Nile holds to Egypt, would be so utterly destroyed that there would be no produce to transport and no passengers to carry. The railroad interests are in this respect identical with the valley farmer's. When the gravel-sluicer shall, by the pursuit of his destructive, and, because destructive, illegal industry, have destroyed the homes and farms of the Sacramento Valley, he will at the same time have struck a blow at any railroads which shall traverse the section of country injured. There are no two interests so mutually dependent upon each other as agriculture and transportation, and this silencing business is an admirable illustration of this interdependence. It is the interest of farmers to have their productions cheaply carried, and it is the interest of the railroads to carry them so cheaply and so safely that they will increase. This is made evident by the past history of freights in this State. Governor Stanford, in his open letter, said: "The law under which most of the railroad corporations of this State were organized, fixed the maximum rate for freight at fifteen cents per ton per mile, for all classes. Therefore, under the law, a possible average of fifteen cents per ton per mile might have been charged, but the actual average rate obtained by the Central Pacific Railroad during the year 1881 was less than 2.2 cents per ton per mile, or a little less than one-seventh of the possible average obtainable under the law, and this without compulsion other than that demanded or suggested by the laws of business. These laws are the only certain, just, and legitimate regulators, and under them the greater part of the products of the country are moved at rates below the average cost of movement. Wheat will probably be moved from San Francisco to New Orleans at the rate of about one-half cent per ton per mile, or at one-fifth of the average charge for the movement of freight on the Central Pacific Railroad during 1881. The railroad finds its reward for the minimum rates of freight in the general development of the country and the stimulus given to production, and after paying the direct expenses consequent upon the movement of these minimum freights, there may be a small balance still to go toward paying the fixed expenses and the general cost of maintenance. And to that extent, these low-priced commodities contribute a share of support toward a means of transportation that is of general benefit to every community. That classification of merchandise is necessary, no intelligent person doubts. The burdens of transportation are to be imposed somewhat in proportion to the value of the articles transported. Each article, as nearly as possible, pays an equal percentage on its own value. This rule inures to the benefit of the farmer. Wheat, barley, and other grains, hops, broom-corn, and other productions that are heavy or bulky, must be classified in the freight schedule somewhat in reference to their value in the markets to which they are destined. If goods were transported solely with reference to their weight and their measurement, and with equal mileage, and could not be carried for long distances under certain conditions at the same or for less rates than charged for shorter distances, the farming community would be the one to suffer. No sensible man would claim for a hundred-pound gold brick, worth twenty thousand dollars, that it should be carried for the same charge that a hundred-pound sack of wheat should pay, worth two dollars, or that a bale of silks should pay no more than a bale of gunny-sacks of the same weight or dimensions. The value of the service is greater in transporting gold or silk than wheat or gunny-bags, and hence the propriety of their greater charge, and this entirely independent of the items of insurance, extra care, etc. The larger tariff placed upon the more costly articles enables the railroads to grade down the charges upon less valuable commodities below the average cost of transportation, and this is where the principle aids the farmer. He pays an additional price because of freight charges upon the luxuries he consumes. He pays for his groceries, clothing, dry goods, liquors, tobacco, and for all goods purchased at the country store a small additional price; but in turn he has his produce—which is all bulky, heavy, and of lesser value—transported at the minimum price. He pays the maximum for the imported pounds he is compelled to buy; he pays the minimum for the exported tons he sells. Governor Stanford has so well stated this that we again quote from his open letter: "To fully illustrate the value to staple articles of production of this principle of classification, suppose four persons, desiring to construct a means of transportation from a common point to a common point, to be possessed of commodities related to each other in value, as iron, copper, silver, and gold. Now, let it be distinctly understood that the means of transportation is common, and that the value of these articles is to reside in their destination. The transportation of iron could not confer as much value upon that commodity as the transportation of copper. Again, the transportation of copper could not confer as much value upon the article transported as the transportation of silver, and this again as the transportation of gold. It follows, therefore, that the value of the service rendered by the transportation of gold—the most costly article used in this illustration—will be as much greater than the transportation of iron as the difference in the value of the two articles brought into comparison at their market point. To charge the iron with a rate of transportation equal to that charged the gold, when the value of the service in transporting the gold is many thousand times greater than that rendered in transporting the iron, would be an unjust discrimination against the iron and in favor of the gold. The principle, then, carried into practical commerce, is that a high rate is placed upon costly articles, and a low rate upon cheap articles, for mutual benefit and a just distribution of burdens." That freights are carried for longer distances—as, for instances, to terminal points—for less or at the same rates charged for shorter distances, Governor Stanford admits, and justifies by the following argument: "Take the wheat of the country, with San Francisco, Sacramento, Stockton, Red Bluff, Bakersfield, and Los Angeles as shipping points, and New Orleans as the objective point. And here come in the three factors which limit and fix the price that the railroad company shall charge for transportation. The first is development, which applies most strongly in the case of the most remote place, Red Bluff; second, the value of the commodity at New Orleans or its ultimate point of destination, say Liverpool; and last, competition. San Francisco is the chief competitive point, with four hundred and eighty-one miles of transportation more than from Los Angeles. Sacramento, fifty miles farther from the point of destination than Stockton, has as good facilities for reaching San Francisco, the great competiitive point, as Stockton bas, and will not pay the carrier any greater price than the latter pays, for the reason that the competing advantages are about equal. At Red Bluff the question of development appears more strongly than at either of the other points, and yet feels the influence of both of the other factors. The converse of this proposition is also true as relates to the import commerce to be carried by the Southern Pacific Railroad. The export commerce which will find its outlet at the Gulf ports will be supplemented by an import commerce, and this must necessarily, by the same law of competition, be carried to San Francisco at as low rates as will be charged for like carriage to Los Angeles. Now, the railroad practically has but little voice in the matter, outside of those considerations which fix the price that it shall receive. And here let me say that whenever the railroad accepts less than the maximum allowed by law, it is because of considerations or circumstances that it can not control, but which in themselves fix the price which becomes an established rate. This fact should receive due consideration. Now, it will be seen that, controlled by these circumstances, an equal mileage theory would not apply at all, and nothing can regulate it excepting business laws, unless you deny to the shipper the right of competition, and regulate him in his routes and prices. An attempt to regulate the carrier without regulating the shipper will always be a failure; and again I may say that the only regulation possible is such as business principles or the laws of business permit. When the railroad accepts less for the longer than for the shorter distance, it is because circumstances compel it, and not from choice. Railroads are no more desirous of working for nothing than other enterprises or interests; and it would be as reasonable to suppose that they would voluntarily carry for the longer distance at the same or less rate than for the shorter, when they could obtain more, as to suppose that the laborer would work a day and a half for the same price that he would for one day. The people are not charged more for the shorter distance, but the railroads are compelled to take less for the longer distance, for certain causes over which they have no control—viz., competition, or the relative values of the commodities moved."

If of late we have written somewhat voluminously upon the subject of railroads, it is because the matter has been thrust upon us. The Republican Convention placed the issue improperly in its platform. It embodies a false and cowardly declaration against what we think is the most important interest in California. We are the friends of railroads and railroad men, as we are the friends of everything that advances the best interest of the State, and of every man of enterprise who, by his brains, his wealth, and his energy, contributes to promote its progress. We hate a demagogue, and feel for him an instinctive contempt. We love the people, but despise the mob. We regard the man who toils upon his own acres, and we spit upon the politician who endeavors to deceive him, or who appeals to his prejudice and his lack of information to mislead him. The railroads of California have done everything for the State, and by the State we mean the industrious working-men who own it. This false clamor against railroads is the result of machine politics, corrupt bosses, blackmailing newspapers, cowardice, and crime. It comes from selfish, ambitious, gahhy demagogues, who think to crawl into office by misrepresentations and lies against the leading business of the State. It is of the first importance that the agricultural interest should be in friendly coöperation with the transportation interest. To this end it is indispensable that there should be a thorough appreciation of their mutual interests and dependencies, and nothing will so largely contribute to this as a thorough knowledge by the farmers of the business principles that must govern the railroad corporations in their relation to the producers. Railroads are interested in increasing to their fullest development the productive capacity of all the lands in the State. They are interested in giving to all the farming lands in California the largest value. They are interested in subdividing lands into small farms. Anything that is calculated to injuriously affect the farming community directly affects the railroad interests, as is illustrated in the controversy between the gravel-miners and the valley farmers. The owners of the Oregon branch of the Central Pacific Railroad are as directly interested in arresting this gravel-slucing outrage as the man who is compelled to stand by and see his farm, and orchard, and home ruined by the spoiler. The same mob of Sand-lot party tricksters and New Constitution makers, that had the hardy impudence to attempt to place the control of railroads and the regulation of fares and freights in the hands of three irresponsible party politicians, had not a single line in the organic law for the protection of the valley farmers. The Republican and Democratic parties, that rivaled each other in their zeal to confiscate railroad property, were too cowardly to utter one word in defense of the farmer's home, threatened by destruction from the gravel-slucers. Mr. Estee, the Republican candidate, after hargainings for the elimination of a resolution from the platform that looked to the recognition of an anti-débris principle, has the criminal audacity to make a secret hargain with the miners, and the cheek to attempt to assert before the northern farmers that he has not entered into such a criminal compact. Mr. Estee is now upon the stump appealing for the destruction of two great interests, the two leading industries of the State—railroads and farms; and, with the adroitness that always characterizes the unscrupulous and unprincipled politician, he is endeavoring to make the farmer believe that the railroad corporations are inimical to his interests. This brilliant political meteor flames along the great valleys of the Sacramento and San Joaquin, with his lambent tail all glowing with indignation against the railroads because of their tyranny and oppression to the persecuted farmers of Mussel Slough, in eloquent sympathy for the oppressed merchants of San Francisco who are compelled to make special contracts, and in denunciation of corporations whose slave, bireling, born thral, and paid chattel he was in the Constitutional Convention. Mr. Estee has no word of sympathy for those farmers who are being buried alive by the greed, avarice, and illegal spoiliations of dishonest mining. Mr. Estee is a conscienceless demagogue. He thinks to impose himself upon the people. Obtaining his nomination by fraud and violence, in manipulating the vilest machine that has ever obtained control in the politics of this city, trusting the management of his candidacy to the intrigues of three Irish bosses, he now trusts to his own flip-pant mendacity and brazen cheek to so misrepresent the true issues of the campaign that he shall slip into office disguised as a Republican. It is industriously whispered in this city that Estee is making immense headway in his campaign in the country by capturing the religious men of the Methodist Church South on his views concerning the Sunday law. His gang are equally zealous here in pledging Estee to entire and thorough sympathy with the League of Freedom, in promising them unlimited freedom to sell whisky on Sunday. It is a campaign of lies, cowardice, and insincerity, and ought not to succeed.

Colonel Grannis is an old, intelligent, and much-respected resident of San Francisco. He is a man of education and independent fortune. He is the agent of large properties, and manages the affairs of several wealthy non-residents. He has a good social position, has filled positions of public trust, and has performed all the duties of citizenship with credit. He is of temperate habits, in the prime of life, has never been a candidate for office, and is not a politician in the sense of being an office-seeker. Some three or four hundred of his fellow-citizens, both Republicans and independent Democrats, assembled in their respective conventions, and without his solicitation, tendered him the nomination for State Senator, and he consented to stand for the election. The ordinary man would say to himself: "These are the conditions that are fairly presumable of intelligent and honest public service, and I will vote for Colonel Grannis." The Bulletin, in a column of jesuitical sophistry, and in the face of a promise of support to Colonel Grannis, opposes his election, questions by cowardly implication his integrity, and endeavors to defeat him, because, and only because, Colonel Grannis is the holder of a small interest in the Spring Valley Water Company. It demands of him that he shall not place himself in a position to legislate for the benefit of a corporation in which he is a stockholder. The logical result of such a doctrine of disqualification would render it impossible for any property-owner in the State to become a member of its legislative body. No man interested in taxation upon real or personal property, no one holding real estate or mortgages thereon, no stockholder in business corporations, no man engaged in manufacturing or mechanical industries in the country, no laborer interested in hours of limitation or days of rest, could make laws, because they are all personally interested in the subject-matter of legislation. Such a rule would limit the law-making power to the non-industrial and non-property-owning classes of society. It would turn the politics of the State over to the impetuous political adventurer. The Bulletin knows this, knows Colonel Grannis and respects him, and knows that he is an intelligent and honorable man. This opposition to him arises simply from its desire to injure the Spring Valley Water Company. It is another and conclusive proof that, with water on the brain, it is impossible for this—in most other respects—respectable journal to be either honest or sensible upon any matter in which this corporation is involved.

George William Curtis attributes the result of the election in Ohio to the "rum element," and to "Republican discontent with certain Republican tendencies which require for their correction the decisive rebuke of defeat." "Democratic strength has heretofore lain in the alliance of the 'rum element with slavery.'" "Slavery is destroyed; but the rum element clings to it like a poisoned robe. In the end it will be disastrous to that party, because, unless all the assumptions of popular government are wrong, it is so—hriety, industry, and intelligence which permanently prevail in a free country. Reform within a party can sometimes be accomplished only by party defeat. As long as a party succeeds by repulsive methods and unworthy agents, it is on the high road to ultimate ruin, and the only way to show that fraud, and trickery, and the corruption of patronage are fatal to a party is to defeat the party. Great public objects can not be promoted by fraud, trickery, and corruption; and where these forces have obtained control, they must be baffled by defeat, or the party objects themselves are lost." "Every Republican who sustains notorious chicanery, and cheating, and vast extravagance, by sustaining a party which depends upon such cheating and abuse, arrays himself against the purposes of the party. Such a defeat is one of the fortunate proofs which are furnished from time to time of healthy political vigor; of the happy effect that there are enough intelligent and patriotic citizens who regard party as a means, not an end, to show schemers and sharpers and patronage-mongers that in reckoning upon the want of political courage and independence, they are reckoning without their host." Every word of the above is sound sense from eminent Republican authority. It is in every word and line applicable to the politics of California; and, properly interpreted, it means that the highest, most important, and permanent service that can be rendered the Republican party in this election is to defeat Morris M. Estee for Governor, because he has resorted to repulsive methods and unworthy agents, and by fraud, trickery, chicanery, and deceit, obtained a nomination that would not have been given him by respectable Republicans under the honorable management of an intelligent and independent convention. The triumph of Mr. Estee is the triumph of the machine and machine bosses over honest men and party principles. The defeat of Mr. Estee is the chastisement that will lead the party through the hard discipline of defeat to the permanence of a great, thorough, and much-needed reform. If in the State of New York it is permissible to vote against so excellent and honorable a man as Judge Folger is admitted to be simply because he was nominated for governor through vile practices, which he did not encourage, and by vicious men, whom he could not control, how much stronger is the incentive to vote against Estee, who himself manipulated the machine, used and directed the bosses, encouraged the primary frauds, and personally supervised the whole devilish conspiracy from his headquarters in Peter Hopkins's bar-room, and his right and left wings resting on the Mint Saloon and Christopher Buckley's Alhambra. "When the choice of Republicans is between Captain Kidd and Dick Turpin, honest men will vote 'in the air.'"

The award by Judge Finn of the Piercy child to its maternal grandparent would not, ordinarily, interest any outside the family circle; but, as this case has become within our locality a cause célèbre, we think ourselves justified in recording our approval of the judgment, and the reasoning that led to it. A poor young actor, without pronounced religious convictions, marries into the family of a wealthy Catholic, and, before he takes the marriage vows, goes with his betrothed to her spiritual adviser—in this case his grace Archbishop Alemany—and promises that the children resulting from the marriage shall be educated in the Catholic faith. In exchange for this promise this Catholic maiden gives herself, her love, her fortune, and her faith into the keeping of a Protestant husband. A female child is born to them. The mother dies. The father, true to his ante-nuptial promise, gives the child into the custody of its mother's parents and sister. They take it to their home. It is a home of wealth, where the infant finds hounteous plenty and loving care. The father gives to them its custody with accompanying promises of continuance till he sickens and dies. The father's mother then asks the custody of the child. It is our judgment that she is not entitled to it; that the law of love, of interest, and the ante-nuptial promise all look to the mother's family as the proper home for the orphaned girl. The little one slips into the spot made vacant by the marriage and departure of its mother. It fills the vacuum in hearts made desolate with grief for the too early death of a loved one. It secures for this child an ample fortune. The sentimentality of an aged paternal grandmother ought not to come between the child and its worldly interest, or he allowed to invalidate compacts made at the marriage altar, which have been ratified in the life and death of both its parents.

The Catholic family journal, devoted to propagation, etc., says: "If by our advocacy of prohibition we could transform every beer-hall in the city into Baptist meeting-houses, and thereby deprive a single thirsty Teuton of his customary glass of lager, we would see the whole Prohibition party in purgatory before we would advocate its principles." Wonder if this ecclesiastical believer in purgatory would not be willing to advocate prohibition if he could turn every beer-hall and whisky-mill into a Catholic church? The Roman Irish do not like Baptists for two reasons—first, because they are not Papists, and, second, because they are baptized in water. If the Irish could be immersed in whisky, baptism would be regarded as a saving ordinance. If it ever becomes needful to alienate the whisky-drinking Irish from the ecclesiastical allegiance, it will only be necessary to fill the communion cup with potheen, the priest being allowed to drink its contents freely through the congregation.

The First Volume of Bancroft's History of this Coast.

HISTORY OF THE PACIFIC STATES. Central America. Vol. I. 1501-1530. By Hubert Howe Bancroft. San Francisco: A. L. Bancroft & Co. 1882.

It is a good sign for the permanence of a people when it values and is well versed in its own history. The pure-blooded, ancestral races which founded the nations of to-day were tenacious of the traditions which celebrated the great events of their past, the exploits of their heroes, their battles, the building of their cities, the natural wonders of comet-fire, rain of stars, notable drought, famine, or flood. In legend or song these things were taught by the old men, past labor, to the children cradled in the wolf-skins, and, carefully and literally rehearsed in tale or poem, were wrought into the fibre of the nation, steadied the stroke of its maces in combat, and gave edge to its sword. Nothing more commands respect than the family or the state which honors its own lineage and past. For the average Californian, the past which begins at the crossing of the Sierra in 1842 is sufficient; and he is even content with his Anno Mundi beginning in '49 or the spring of '50. But his grandchildren will hardly be satisfied with so limited a retrospect. Nay, as he treads the paths of his own chosen and fruitful country, does the strange, warm hue of its red-brown volcanic soil never prompt him to ask why its color is so different from the dark loams of the valleys?—or does not the motley dialect which assails his ear prompt him to trace the languages which form part of it, and how they came to be domesticated on his own shores? Nay, does he never ask how this country came to be his own, and an English-speaking continent, at all? Has he no natural curiosity to know how the mountains were ground down to make the rich countries of the coast, or bow the reefs were submerged, which geology teaches once joined the Pacific shore with the Sandwich Islands? Does not the dull mission wall, or the pueblo clause in his land title, stir an idle interest in the aboriginal owners of the soil, and the conquistadores, who seized only in turn to be eliminated from the broad lands of La Senorha de la Norte?

When a personage of commanding and superior air is seen in our daily walk, how briskly inquiry passes from lip to lip, impatient till all are satisfied who and of what family and connection he or she may be. One would think that the child of the nineteenth century could hardly tread the fairest region of the western continent without being eager to know its past, from the formation of its mountain crests and glacier cliffs, from the subsiding of the western reef which left the waters of the ocean between the Gold Coast and the Sandwich Islands, to the receding of the tide which left the wind-blown sand-pillars and heaps miles inland on the old sea-beach between the Santa Cruz vineyard hills and the solfataros and mineral geysers of its northern country. Still more would he wish to know of human races which have gone before him. The age of the dodo and mammoth has left its relics in the dwarf scales of humanity hardly distinguishable from the brown or gray Sierra sides on which they huddle and creep like parasites of nature sprung from the dust of the earth in which they crawl. After them, last to come and first to go, like all favored races, come the sprightlier, taller tribes, clever carvers of slate, porphyry, and obsidian, weavers of feather cloakings and supple reed-grass fabrics which defy rain, the Indians of the pueblos and Mexican plateaus, whose intoned story lingers in the cry of the mountain wind in the clefts, the rocks, and the piñon boughs. Beyond their dusky forms we catch the glint of weapons and ring of armor, the waving of silken scarf and banner, royal, though faded with sun and weather-stained, and the glance of conquest under brows bent with deeper craft and more relentless will than the doomed races of the Incas. There is Cortez, with the golden green of the imperial quetzil bird bound about his helmet; Narvaez, with his band of gentlemen adventurers, wandering from Florida to the Mississippi, through the fair and treacherous regions bordering the Gulf of Mexico; Coronado, crossing the frozen Rio Grande and the flint-strewn deserts, and tempted by the lovely Kansas plains beyond to the banks of the Missouri; Pedrarias, scouring the provinces of Darien with his avarice and his cruelty; Balboa, sick with the strain of mind and body, carried in his litter on the march, directing the movements of his troops in their search for the Southern Sea; Alvarado, baffling the cunning of the desperate caciques, and conquering the wonderful cliff-cities of Utiatlan and Atitlan. The stories of the discoverers of the country are epics of stormy magnificence, which poets may be inspired to celebrate, when they are accomplished enough to feel how superior are the literal facts of history to any dressed and decked imaginings. For, so far from poetry being an effete amusement, fit only for the adolescence of the world, it is an art still in its infancy, destined for the divining of hidden heroism and grandeur for dull common senses, and the celebration of the worthiest and greatest deeds. Before poetry, however, must come history, of the only sort that can be styled history—the Baconian, inductive, scientific method, call it what you will—which is the collection of the greatest number of facts before generalization. In reading history, the true student often is forced to feel that he would sacrifice any eloquence of partisanship or beauty of description for more fullness and verity of detail. Useless for the lively mind of the historian to supply these details by the inductive process, arguing from what is known to the unknown. Our knowledge of human nature and material things is too incomplete for any shrewd student to trust such embellishments overmuch. They make pleasant reading for the popular audience, but they rather distract the attention eager for the everlasting fact.

The Pacific history, whose first volume is under consideration, has the advantage of such preparation of authorities as probably no other history can boast. Its bibliography, which is an invaluable part of the work for the best class of readers, gives an idea of the riches of early chronicles from which it is condensed. With an instinct of thoroughness the History of the Pacific Slope begins at the beginning of the discovery of the Isthmus of Darien, its southern portion, proceeding northward with successive conquests and explorations. Of books relating to America published before 1540, the summary in the introduction informs us there are some sixty-five, of which twenty-five contain original information, and twenty-three are compiled from these. Of these forty-eight volumes there are over two hundred editions, the earliest and most faithful of which only are appealed to. Besides the early historians, Peter Martyr, Oviedo, Las Casas, Herrera, and the standard collections from Ramusio to Hackluyt, free use is made of Navarette's most valuable work on the first American voyages, with its five hundred documents from the Spanish archives; Major's "Life of Prince Henry of Portugal," the best authority for Portuguese discoveries; Rafn, source of nearly all our knowledge of the Northmen in America during the tenth and following centuries; the "Life of Columbus," by his son Fernando, from Barcia's "Historiadores Primitivos;" Humboldt, Kunsmann's compilation accompanying the Munich Atlas, and Stevens' "Geographical Notes"—works containing the most authentic reduction of all that is known of early discoveries.

Not the least interesting fragment of the history is the introduction, which sets before one the state of civilization at the date of the finding of the New World. The character and descent of its Spanish conquerors may well be deemed a fitting study in the face of the essayist's testimony that "the history of the expeditions which ended in the conquest of Mexico and Peru displays more strikingly than any other records of the human race what amazing exertions the spirit of man can prompt him to attempt and sustain him to endure;" and when, as our historian informs us, "twelve centuries after the occurrence, the peasantry of Asturias are divided between the descendants of those who aided the patriot Pelayo against the Moors, and those who did not—so strong is the influence of tradition and dead ancestry." Of such blood sprang the conquistadores of Central America. The picture of its discoverer, in the history before us, deepens the shadows in the character of Columbus, with the bold effective handling which marks all the portraits in Mr. Bancroft's work:

Great events generally choose great men for their accomplishment, though not infrequently we see no small dust raised by an insignificant agent. As a mariner and discoverer, Columbus had no superior; as colonist and governor, he had by this time proved himself a failure. There are some things great men can not do as well as their inferiors. It was one thing to rule at sea, and quite another to rule on shore. In bringing to his India these unruly Spaniards, he had sown for himself the whirlwind. Had he been less pretentious, less ambitious, less grasping, his latter days would have been more successful as well as more peaceful. Discovery was his infatuation; he was never for a moment untended by a consuming curiosity to find a western way to civilized India. Had he been possessed of sound practical judgment in the matter, of the same knowledge of himself and of political affairs that he had of navigation, he would have seen that he could not, at the same time, gratify his passion for discovery and successfully govern colonies. In his fatal desire to assume rulership, and upon the ill-understood reports of simple savages, with no knowledge of the resources or capabilities of the country, without definite purpose or mature plans, he had brought upon himself an avalanche of woes. Besides his incapacity for such a task, his position was rendered all the more trying by the fact that he was a foreigner, whose arbitrary acts galled his impatient subordinates, and finally wrought them to the pitch of open rebellion. The Spaniards were quick enough to perceive that this Genoese sailor was in no wise fitted to lay the foundation of a prosperous Spanish colony; and when during his absence he left in command his brother, to whom attached no prestige of high achievement to make up for his misfortune in not being born in Spain, complications grew daily worse. Even the ecclesiastics were against the admiral; for although themselves the high-priests of a bloody fanaticism, they saw that, between the fires of nature and the supernatural, this man was becoming mad. They saw the religious hypochondria, which had already inflamed his intellect, now aggravated by the anxieties incident to the government of a turbulent element under circumstances unprecedented, undermining his health, and bringing rapidly upon him those mental and physical distempers which rendered the remainder of his life prolonged misery. Thus we may plainly see how Columbus brought upon himself the series of calamities which are commonly found charged to unscrupulous sovereigns and villainous rivals.

The first Spaniard to set foot in what the historian appropriately calls the Pacific States of North America was Bastidas, a notary of Seville, a man of means, intelligent, influential, and humane—for which last extraordinary virtue we have the testimony of Las Casas. His experiences fairly open the romance of Darien discoveries. His caravels sail for the Pearl Coast (infatuating name for the shore of South America); he comes upon an island so dressed in palm and festooned with vines to the water's edge that he names it Isla Verde forthwith; comes upon the port of Coronadas (so called because the natives walked about wearing large crowns); and soon "he saw the farallones, or craggy islet peaks, rising abruptly from the water near the Darien shore."

The author does full justice to the action of Spain in regard to the enslavement of the Indians. When the traffic was pushed upon them, with the old plausible story that some of the slaves would be christianized and returned to convert their countrymen, Ferdinand and Isabella hesitated, but when cargoes were sent over to Spain, and every new-comer was given an Indian for a slave, the monarchs were angry.

"What authority from me has the admiral to give any one my vassals," cries the queen, and all who had been thus stolen from home and country were returned. And from that moment the sovereigns of Spain were the friends of the Indians. Not Isabella alone, but Ferdinand, Charles, and Philip, and their successors for two hundred years, with scarcely an exceptional instance, stood manfully for the rights of the savages—always subordinate, however, to their own fancied rights—constantly and determinately interposing their royal authority between the persistent wrong-doing of their Spanish subjects and their defenseless subjects of the New World. * * * For the soldier, the sailor, the cavalier, the vagabond, the governor, and all their subordinates and associates, all the New World rattle, from viceroys to menial, will it otherwise—the New World clergy too often winking assent. However omnipotent in Spain, there were some things in America that the sovereigns and their confessors could not do. They could not control the bad passions of their subjects when beyond the reach of rope and dungeon. That these evil propensities were of home engendering, having for their sanction innumerable examples from church and state, statesmen and prelates would hardly admit, but it is in truth a plausible excuse for the excesses committed. The fact is, that for every outrage by a subject in the far away Indies, there were ten, each of magnitude tenfold for evil, committed by the sovereigns in Spain; so that it is by no means wonderful that the Spaniards determined here to practice a little fendishness for their own gratification, even though their preceptors did oppose wickedness, which by reason of their absence they themselves could not enjoy.

Brief narrative will suffice for these outrages. The earth has long since drunk the blood of victim and tyrant alike, but the barbarities practiced were pitiless as those of the Italian Visconti of the same century. Juan de Esquivel slaughtered six hundred natives at one time in one house. The horrors of extermination Las Casas confessed himself unable to describe. A passion arose for mutilation and for prolonging agony by new inventions for refining cruelty. To take the places in the Spanish service of the Indians thus slain in Española, forty thousand natives of the Lucayas Islands were enticed thither, upon the pretext of the captors that they were the Indians' dead ancestors come from heaven to take their loved ones back with them. Española was, indeed, their shortest way to heaven, though not the way they had been led to suppose. When tidings of Ovando's doings reached Spain, Queen Isabella was on her death-bed; but, raising herself as best she was able, she exclaimed to the president of the council: "I will have you take of him such a residencia (account, judgment) as was never taken." Between the Indians and their mail-clad tormentors, the figures of Las Casas and regent Cardinal Jimenez appear like angelic spirits. With a humanity certainly not belonging to the age in which they lived, they had undertaken to abolish the oppression of the natives; but first, the good cardinal dies, and then the Flemish chancellor whom Las Casas had succeeded in interesting in their hapless state. "All the measures Las Casas had proposed fell to the ground save one, the only bad one, concerning which Las Casas afterward asserted that he would give all he possessed on earth to recall it—the introduction of negro slaves to relieve the Indians." And elsewhere the author says: "Had Charles V. remained in Flanders, and had the life of Cardinal Jimenez been spared to Spain and the New World a few years longer, it is certain that the cruelties to the Indians would many of them have been prevented, and it is doubtful if negro slavery would have been introduced into America."

The thanksgivings to heaven for the discovery of the West Indies and the Southern Sea are hardly over before the New World is given over to brigandage under the name of conquest, and the intrigues of gentlemen adventurers, better described as bandits. Balboa throws the caciques alive to his bloodhounds—did he remember his promises of safety to them when dying himself by the treachery of Pedrarias, his successor? Morales strews his path with murdered and mutilated captives; on one occasion, eighteen caciques, called to a friendly council, were seized and thrown to the dogs. Beside this sickening record, one turns with aversion from the discoveries of the pearl-beds, where, in four days, the natives found ninety-six ounces of pearls, and from which that memorable pearl, an inch in length and valued at four thousand ducats, was sent to the queen of Spain. One blushes to belong to the same race as those tyrants, and fain would find some way to wipe out the memory of their crimes from the soil they trod, as, after the slaughter of the dreaded Baglioni, the Cathedral of Perugia was washed with wine and consecrated afresh, and for three days masses were said at thirty-five altars to take away the curse from the spot. One turns from these cruelties to read of the vigor with which the discoverers forced their way through the difficulties which beset them. Balboa dared conceive and execute the project of building ships on one side of a chain of mountains for use on the other side—to navigate his vessels in pieces or sections, on the backs of Indians, over hills and swamps, and that under a sun so hot, in an atmosphere so poisoned, and through vegetation so rank and tangled, as successfully to have defied the efforts of science for centuries thereafter. "Materials for four brigantines are prepared and laid on the backs of natives, who are pressed by thousands into the service, and forced through marshy thicket and up rocky steep, till they sink beneath their burden." "More than five hundred Indians perished in the transportation of these ships," affirmed Bishop Queredo before the Court of Spain; and Las Casas says the deaths were nearer two thousand—but the work was accomplished.

The wild bank of the Balsas was strewn with materials for this new sea navigation. But on putting the pieces together it is found that after all the toil there is timber enough for only two vessels instead of four; the rest has been lost by the way. And this is not the worst of it. That which has been brought over at such cruel cost, cut near the coast and hewed green as it was, is so full of worms that it can not be used. All must be thrown away and the work begun anew. Timber is sought nearer at hand this time, and with fair success. Vasco Nuñez now divides his force into three parties, and sends one to hew timber, one to bring supplies from Acia, and a third to forage on the natives. Again they are ready with new materials to begin construction, when the heavens suddenly darken and drop such a deluge on them that they are obliged to take refuge in trees. Part of the timber is swept away, and part buried in mud. To add to their misfortunes, foraging fails; hunger pinches; and "when Vasco Nuñez himself was forced to feed on roots," says Las Casas, always with an eye to his protégés, "it may well be imagined to what extremity six hundred Indian captives were reduced." It now looks very dark to Vasco Nuñez, and he begins to consider if it were not better to move on, one way or the other, than to die there. But these misgivings are only for a moment. No, it is not better. Throwing a bridge of floating wither-fed logs across the river he sends over Compañon with a strong company, and tells him never to return except with food. Hurtado he dispatches to Antigua for more men, and goes himself to Acia for necessary effects. In all which he is successful; and he is successful finally in floating two brigantines upon the Balsas. There is no such thing as failure this side of death. What a bright vision it is that greets him as he drops down into the sea, his own sea that he had found and well-nigh lost again! Heaven is indeed beautiful if it be anything fairer. Silver and gold and pearl are the sunshine, land, and sky; while the sea, the murmuring, gladdening, majestic sea; it would inspire a brute with nobility, one sight of it!

The work is so thoroughly that of a man possessed of his subject, anxious to read it in all its lights, to search out its sources, and trace its bearings, that it will not fail to captivate the general reader, as well as arrest the attention of the scholar, who will be interested in the presence some of the heroes of history make in the unqualified light now turned upon them. If Mr. Bancroft is an iconoclast, it is the legitimate influence of the modern spirit, and will meet with acceptance by that larger following who hail neither Cæsar nor Columbus. The gods are dead; the heroes are dying. We may regret them, but the stern lesson must be taught—to consider no man either god or hero, but great in his own place, and prone to his own weakness. The nineteenth century is of the lineage of the fifteenth, and there are plenty of men in the world to-day who would be cruel as Spaniards to gain the rewards of the conquerors—of men in the world to-day who would be merciless as Borgias or as Spaniards to gain such rewards as dazzled the ambition of Alvarado and of Balboa. The volume before us leads to the return of Cortez; and those who follow the picturesque and rapid sweep of its story will await with eagerness the next number, which relates to the gorgeous history of the conquest of Mexico.

It is often said "the English take their pleasure sadly," but for a complete spectacle of dolorous enjoyment commend me to a night at the Carnival. It will be observed that no one says the "Authors' Carnival" any more. Indeed, with the swing of years, the authors have been violently snubbed and set in the background, and the big annual charity has become a harlequinade—an artistic one, if the word be objectionable, but still parti-colored, piecemeal, and inconsequent. Of all the great men, living and dead, who have made books, but four have found a banner in the "Authors' Carnival": Longfellow, Hugo, Dumas, and Homer. How queerly it sounds to call Homer an author! Almost as strangely as to undignify any other author with the title of Mr.; for, although the peerage in letters does not give a man the right to subscribe himself with the bold simplicity of an English lord, yet all the world else does him honor in this wise.

It is the very laudable desire for novelty which has changed the character of the Authors' Carnival, and has made it more and more of a spectacle and less and less of intellectual suggestion. For what does one learn of men of letters from the Milkmaid's Festival at Warwick Castle, the Military Encampment, the Terra Cotta booth, or the Champs Elysées? The latter has a seductive sound, and it is even whispered that one may there "revel in the rosy," as Swiveller would say, to the extent of some very mild claret-cup. The lights are lowered and a long row of colored lamps swings in the line, so that it looks like a stereoscopic view or an opera bouffe scene before the coryphées come on.

Then one may buy coffee at one booth, and tea at another, and bon-bons elsewhere, and ice-cream still farther on, and sandwiches and lemonade in other spots—all of which is very satisfying to the material stomach, but cannot be said to be heavily intellectual. However, affairs are so discreetly adjusted that one comes from ice and coffee plump upon pre-Raphaelitism in the shape of the only booth in all the hall which is decorated with any regard to its purport, unless it be the Homer booth, where one may find some traces of a Greek interior.

Many of the dresses this year are very beautiful in effect, though mostly made with a theatrical economy in quality, and only calculated for display at the delusive distance of the grand stage. The grand march, as it is managed, is a sad mistake. Every one knows the weakness of the amateur for the horrors of make-up. When a beautiful young woman paints her own eyebrow and makes another heavily defined above it; when she anoints herself beneath the eye with a deep dark line of bistre, and plants upon either cheek the bright red flag of artifice, she is a creature of beauty behind the shadow-seeking footlights. But, parading a foot away from the criticising eyes of spectators, gifted with an unpleasant directness of speech, she is simply a guy. Let any one who is fond of beauty and illusion never be lured to that mystic world "behind the scenes." It is all paste, and pigments, and smear, and gives one an immediate and uncontrollable longing for a bath-tub, to say nothing of the weird, unnatural look of the players.

When the beautiful Mrs. Langtry first went upon the stage the critics wondered what had become of her marvelous beauty, till one of them discovered that the pigments of the stage had coarsened her style, thus taking from her the very essence of her beauty; for the features of the Jersey lily are heavily molded and easily coarsened, and it is to an exquisite purity of complexion that she owes her social popularity as a beauty, rather than the limpid clearness of her eye or the classicalness of her Greek contour. It must have been this peerless complexion that caught the keen eye of Millais, the artist, who is now said to have made her the fashion, rather than the Prince of Wales. A young woman in a recent fashionable novel, who is rather given to saying bright things, declares the difference between eighteen and eighty to be only in the skin, so far as a woman's beauty is concerned. She is more than half right, and if Mrs. Langtry had been afflicted with pimples, or the sun's kisses had marked her with freckles in her island home, where she was said to be something of a tom-boy and much in the sun, one of the chronicles of London life would have been left unwritten, and one woman the less have attained that glittering pinnacle—social success. It is something harder to win than the plaudits of the stage, or the admiration of the paying multitude, and Mrs. Langtry's social success was something phenomenal. That is to say, she became a goddess of fashion, and no hall-room, or garden fête, or race-course was complete without her. In England or America, this is to be a social success. In France, a woman requires a few hairs. Beauty goes for much, but chic, intelligence, and a certain genius at diplomacy for much more. The salon which is the very refinement of civilization is found in France only. No American woman has ever established a salon; it is not in the American temperament; and no Englishwoman but Lady Blesington, who, indeed, was not English at all, has succeeded in London. Perhaps George Eliot nearer to it than any other, though it was none of her own deliberate making, for the shyness and reticence of nature and circumstance prevented her from being able to guide the wheel-work which goes to the making of a genuine salon. People went to her attracted by her commanding genius, and though visitors were very like to find some one in the rooms celebrated either in letters, art, or music on those Sundays when the Lewises were "at home," it would be irony to call George Eliot a social success.

So it comes to pass that in the history of the English-speaking nations there is no salon like Madame de Tencin's or Madame de Geoffrin's, long ago; like the beautiful Madame Récamier's, later; or like Madame Edmond Adam's, to-day. The history of them is a literature by itself, for they were the field ground of intellectual manoeuvres. Where else would all the brilliant wits have shone? Their words would have returned to them unheard, like those of the little Abbé Galiani, that small, strange, brilliant creature, who lived for ten years in Paris, the delight of these wonderful gatherings, and vegetated in his Neapolitan home the rest of his life, figuratively dumb. What a delightful social spirit he must have been, to have had the carping Sainte-Beuve write of him that the French people owed to him "an honorable, choice, purely delicate burial, urna brevis, a little elegant urn, which should not be larger than he. Upon it should be engraved, as an emblem, a Silenus, a head of Plato, a Punchinello, and one of the graces."

Perhaps just such protean intellects are within call to-day, but the absence of the salon makes them undiscoverable. Social success is a much smaller and emptier affair under our mode of living, for even Mrs. Langtry's little breakfasts, which became so famous, were generally parties carrees, and noted rather for the lofty rank of the chief guests than the lofty grade of intellect which helped to make them a feast of reason. In English life to-day perhaps Lord Charles Beresford is the greatest success, being at once a man of most unbounded popularity, a dashing and daring soldier-sailor, and a wit whose mots pass into the language. Mrs. Langtry has never set herself up for a wit, and boldly declares that she has never set herself up for a beauty; and she would doubtless have had a sorry time of setting herself up for an actress if the prestige of her fashion and beauty had not floated her into immediate success. What a pity that, to give its full effect to that beauty, she must dash it with the professional tricks of manufactured loveliness! Seen from afar, how charming and illusive; seen from a near, how ugly, how repulsive!

To return to the Carnival and the grand march, which is really its feature, and which could be so beautiful a one, how foolish it is of the participants in the booths (participants seems to be the double word, generically bestowed upon them) to caparison them for the footlights, and then float about the room within close eyesight of every one. Many of the dresses are pretty and effective; but none will bear close inspection, excepting the gorgeous dresses of the Chinese booth. As for the Terra Cotta groups, while the idea is unique and singularly appropriate during the present craze for the color, they are the most absurd and nondescript-looking people wandering about the floor that can be imagined. Spectators are quite deprived of any of the pleasure of surprise the tableaux on the grand stage may give them by meeting the Homeric gods, or the Vikings of the Norse, or a very much smeared-looking piece of terra-cotta, running around the main floor. As for the tableaux in the booths, as they have neither distance nor properly managed lights to give them effect, they are not enjoyable. Some of those on the grand stage are very beautiful, and the generous proportions of the new pavilion give every one a chance to move about and breathe and see. The grand march is not so effective as heretofore, because in the attempt to give the spectators a better view a winding march has been introduced, which crowds the stage with people, and disturbs the eye. As every one in the line marches like that brilliant Pat who declared himself to be the only man in the regiment who kept the step, and as they all become uncomfortably huddled, the kind intention of the managers is utterly lost. The old file across the stage was a very much better arrangement. However, it is much easier to sit apart and tell what ought to have been done after such a mammoth affair has been put in motion than to undertake, even for sweet charity's sake, to guide the thousand and one annoyances which go to make up the Carnival.

BETSY E.

"Van the Virginian" has been running all the week at Haverly's California Theatre, excepting on Friday and Saturday, when "Davey Crockett" and the "Streets of New York" were given. The entire Bartley Campbell troupe is now here, and it will open on Monday night in the "White Slave," for which scenery has been in preparation for two weeks. Miss Cayvan and John Sedgwick will take the leading rôles.

Gus Frohman will open the Baldwin Theatre about Christmas with the Madison Square Troupe in "Esmeralda," "Young Mrs. Winthrop" (the late New York success), "The Professor," and other like plays.

On Tuesday night Andrews & Stockwell will open the Grand Opera House with an elaborate pantomime, which promises to prove a gorgeous spectacle.

M. B. Leavitt, it is said, is about to sign a lease for the Bush Street Theatre, which he will open very shortly.

The minstrels have attracted large audiences all the week.

Rabbit Stewed in Claret Wine.
Fried Parsnips. String Beans.
Roast Lamb, Mint Sauce. Sweet Potatoes.
Okra Salad.
Lemon Sponge. Strawberries.
Figs, Apples, Grapes, Peaches, Plums, and Pears.
LEMON SPONGE.—The juice of four lemons, four eggs, one large cupful of sugar, one pint of cold water, and one ounce (or half a package) of gelatine. Soak the gelatine for half an hour in half a cupful of the water. Squeeze the lemons, and mix the strain juice in the sugar. Beat the yolks of the eggs to a foam, and mix with the remainder of the water. Add the sugar and lemon juice, and cook in a double boiler until it begins to thicken; then add the gelatine. Strain into a tin basin, and put it into a pan of ice water, beating it occasionally with an egg-whisk till it is cool, but not hard. Now add the unbeaten whites, and beat all steadily until it begins to thicken, when it must be put in a mold, and set away to harden. The molds must be ready, as the hardening is rapid. If the mixture gets too hard for pouring, set the basin in one of hot water, let it melt, and then beat again. Serve with or without cream. Orange juice can be used, but six large ones will be required.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Not Prose.

The wind of autumn blows
Destruction to the rose;
It tints the sunburnt nose,
Among the leaves it goes,
And where the river flows
It hints of winter's snows,
And nips the news-boy's toes,
And chills the hungry crows,
Brings joy to Ikey Mo's,
With thoughts of pawned ole clo'es;
The dust around it throws;
And—shout your ah's and oh's—
It shows
The red, red female nose. —Puck.

Mother's Clock.

A youth sat on a sofa wide,
Within a parlor dim;
The maid who lingered by his side
Was all the world to him.
What brought that glad light to his eye—
That cadence to his tone?
Why burns the lamp of love so high,
Though midnight's hour hath flown?

The clock above the glowing grate
Has stopped at half-past ten;
And, long as that young man may wait,
It will not strike again.

The artful mind knows full well
What makes the clock act so,
And why no earthly power can tell
The time for him to go.

—Unknown Liar.

The Comick on a Raid.

De moon got smashed by de Comick's tail;
Dat's so, my Dinah.
De horn it fell down in our milk pail,
Dat you know, Dinah.
De old man in de moon got monsum mad,
You bet, my Dinah;
Come sliding down on a spider's thread,
All in a sweat, Dinah;
Seed a colored gal settin' in de door;
Dat was you, Dinah.
Says he, "I'll go back to de moon no more,"
All dat's true, Dinah.
He kitched at dat gal around de waist;
Oh, you lie, Dinah!
Den perced her lips to taste;
Taint no lie, Dinah.
He promise when he pient dat piece ob moon,
You to hoe it, Dinah,
Dat lots of new dollars would come up soon,
He'd show it, Dinah.
Says Gabriel, speaking from Paradise,
(Heaven de fust,) Dinah,
And puttin' his spectacles on his eyes,
"What's de muss?" Dinah!
Den stretch out his wings, and pick up de moon;
Dat wakes up de dead, Dinah.
He fly for dis world; de blaze of de moon
Light up his head, Dinah.
He travel de air, not thinking of wrong;
Sayin' prayers, Dinah.
The Comick he flop his tail berry strong;
Puttin' on airs, Dinah.
He knock de trumpet from Gabriel's hand,
With one strong knock, Dinah.
De trumpet it fall in old Satan's land,
On a big rock, Dinah.
Now we must both sleep in de cold, cold ground
For evermore, Dinah.
Dat blessed trumpet will never again sound;
No, nevermore, Dinah!
My golden slippers, I give 'em to Joe,
Who went before, Dinah.
Dat robe you dun bought, white as de snow,
Sell to de store, Dinah.
If dat man from de moon—I'm talkin' plain—
Should kiss you, Dinah,
It shall be only for once—never again—
Or we'll miss you, Dinah!

Some German Verse.

"TO THE EDITOR OF 'PUCK': Sir, would You be so Kind as to forward to me an appropriate German Verse for a silver wedding to be held by my Brother by doing so You will be conferring a great on me. Yours truly C. FURST.
With pleasure, Mr. Furst. We always like to forward the cause of true poetry. Forwarding German verse is just in our line. This is supposed to hint at the early struggles of a young couple who have risen from poverty and a plain marriage to the affluence of a silver wedding;
Konstantinopolitanischer dudelsackspfeiffergesellschaft—
Marry and live in a flat and call for your coal down a well-shaft.
Konstantinopolitanischer dudelsackspfeiffergesellschaft—
Save up your cash, and your friends will gather around you, and give you a silver wedding the regulation number of years after.
Perhaps, however, there is something too much of a stately, majestic swing about that. Maybe your revered brother would like something more in this style:
Sauer-Kraut und Leberwurst—
This is the wedding of Mr. Furst—
Leberwurst und Sauer-Kraut—
See the presents all spread out!
Yet it may be that there is a shade too much idyllic simplicity about that last outpouring of our genius. We want to give your dear brother a choice. What does he think of this?
Bringen Sie Limburger und Schweizer Käse,
Und like a Turn-Verein your voices raise;
Bring mir dot Spätzle, und dot goot Rheinwein,
Und Nudel, und dot Gulasch lieb' und fein,
Bring all dot feed vot efery Deutscher brings—
Und don't you bring no nickel-plated dings.

—Puck.

Mrs. Langtry has ceased to be judged as a mere novice. The amateur has pretty much disappeared, says the astonished Londoner. "I heard," says G. W. Smalley, "an American manager make the same remark some months ago. He had been seeing her in the provinces. Everybody agrees that there is great improvement. As to the nature of it, and the particular direction in which Mrs. Langtry's talents are developing, there is some difference of opinion. That does not perhaps much matter to you. It may or may not flatter your American pride, if pride you have in theatrical matters, to hear that these twelve London performances are given to some extent as rehearsals for America. The remark is not hers nor mine, but appears in the London press."

Marie Prescott three weeks ago brought suit in the Superior Court in New York against the American News Company, claiming twenty thousand dollars damages for the circulation by them of an alleged libel published in a paper called Nym Crinkle, on the sixth of August, 1881. The case came to trial before Judge Russell and a jury, and after a nine days' trial she was awarded twelve thousand dollars damages. The libel complained of charged that the plaintiff had paid to have her picture appear in a paper which had defamed her and attacked her reputation and character, and commented with severity upon her action in the matter. The defense interposed is that the company had no knowledge of the publication, and were not responsible for its circulation, and also that the statements contained in the objectionable article were true. Ex-Judge Fullerton, after examining a witness as to the manner of distributing newspapers by the company, called the plaintiff a witness for the defense. She testified in response to questions that her maiden name and stage name was Marie Prescott, and that she was now married, and was now known as Mrs. William Pertzelt. She denied with much emphasis that she had ever professed to be the wife of Ernest Harvier, or that she had ever signed her name as being his wife. When handed a letter purporting to be written by herself she denied that it was in her handwriting, or that she had ever seen it. Other letters shown her she identified as having been sent to her husband, Mr. Pertzelt, and denied that they were written to Harvier. One letter, which she acknowledged having written to Harvier, contained the following curious catechetical confession:

Name? Marie. Born? 1860 and something. Over forty? No. Born before '57? Yes. Too old to love? No. Occupation? Writing love-letters. Married or single? Neither. Debts? Well, so so. Condition of property? Splendid. Character of property? Personal. Name of property? Ernest. Taxable property? Harvier. (Excuse me while I unbutton my corset; it pinches me.) Where reside? At large. Under bonds? Yes. To whom? Man out West. Name? Burke. What holds you? Piece of paper. Where is he? Don't know. Do you care? No. When heard from? Four years ago. Any communications? None. Have you ever written to him? Never. Had he any influence over you? None whatever. Is he in your way? No. How are you employed? Thinking. Anything else? Loving. Who? My own darling baby. Any other O. D. B.? None. Have been? No. Never. Sure? As I hope for his love. Do you love Ernest Harvier? Yes. Who do you love? Ernest Harvier. Does he love you? Yes. How much? With all his heart. And you? With my life. Did you ever love any one else? No. Did he? Think not. What does he think? He knows I love him. My own precious, loving—my darling—my devoted, my only love. Been up before? Yes. What for? Love. For whom? Ernest Harvier. Decision? Guilty. Fined? Yes. How much? My whole heart. Going to do it again? Yes.

Our girls, says a New York correspondent, are using the shrug this fall with considerable effect. It is not the familiar French shrug, done with both shoulders, but is a nervous lift of one shoulder, accompanied by a neat little grimace on the corresponding side of the face. Miss Turner, the heroine at the Madison Square, employs it cleverly. As she wears a dress curiously open on the shoulders, while tight sleeved below and covering her neck above, the shrug is quite bewitching, with its small exposure of smooth, white skin.

The next Philharmonic Concert will take place on Friday evening, November 10th (instead of the 3d, as announced, owing to the Carnival). A famous suite, by Lachner, Schubert's B minor unfinished symphony, and a new work, by Saint-Saëns, will be included in the brilliant programme. Our well-known violinist, Mr. J. Hinrichs, will play a concerto, by Raff, with full orchestral accompaniment. Subscriptions will be received by Mr. Henry Heyman, care of Sherman, Clay & Co.

MRS. ANNA M. MORRISON REED, OF UKIAH City, has just issued a volume of her "Earlier Poems." The author is very popular in the interior counties, both as a writer and a lecturer, and the appearance of this volume is due to the solicitation of friends. Many of the verses are excellent, and few fall below mediocrity. Published by Bancroft.

—LOUIS BRAVERMAN, OF LOUIS BRAVERMAN & Co., returned from New York yesterday.

Perspectives.

Living, he threads the maze below,
And looking beyond, he saith,
"Ah me! to penetrate and know
The greatest of mysteries, Death!"

Dead, he wanders the phantom-land,
And viewing, behind, the strife
Of the world, he cries, "Ah, to understand
The greatest of mysteries, Life!"
—Harrison Robertson in November Harper.

To Edith.

(Written in an Autograph Album.)

She who comes to me and pleadeth
In the lovely name of Edith,
Will not fail of what was wanted.
Edith means the "Blessed," therefore
All that she may wish or care for Will, when best for her, be granted.

—Henry W. Longfellow, copied by November Century.

To Miss M. E. A. Ferguson.

Between the window and the fire
I sit and work the evening through—
That is, I work until I tire,
And then lean back and think of you.
Through the red curtains on my right
Faint little shuddering draughts come in;
Upon my left the fire burns bright:
Over your white-kid-glove-like skin
Fain would I see those shadows run,
Maud Ethel Alice Ferguson.

Why, even now I thought I saw
The fire-light tangled in your hair;
I turned with rapture touched with awe,
And felt a chill—you were not there!
Ah, how those sputtering candle flames
Would leap and dance if you were near!
And I—I'd call you all your names:
'Twould be just like a harem, dear—
A harem all rolled up in one—
Maud Ethel Alice Ferguson.

Ah, there, where you will never be,
I'll set an empty chair, and dream
I'm working and you're watching me—
How weirdly jolly it would seem!
My verse might have a clearer ring,
Perchance a deeper note as well
(Such luck to fireside fancies bring);
But you're not here, and who can tell?
Good-night—it strikes a lonely one—
Maud Ethel Alice Ferguson.

The Poet Years.

(Longfellow, Whittier, Mrs. Browning, Dr. Holmes, Tennyson, Poe, and Robert Browning were born during the years included by 1807 and 1812.)

Drop those six pages from the century's story,
And how much of its radiance were gone;
Drop from the day its crowning sunset glory,
The calm light of its dawn!
From that glad spring-time broke a full-voiced bevy,
With singing every heart and house to fill—
Perennial, though bound, and stark, and heavy,
The wintry earth lies still.

The robin, caroling so cheer, so docile;
The shy wood-thrush's chiming vesper-hell;
New England's bobolink, old England's thrush;
With blithe or plaintive swell.
The British blackbird's musical elations
America's wide vales and corn-fields thrill;
Far Britain hears the nightly iterations
Of mourning whirr-poor-will.

And both lands catch the wild-bird notes obscure
That yet rise ever and again so strong,
So high and clear—his flight than petrel surer—
Imperial, his song.

O choral jubilate! O years of healing,
Of joy, and light, and solace, hope and peace!
Long, long ere shall be hushed your anthem pealing,
Your consolation cease!
—James T. McKay in November Century.

OCTOBER—A WOOD.

"I know what you're going to say," she said,
And she stood up, looking uncommonly tall:
"You are going to speak of the hectic fall,
And say you are sorry the summer's dead,
And no other summer was like it, you know,
And can I imagine what made it so,
Now aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you're going to say," she said:
"You are going to ask if I forget
That day in June, when the woods were wet,
And you carried me"—here she drooped her head—
"Over the creek; you are going to say,
Do I remember that horrid day,
Now aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you're going to say," she said:
"You are going to say that since that time
You have rather tended to run to rhyme,
And"—her clear glance fell, and her cheek grew red—
"And have I noticed your tone was queer.
Why, everybody has seen it here!
Now aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," I said.

"I know what you're going to say," I said:
"You're going to say you've been much moved;
And I'm short of tact—you will say, 'devoid'
And I'm clumsy and awkward; and I call me Ted;
And I bear abuse like a dear old lamb;
And you'll have me, anyway, just as I am.
Now aren't you, honestly?" "Yes," she said.
—H. C. Bunner in November Harper.

The Baby Sorceress.

My baby sits beneath the tall elm trees,
A wreath of tangled ribbons in her hands;
She twines and twists the many-colored strands—
A little sorceress, weaving destinies.
Now the pure white she grasps; now naught can please
But strips of crimson, lurid as the brands,
From passion's fires, or yellow, like the sands
That lend soft setting to the azure seas.
And so with sweet, incessant toil she fills
A summer hour, still following fancies new,
For she, my heart's a sudden fancy thrills
That her weaves, her aimless choice prove true.
For our fates proceed not from our wills;
For that spins the thread shall blend the hues.
—W. Higginson in November Century.

AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL,

For Diseases of the Throat and Lungs, such as Coughs, Colds, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption.

The few compositions which have won the confidence of mankind and become household words, among not only one but many nations, must have extraordinary virtues. Perhaps no one ever secured so wide a reputation, or maintained it so long, as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL. It has been known to the public about forty years, by a long continued series of marvelous cures, that have won for it a confidence in its virtues, never equalled by any other medicine. It still makes the most effectual cures of Coughs, Colds, and Consumption that can be made by medical skill. Indeed, the CHERRY PECTORAL has really robbed these dangerous diseases of their terrors to a great extent, and given a feeling of immunity from their painful effects, that is well founded, if the remedy be taken in season. Every family should have it in their closet for the ready and prompt relief of its members. Sickness, suffering, and even life is saved by this timely defense. The prudent should not neglect it, and the wise will not keep it by you for the protection it affords by its early use in sudden attacks.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $2.50, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

A NOTED BUT UNTITLED WOMAN.

(From the Boston Globe.)

Messrs. Editors—

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. J. M. E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this.

On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says: "It works like a charm and saves much pain. It will entirely cure the worst forms of female diseases."

It permeates every portion of the system, and gives new life and vigor. It removes faintness, fatigues, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures Bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Stomachicness, Depression and Indigestion. That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times, and under all circumstances, act in harmony with the law that governs the female system.

It costs only $1.00 per bottle or six for $5.00, and is sold by druggists. Any advice required as to special cases, and the names of many who have been restored to perfect health by the use of the Vegetable Compound, can be obtained by addressing Mrs. P., with stamp for reply, at her home in Lynn, Mass.

For Kidney Complaint of either sex this compound is unsurpassed as abundant testimonials show.

"Mrs. Pinkham's Liver Pills," says one writer, "are the best in the world for the cure of Constipation, Biliousness and Torpidity of the Liver. Her Blood Purifier works wonders in its special line and bids fair to equal the Compound in its popularity."

All must respect her as an Angel of Mercy whose sole ambition is to do good to others.

SAN LEANDRO

VILLAGE CARTS

The above is the second of a series of cuts that will appear on this page of the Argonaut, illustrating the different styles in which these popular vehicles are made.

This engraving is a reduced copy of the working drawing from which my plainest style of Village Cart is made, and conveys but a poor idea of the elegant appearance of the vehicle itself when attached to a good horse and carrying two persons.

First—When requested, I give a written guarantee as follows with each vehicle:

I warrant it to be wholly free from that indignant and annoying bubbling motion common to other two-wheeled vehicles, which tires the occupant and hurts the horse's back, and to ride as smoothly and easily as the best buggy. I think no other responsible maker dare give such a warranty.

Second—My Patent Leveling Device simply perfects two-wheeled vehicles, and makes my Village Carts, in connection with their admirable system of springs and link-hangings, equal in every important respect to a four-wheeled vehicle. The Leveling Device enables the occupant to level the body in a moment, whether a large or small horse is used, and entirely prevents the seat from tipping backward or forward. This advantage is peculiar to this vehicle alone.

Third—The body is independent of the shafts, and can move up and down freely 10 or 12 inches, remaining level while doing so.

Samples of these Carts may be seen at Studebaker Bros., corner Beale and Market Streets, San Francisco.

Prices from $90 to $135. Send for illustrated circular and price list. Address:

THE HUNTING OF THE SOKO.

A Tale of the Dark Continent.

Lying on my back one terribly hot day under the great tamarind that shades the temple of Saravan, in Borneo, I began to think naturally of iced drinks, and from them my mind wandered to icebergs, and from icebergs to Polar bears.

Polar bears! At the recollection of these animals I sat bold upright, for though I had shot over nearly all the world, and accumulated a perfect museum of trophies, I had never till this moment thought of Greenland, nor of Polar bears! Before this I had begun to think I had exhausted nature. From the false elk of Ceylon to the true one of Canada, the rhinoceros of Assam to the coyote of Patagonia, the panther of Central India to the jaguars of the Amazon, I had seen everything in its own home, and shot it there. And for birds, I had hunted a so-called moa at Little Farm in New Zealand, the bustard in the Mahratta country, dropped geese into nearly every river of America, Europe, and Asia, and flushed almost all the glorious tribe of game birds, from the capercaillie of Norway to the quail of Sicily. My museum, however, wanted yet another skin—the Polar bear! I can not say the prospect pleased me. I would much rather have sent my compliments to the Polar bear, and asked him to come comfortably into some warm climate to be shot; but regretting was useless, so I gave the order of the day—the North Pole.

In London, however, I heard of Stanley's successful search for Livingstone, and then it was that the sense of my utter nothingness came over me. All Africa was unshot! It is true I had once gone from Bombay to Zanzibar, Dr. Kirke helping me on my way, and, thanks to Mackinnon's agents (who were busy prospecting a road into the interior), had bagged my hippopotamus, and enjoyed many a pleasant stalk after the fine antelope of the Bagomoyo plains. But the Dark Continent, itself, with its cloud-like herds of hartebest and springbok, its droves of wind-footed gnu, its zebras, ostriches, and lions, was still a virgin ground for me. But more than all these—more than ostrich, gnu, or zebra, more than hippopotamus, or lion—was that mystery of the primeval forest, the Soko. What was the Soko? Certainly not the gorilla, nor the chimpanzee, nor yet the orang-outang. Was it a new beast altogether, this man-like thing, that shakes the forest at the sources of the Congo with its awful voice—that desolates the villages of the jungle tribe of Uregga, carries off the women captive, and meets their cannibal lords in fair fight? With Soko on the brain it may be easily imagined that the Polar bear was forgotten, and I lost no time in altering my arrangements to suit my altered plans. My snow-shoes were countermanded, and solar helmets laid in; fur gloves and socks were exchanged for leather gaiters and canvas suits.

In a month I was ready, and in another two months had started from Zanzibar with a following of eighteen men. During my voyage I had carefully read the travels of Grant, Speke, Burton, Livingstone, Cameron, Schweinfurth, and Stanley, and in all had been struck by the losses suffered from fatigue on the march. With large expeditions it was of course necessary for most to go on foot, but with my pigmy cortège I could afford to let them ride. Good strong donkeys were cheap at Zanzibar, and I bought a baker's dozen of them, reserving three of the best for myself, and allotting ten among my men, to relieve them either of their burdens or the fatigue of walking, according to any fair arrangements—fair to the donkeys and to themselves—they chose to make among themselves. The result was no sickness, little fatigue, and constant good spirits. My goods consisted of my own personal effects, all on one donkey; my medicine-chest, etc., on another; fifteen man-loads of beads, wire, and cloth, for making friends with the natives and purchasing provisions; and three loads of ammunition. I was lucky in the time of my start, for Mirambo, "the terror of Africa," who had been scouring the centre of the continent for the past year, had just concluded peace with the Arabs, his enemies, and had, moreover, ordered every one also to keep the peace. The result to me was that each village was as barnless as the next.

Gayly enough, then, we strolled along, enjoying occasionally excellent sport, and wondering as we went where all the horrors and perils of African travel had gone. We had, it is true, our experience of them afterward; but the ground has now become so stale that I will pass over the interval of our journey from Zanzibar to Ujiji and thence to the river, and ask you to imagine us setting out for the forests that lie about the sources of the Livingstone in the district of Uregga, the Soko's home.

Nearly every traveler before me had spoken of the Soko, the man-beast of these primeval forests. Livingstone had a large store of legends and anecdotes about them, their intelligent cruelty, and their fierce, though frugivorous habits. Stanley constantly heard them. In one place he saw a Soko's platform in a tree, and in several villages found the skin, the teeth, and the skulls in possession of the people.

Wherever we went I was eager in my inquiries, but day after day slipped by, and still I neither heard the Soko alive, nor saw any portion of one dead. But even without encountering the great simia, our journey in these night-shade forests was sufficiently eventful, for great panther-like creatures, very pale-skinned, prowled about in the glimmering shades; and from the trees we sometimes saw hanging pythons of tremendous girth. But the reptile and insect world was chiefly in the ascendant here, and it was against such small persecutors as puff-adders, centipedes, poisonous spiders, and ants, that we had to guard ourselves. Traveling, however, owing to the dense shade, was not the misery that we had found it in the sun-smitten plains of Uuru, or the hideous ocean of scrub-jungle that stretches from Suna to Mgongo-Zembo. The trees, nearly all of three or four species of bombax, mvule, and aldrendon, were of stupendous size and impossible altitude, but growing so close together their crowns were tightly interwoven overhead, and sometimes not a hundred yards in a whole day's march was open to the sky. Moreover, in the hot-house air under this canopy had sprung up with incredible luxuriance every species of tree-fern, rattan, and creeping palm known, I should think, to the tropics, and among themselves in a stratum, often thirty feet below the upper roof of tree-foliage, had closely intermeshed their fronds and tendrils, so that we marched often in an oven atmosphere, but protected alike from the killing sun and flooding rain by double awnings of impenetrable leafage. The ground itself was bare of vegetation, except where, here and there, monstrous fungi clustered, like a condemned invoice of umbrellas and parasols, round some fallen giant of the forest, or where, in a screen of blossom, wonderful air-plants filled up great spaces from tree-trunk to tree-trunk.

At intervals we crossed rivulets of crystal water, icy cold, finding their way as best they might from hollow to hollow over the centuries' layers of fallen leaves, and along their courses grew in rich profusion masses of a broad-leaved sedge, that afforded the panther safe covert and easy couch; and sometimes, on approaching one of these rills, we would see a ghostly herd of deer flit away through the twilight shade. And thus it happened that one evening I was lying on my rug half asleep, with the pleasant deep-sea gloom about me, and a deathly stillness reigning over this world of trees, and wondering whether that was or was not a monkey perched high up among the palm fronds, when out from the sedges by a runnel there paced before me a panther of unusual size. From his gait I saw that he had a victim in view and turning my head was horrified to see that it was one of my own men, who was busy about something at the foot of a tree.

I jumped up with a shout, and the panther, startled by the sudden sound, plunged back in three great leaps into the sedges from which it had emerged. All my men jumped to their feet, and one of them, in his terror at the proximity of the beast of prey, turned and fled away in the depths of the forest. I watched his retreating figure as far as the eye could follow it in that light, and, laughing at his panic, went over to where my ass was tied, intending to stroll down for a shot at the panther. And while I was idly getting ready, the sound of excited conversation among my men attracted me, and I asked them what was the matter. One of them, the most sensible, English-minded African I ever met, stepped forward.

"We do not know, master," said he, "which of us it was that ran away just now. We are all here."

The full significance of his words did not strike me at first, and I laughed too.

"Oh, count yourselves," I said, "and you will soon find out."

"But we have counted, master," replied the man, "and all eighteen are here."

His meaning began to dawn on me. I felt a queer feeling creep over me.

"All here!" I ejaculated. "Must the men?"

And mustered they were—and to my astonishment, and even horror, I found the man was speaking the truth. Every man of my force was in his place.

Then who was the man who had run away, when all the party started up from their sleep? A ghost? I looked round into the deepening gloom. All my men were standing together, looking rather frightened. Around us stretched the eternal forest. A ghost! And then on a sudden, the thought flashed across me—I had seen the Soko.

I had seen the Soko, and, seeing it, had mistaken it for a human being! And while I was still loading my cartridge-belt, Shumari, my gun-boy, had crept up to my side, with my express in one hand and heavy elephant rifle in the other; but on his face there was a strange, concerned expression, and in the tone of his voice an uneasy tremor, with which something in my own feelings sympathized.

"Is the master going to hunt the wild man?" asked the lad.

"The Soko? Yes, I want its skin," I replied.

"But the wild man cried out, 'Ai! ma-ma' ['Oh, mother, mother'] as it ran away, and—"

"Here is the wild man's stick," broke in Mabruki, the Zanzibari; and as he spoke he held out toward me a long staff, seven feet in length. All the blood in my body ran cold at the sight of it. It was a mere length of rattan, without ferule or knot, but at the upper end the bark had been torn down from joint to joint in parallel stripes, to give the holder a firmer grip than one could have had on smooth cane, and just below the second joint the stumps of the corresponding shoots on two sides had been left sticking out for the hand to rest on.

How can I describe the throng of hideous thoughts that whirled through my brain on the instant that I recognized these efforts of reason in the animal that I was now going to hunt to the death? But swift as were my thoughts, Mabruki had thought them out before me, and had come to a conclusion. "The mshenshi mtato [oagan ape] has stolen this stick from some village," said he; "see," and he pointed to the smoothed offshoots, "they have stained them with the mvule juice."

The instant relief I felt at this happy solution of the dreadful mystery was expressed by me in a shout of joy; so sudden and so real that, without knowing why, my men shouted too, and with such a will that the monkeys that had been gravely pondering over our preparations for the evening meal were startled out of their self-respect and off their perches, and plunged precipitately into a tangle of lianes. My spirits had returned, and, with as light a heart as ever I had, I ambled off in the direction the Soko had taken.

But soon the voices of the camp had died away behind me, and there had grown up between me and it the wall of mist that in this sunless forest region makes every mile as secret from the next as if you were in the highest ether—surely the most secret of all places—or in the lowest sea. And over the soft, rich vegetable mould the ass's feet went noiselessly as an owl's wing upon the air; and, except for the rhythmic jingling of his ass's harness, Shumari's presence might never have been suspected. And then in this cathedral solitude—with cloistered tree-trunks reaching away at every point of view into long vistas closed in gray mist; overhead, hanging like tattered tapestry, great lengths and rags of moss-growths, strange textures of fungus and parasite, hanging plumb down in endless points, all as motionless as possible; without a breath of life stirring about me—bird, beast, or insect—the same horrid thoughts took possession of me again, and I began to recall the gestures of the wild thing which, when I startled the panther, had fled away into the forest depths.

It had stood upright among the upright men, and turning to run had stooped, but only so much as a man might do when running with all his speed. In the gait there was a one-sided swing, just as some great man-ape—gorilla or chimpanzee—might have when, as travelers tell us, they help themselves along on the knuckles of the long fore-arm, the body swaying down to the side on which the hand touches the ground at each stride. In one hand was a small branch of some leafy shrub, for I distinctly remembered having seen it as it began to run. The speed must have been great, for it was very soon out of sight; but there was no appearance of rapidity in the movement—like the wolf's slow-looking gallop, that no horse can overtake, and that soon tires out the fleetest hound. As it began to run it had made a jabbering sound—an inarticulate expression of simple human fear I had thought it to be; but now, pondering over it, I began to wonder that I could have mistaken that swiftly retreating figure for human.

It is true that I did not want to think of it as human, and perhaps my wishes may have colored my retrospect; at any rate, whatever the process, I found myself, after a while, laughing at myself for having turned sick at heart when the suspicion came across me that perhaps the Soko of the forests of Uregga, the feast-day dish of the jungle tribes, might be a human being. The long, lolling gait, the jabbering, should alone have dispelled the terror. It is true that my men heard it say, "Oh, ma-ma!" as it started up to run by them. But in half the languages of the world mama is a synonym for "mother," and it follows, therefore, that it is not a word at all, but simply the phonetic rendering of the first bleating, babbling articulation of babyhood—an animal noise, uttered as articulately by young sheep and young goats as by young men and women. The staff, too, was of the common type in these districts, and had been picked up, no doubt, by the Soko in some twilight prowling round a grain store, or perhaps gained in some fair fight from a villager whom it had surprised, solitary and defenseless. And then my thoughts ran upon all I had read or heard of the Soko, of its societies for mutual defense or food-supply, and the comparative amiability of such communities; of the solitary, outlawed Soko, the vindictive, lawless bandit of the trees, who wanders about round the habitations of men, lying in wait for the women and the children, robbing the granaries and the orchards, and stealing, for the simple larceny's sake, household chattels, of the use of which it is ignorant. Shumari, a hunter born and bred, was full of Soko lore. The skin, he said, was covered, except on the throat, hands, and feet, with a short, harsh hair of a dark color, and tipped in the older individuals with gray; these also had long growths of hair on the head, their cheeks, and lips. It had no tail.

"Standing up," said he, "it is as tall as I am, [he was only five feet one inch,] and its eyes are together in front of its face, so that it looks at you straight. It eats sitting up, and when tired, leans its back against a tree, putting its hands behind its head. Three men of my village came upon one asleep in this way one day, and so quietly that before it awoke two of them had speared it. It started up, and threw back its head to give a loud cry of pain, and then, leaning its elbow against the tree, it bent its head down upon its arms, and so died—leaning against the tree, with one supporting the head, and the other pressed to it. There was a Soko village there, for they saw all the forms in the trees, and the ground was heaped up with snail-shells and fruit-skins. But they did not more Sokos. Another day I myself was out hunting with a party, and we found a dead Soko. I had thrown my spear at a tree-cat, and going to pick it up, saw, close by, a large heap of myombo leaves. I turned some up with my spear, and found a dead Soko underneath. When a Soko catches a man, it holds him, and makes faces at him, and jabbars; sometimes it lets him go without doing him any harm, but generally it bites off all his fingers, one by one, spitting them out as it bites them off; and his nose, and ears, and toes, as well, and ends up by strangling him with its fingers, or beating him to death with a branch. Women and children are never seen again, so I suppose the Sokos eat them. They have no spears or knives, and they do not use anything that men use, except that they walk with sticks, knocking down fruit with them, and that they drink water out of their hands. Their front teeth are very sharp, and at each side is one longer and sharper than the rest."

And so we went on chattering to me, as we ambled through the shade in a stupid pursuit of an invisible thing. The stupidity of it dawned upon me at last, and I stopped, and without explaining the change to my companion, turned and rode homeward.

The twilight shadows of the day were now deepening into night, and we hurried on. The fireflies began to flicker along the sedge-grown rills, and, high up among the leaf-coronets of the elais palm, were clustering in a mazy dance. Passing a tangle of lianes, I heard an owl or some night-bird hoot gently from the foliage, and as we went along the fowl seemed to keep pace with us, for the ventriloquist sound was always with us, fast though we rode; and first from one side and then from the other we heard the low-voiced complaining following. And the "eeriness" of the company grew upon me. There was no sound of wings or rustling of leaves; but for mile after mile the low hoot, hoot, of the thing that was following sounded so close at hand that I kept on looking round. Shumari, like all savages—they approach animals very nearly in this—was intensely susceptible to the superstitious and uncanny, and long before the ghostliness of the persistent voice occurred to me, I had noticed that Shumari was keeping as close to me as possible. But at last, whether it was from constantly turning my head over my shoulder to see what was coming after us, or whether I was unconsciously infected by his nervousness, I got as fidgety as he, and, for the sake of human company, opened conversation.

"What bird makes that noise?" I asked.

Shumari did not reply, and I repeated the question.

And then, in a voice so absurd from its assumption of boldness that I laughed outright, he said:

"No bird, master. It is a mitummu [spirit] that is following us. Let us go quicker."

Here was a position! We had all the evening been hunting nothing, and now we were being hunted by nothing! The memory of Shumari's voice made me laugh again, and just then catching sight of the twinkling camp-fires in the far distance, I laughed at myself, too. And, on a sudden, just as my laugh ceased, there came from the rattan brake past which we were riding, a sound that was, and yet was not, the echo of my laugh. It sounded something like my laugh, but it was repeated twice, and the creature I rode, as though it was, turned its head toward the brake. Shumari meanwhile had seen the camp-fires, and his terror overpowering discipline, he gave one howl of horror, and fled; his ass, seeing the fires, too, falling into the humor with all his will, and carrying off his rider at full speed. My ass wanted to follow, but I pulled him up, and to make further trial of the hidden jester, shouted out, in Swahili:

"Who is there?"

The answer was as sudden as horrifying. For an instant the brake swayed to and fro, and then there came the crashing of branches, as of some great beast forcing his way through them, and on a sudden, close behind me, burst out—the Soko!

Shumari had carried off my guns, and, except for the short knife in my belt, I was defenseless. And there before me in the flesh stood the creature I had gone out to hunt, but which, for ever so many miles, must have been hunting us. I had no leisure for moralizing, or even for examination of the creature before me. It seemed to be about Shumari's height; but was immensely broad at the shoulders, and in one hand it carried the fragment of a bough. Had it been simply man against man, I would have stood my ground—but was it? The dim light prevented my noticing any details, and I had no inclination nor time to scrutinize the features of the thing that now approached me. I saw the white teeth flashing, heard a deep-chested stuttering, inarticulate with rage, and, flinging myself from the ass, which was trembling and rooted to the spot with fear, I ran as I had never run before, in the direction of the camp.

The Soko must have stopped to attack the ass; for I heard a scuffle behind me as I started; but very soon the ass came tearing past me, and, looking round, I saw the Soko in pursuit. The heavy branch fortunately encumbered its progress, but it gained upon me. Close behind me I heard the thing jabbering and panting, and for an instant thought of standing at bay. I was running my hardest; but it seemed, just as in a nightmare, as if horror had partly paralyzed my limbs, and I was only creeping along. The horror of such pursuit was, I felt, culminating in sickness, and I thought I should swoon and fall; but just then I became aware of approaching lights; the camp-fires seemed to be running to me. The Soko, however, was fast overtaking me, and I struggled on; but it was of no use, and my feet tripping against the projecting root of an old mvule, I fell on my knees; but, rising again, I staggered against the tree, drew my knife, and waited for the attack. In an instant the Soko was up with me, and, dropping its bough, reached out its arms to seize me. I lunged at it with my knife, but the length of its arms baffled me; for before the point of my knife could find its body, the Soko's hands had grasped my shoulders, and with such astonishing force that it seemed as if my arms were being displaced in their sockets. The next moment a third hand seized hold of my leg below the knee, and I was instantly jerked to the ground. The fall partially stunned me, and then I felt a rough-haired body fall heavily on me, and, groping their way to my throat, long fingers began to strangle me. I struggled with the creature, but against its strength my hands were nerveless. The fingers had now reached my throat; I felt the grasp tightening, and gave myself up to death. But on a sudden there was a confusion of voices, a flashing of bright lights before my eyes, and the weight was all at once raised from off me. In another minute I had recovered my consciousness, and found that my men, the gallant Mabruki at their head, had charged to my rescue with burning brands, and arrived only just in time to save my life.

And the Soko?

As I lay there, my faithful followers around me with their brands still flickering, the voice of the Soko came to us, but from which direction it was impossible to say, soft and mysterious as before—the same hoot, hoot, that had puzzled us on our homeward route.

My narrow escape from a horrible though somewhat absurd death was celebrated by my men with extravagant demonstrations of indignation against the Soko that had hunted me, and many respectful reproaches for my temerity. For myself, I was more eager than ever to capture or kill the formidable thing that had outwitted and outmatched me; and so, having had my arms well rubbed with oil, I gave the order for a general muster next morning for a grand Soko hunt.

Now, close by our camp grew a great tree, from which hung down liane strands of every rope-thickness, and all round its roots had grown up a dense hedge of strong-spined cane. One of my men, sent up the tree to cut us off some of these natural ropes, reported that all around the tree—that is, between its trunk and the cane hedge—there was a clear space; so that though, looking at it from the outside, it seemed as though the canes grew right up to the tree-trunk, looking at it from above, there was seen to be really an open pathway, so to speak, surrounding the tree, and broad enough for three men to walk abreast. I had often heard of similar cases of vegetable aversions, where, from some secret cause of plant-prejudice, two shrubs, though growing together, exercise this mutual repulsion, and never actually combine in growth. Meanwhile, the phenomenon was interesting to me for other reasons; for I saw at once what a convenient receptacle this natural well would make for the baggage we had to leave behind.

Leaving our effects therefore inside this brake, which we did by slinging the hales one after the other over an overhanging bough, and so dropping them into the open pathway, and removing from the neighborhood every trace of our recent encampment, we started westward with four days' provisions, ready cooked, on our backs. The method of march was in line, each man about a hundred yards from the next, and every second man on an ass, the riders carrying the usual ivory horns, without which no travelers in the Uregga forests ever move from home, and the notes of which, exactly like the cry of the American wood-marmot, keep the party in line. By this means we covered a mile, and being unencumbered, marched fast, scouring the wood before us at the rate of four miles an hour for three hours.

And what a wild, weird time it was, those three hours—marching with noiseless footfalls, looking constantly right and left and overhead. I could see the line of shadowy figures advancing on either side; not a sound along the whole line, except when the horns carried down, in response to one another, their thin, wailing notes, or when some palm-fruit, over ripe, dropped rustling down through the canopy of foliage above us. And yet the whole forest was instinct with life. If you set yourself to listen, there came to your ears, all day and night, a great monotone of sound humming through the misty shade, the aggregate voices of millions of insect things that had their being among the foliage or in the daylight that reigned in the outer world above those green clouds which made perpetual twilight for us who were passing underneath. Along the tree-roof streamed also troops of monkeys, and flocks of parrots and other birds; but in their passage overhead we could not, through the dense vault of foliage, branch, and blossom, hear their voices, except as merged in the one great sound that filled all space, too large almost to be heard at all. In the midst, then, of this vast murmur of confused nature, we seemed to walk in absolute silence. The ear had grown so accustomed to it that a sneeze was heard with a start, and the occasional knocking together of asses' hoofs made every head turn suddenly, and every rifle move to the shoulder.

At the end of three hours' marching we came to a river—perhaps that which Stanley, in his "Dark Continent," names the Asna—flowing northwest, with a width here of only one hundred yards—a deep, slow stream, crystal clear, flowing without a ripple or a murmur through the perpetual gloaming, between banks of soft, rich, black leaf-mold. We halted; and, after a rapid meal, reformed in line, and, marching for two miles easterly up the river, made a left-wheel; and in the same order, and at the same pace as we had advanced, continued for two hours rather in a northerly direction; and then making a left-wheel again, started off due west, crossing the tracks of our morning's march in our fourth mile, and reaching the Asna again in our tenth mile—a total march of nearly thirty-two miles, of which, of course, each man had traversed only one-half on foot. No cooking was allowed, and our collation was therefore soon dispatched, and before I had lighted my pipe and curled myself up I saw that all the party were snug under their mosquito-nets.

I had noticed, when reading travelers' books, that they always suffered severely from mosquitoes and other insects. I determined that I would not; so, before leaving Zanzibar, served out to every man twenty yards of net. These, in the day-time were worn round the head as turbans, and at night spread upon sticks, and furnished each man a protection against these Macbeths of the sedge and brake. The men thoroughly understood their value, and, before turning in for the night, always examined their nets for stray holes, which they caught together with fibres. But somehow I could not go to sleep for a long while; the pain in my arm where the Soko seized me was very great at times. Besides, I felt haunted; and, indeed, when I awoke and found it already four o'clock, it did not seem that I had been asleep at all. But the time for sleep was now over; so, awakening the expedition, we ate a silent meal, and, noiselessly remounting, were again on the war-trail. On this, the second day, we marched some three miles down the river, northwest, and then, taking a half right-wheel, started off northeast, passing to the north of our camp at about the eleventh mile. Here the first sign of life we had seen since we started broke the tedium of our ghost-like progress.

Between myself and the next man on the line was running a little stream, fed probably by the dews that here rained down upon us from the mvule-trees. These, more than others, seemed to condense the heated upper air, their leaves being thick in texture, and curiously cool—for which reason the natives prefer them for butter and oil-dishes. Along the stream, as usual, crowded a thick fringe of white-starred sedge. On a sudden there was a swaying of the herbage, and out bounced a splendidly spotted creature of the cat kind. Immediately behind him crept out his mate; and there they stood—the male, his crest and all the hair along the spine erect with anger at our intrusion, his tail swinging and curling with excitement; beside him, and half behind him, the female, crouching low on the ground, her ears laid back along the head, and motionless as a carved stone. My ass saw the pair, and instinct warning it that the beautiful beasts were dangerous to it, with that want of judgment and consideration so characteristic of asses, it must needs Bray. And such a Bray! At every hee it pumped up enough air from its lungs to have contented an organ, and at every haw it vented a shattering blast to which all the slogans of all the clans were mere puling. It brayed its very soul out in the suddenness of the terror. The effect on the leopards was instant and complete. There was just one lightning flash of color—a yellow streak across the space before me, and, plump! the splendid pair soused into a murderous tangle of creeping palms. That they could ever have got out of the awful trap, with its millions of strong spines, barbed like fish-hooks, and as strong as steel, is probably impossible; but the magnificent promptitude of the suicide, its picturesque completeness, were undeniable.

The ass, however, was by no means soothed by the meteor-like disappearance of the beasts of prey, and the gruesome dronings, that, in spite of hard whacks, it indulged in for many minutes, betrayed the depth of its emotions and the cavernous nature of its interior organization. The ass, like the savage, has no perception of the picturesque.

After the morning meal I allowed a three hours' rest, and, in knots of twos and threes along the line, the party sat down, talking in subdued tones (for silence was the order of the march) or comfortably snoozing. I slept myself as well as my aching arm would let me. The march resumed, I wheeled the line with its front due west, and after another two hours' rapid advance we found ourselves again at the river, some seven miles farther down its course than the point from which we had started in the morning; and after a hurried meal, I gave the order for home. Striking south-easterly, we crossed in our fifth mile the track of the morning, and in the thirteenth reached our camp. By this means, it will be seen, we had effectually triangulated a third of a circle of eleven miles radius from our camp—and with absolutely no result. During the next two days I determined to scour, if possible, the remaining semi-circle. Meanwhile, we were at the point we had started from, and though it was nearly certain that at any rate one Soko was in the neighborhood, we had fatigued ourselves with nearly seventy miles of marching without finding a trace of it.

As nothing was required from our concealed store, we had only to eat and go to sleep; and so the men, after laughing together for a while over the snug arrangements I had made for the safety of our goods, and pretending to have doubts as to this being the real site of the hidden property of the expedition, were soon asleep in a hatch. I went to sleep, too; not a sound sleep, for I could not drive from my memory the hideous recollection of that evening, only two days before, when, nearly in the same spot, I was lying in the Soko's power. And thinking about it, I got so restless that, under the irresistible impression that some supernatural presence was about me, I unpegged my mosquito-net, and, getting up, began to pace about. I wore at night a long cashmere dressing-gown, in lieu of the tighter canvas coat. I had been leaning against a tree; but feeling that the moisture that trickled down the trunk was soaking my back, I was moving off, when my ears were nearly split by a shout from behind me—"Soko! Soko!" and the next instant I found myself flung violently to the ground, and struggling with—Mabruki! The pain caused by the sudden fall at first made me furious at the mistake that had been made; but the next instant, when the whole absurdity of the position came upon me, I roared with laughter.

The savage is very quickly infected by mirth, and in a minute, as soon as the story got round how Mabruki had jumped upon the master for a Soko, the whole camp was in fits of laughter. Sleep was out of the question with my aching back and aching sides; and so, mixing myself some grog and lighting my pipe, I made Mabruki shampoo my limbs with oil. While he did so he began to talk:

"Does the master ever see devils?"

"Devils? No."

"Mabruki does, and all the Wanyamwazi of his village do, for his village elders are the keepers of the charm against evil spirits of the whole land of Unyamwazi, and they often see them. I saw a devil to-night."

"Was the devil like a Soko?" I asked, laughing.

"Yes, master," he replied, "like a Soko; but I was always asleep, and never saw it, but whenever it came to me it said, 'I am here,' and then at last I got frightened and got up, and then I saw you, master, and—"

But we were both laughing again, and Mabruki stopped.

It was strange that he, too, should have felt the same uncanny presence that had afflicted me. But under Mabruki's manipulation I soon fell asleep. I awoke with a start. Mabruki had gone. But much the same inexplicable, restless feeling that men say they have felt under ghostly visitations, impelled me to get up, and, this time lighting a pipe to prevent mistakes, I resumed my sauntering, and, tired at last of being alone, I awoke my men for the start, although day was not yet breaking. Half asleep, a meal was soon discussed, and in an hour we were again on the move. Shumari had lagged behind, as usual, and on his coming up I reproved him for being the last.

"I am not the last," he said; "Zaidi, the Wangwana, is not here yet. I saw him climbing up for a liane [the men got their ropes from these useful plants] just as I was coming away, and I called out to him that you would be angry." "Peace!" said Baraka, the man next to me; "is not that Zaidi the Wangwana there, riding on the ass? It was not he. It was that good-for-nothing Tarya. He is always the last to stand up and the first to sit down."

"No doubt, then," said Shumari, "it was Tarya; shame on him. He is no bigger than Zaidi, and has hair like his. Besides, it was in the mist I saw him."

I had heard enough—the nervousness of the night still afflicted me.

"Sound the halt!" I cried; "call the men together."

In three minutes all were grouped around me—not one was missing! Tarya was far ahead, riding on an ass, and had therefore been one of the first to start.

"Who was the last to leave camp?" I asked; and, by unanimous voice, it was agreed to be Shumari himself.

Shumari, then, had seen the Soko! And our storehouse was the Soko's home!

The rest of the men had not heard the preceding conversation; so, putting them in possession of the facts, I gave the order for returning to our camp. We approached. I halted the whole party, and hindling up the asses' mouths with cloths, we tied them to a stout liane, and then, dividing the party into two, led one myself round to the south side of the camp by a détour, leaving the other about half a mile to the north of it, with orders to rush toward the canebrake and surround it at a hundred yards' distance as soon as they heard my bugle. Passing swiftly round, we were soon in our places, and then, deploying my men on either side so as to cover a semicircle, I sounded the bugle. The response came in an instant, and in a few minutes there was a cordon round the brake at one hundred yards radius, each man about twenty yards or so from the next. But all was silent as the grave. As yet nothing had got through our line, I felt sure; and if, therefore, Shumari had indeed seen the Soko, the Soko was still within the circle of our guns. A few tufts of young rattan grew between the line and the brake in the centre of which were our goods, and unless it was up above us, hidden in the impervious canopy overhead, where was the Soko? A shot was fired into each tuft, and in breathless excitement, the circle began to close in upon the brake.

"Let us fire!" cried Mahruki.

"No, no!" I shouted, for the bullets would perhaps have whistled through the lianes among ourselves. "Catch the Soko alive if you can."

But first we had to sight the Soko; and this, in an absolutely impenetrable clump of rope-thick creepers, was impossible, except from above.

Shumari, as agile as a monkey, was called, and ordered to climb up the tree, the branches of which had served us to sling our goods into the brake, and to see if he could espy the intruder. The lad did not like the job; but with the pluck of his race obeyed, and was soon slung up over the hough, and creeping along it, overhanging the centre of the brake. All faces were upturned toward him as he peered down within the wall of vegetation. For many minutes there was silence, and then came Shumari's voice:

"No, master, I can not see the Soko."

"Climb on to the big liane," called out Mahruki. The lad obeyed, and made his way from knot to knot of the swinging strand. The end of it was rooted into the ground at the foot of the tree inside the cane-brake, the other, in cable thickness, hanging down loose within the circle. We, watching, saw him look down, and on the instant heard him cry:

"Ai! ma-ma! the Soko, the Soko!" and while the lad spoke we saw the haoging creeper violently jerked, and then swung to and fro, as if some creature of huge strength had hold of the loose end of it and was trying to shake Shumari from his hold.

"Help! help, master!" cried Shumari. "I am falling;" and then he lost his hold and fell with a crash down into the brake, and for an instant we held our breath to listen—but all was quiet as death. The next instant, at a dozen different points, axes were at work clearing the lianes. For a few minutes nothing was to be heard but the deep breathing of the straining men and the crashing of the branches; and then on a sudden, at the side farthest from me, came a shout and a shot, a confused rush of frantic animal noises, and the sounds of a fierce struggle.

In an instant I was round the brake, and there lay Shumari, apparently unhurt, and the Soko—dying.

"Untie his hands," I said. This was done, and the wounded thing made an effort to stagger to its feet.

A dozen arms thrust it to the ground again. "Let him rise," I said; "help him to rise;" and Mahruki helped the Soko on to its feet.

Powers above! If this were an ape, what else were half my expedition? The wounded wood-thing passed its right arm round Mahruki's neck, and, taking one of his hands, pressed it to its own heart. A deep sob shook its frame, and then it lifted back its head and looked to turn into all the faces round it, with the death-glaze settling fast in its eyes. I came nearer, and took its hand as it hung on Mahruki's shoulder. The muscles, gradually contracting in death, made it seem as if there was a gentle pressure of my palm, and then—the Thing died.

Life left it so suddenly that we could not believe that all was over. But the Soko was really dead, and close to where he lay I had him buried.

"Master said he wanted the Soko's skin," said Shumari, in a weak voice, reminding me of my words of a few days before.

"No, no," I said; "hurry the wild man quickly. We shall march at once."—From Philip Robinson's "Under the Sun."

The Anglo-Indian cavalry went into the Tel-el-Kehir fight with nothing on but a turban and a piece of cloth round the loins. The Arahs were greatly astonished at the apparition, and still more astonished to find their consummate masters in the use of cold steel. The Sikh horsemen (who it is well known worship their swords, according to the teachings of their scripture, the Adi-Granth) refused to reload their revolvers. A French eye-witness of the scene says that the sahering was peculiarly terrible. These Eastern swordsmen never thrust; and seldom strike save at the arms and head, in almost every instance inflicting fatal wounds. Since the Indian mutiny, the English are careful to keep only a small number of these dangerous mercenaries under arms. They use no reins, guiding their horses only by a pressure of the knee, like the South American gauchos.

Haunted Houses.

All houses wherein men have lived and died
Are haunted houses. Through the open doors
The harmless phantoms on their errands glide,
With feet that make no sound upon the floors.
We meet them at the doorway, on the stair,
Along the passages they come and go,
Impalpable impressions on the air,
A sense of something moving to and fro.

There are more guests at table than the hosts
Invited; the illuminated hall
Is thronged with quiet, inoffensive ghosts,
As silent as the pictures on the wall.
The stranger at my fireside can not see
The forms I see, nor hear the sounds I hear;
He but perceives what is, while unto me
All that has been is visible and clear.

We have no title-deeds to house or lands;
Owners and occupants of earlier dates
From graves forgotten stretch their dusty hands,
And hold in mortmain still their old estates.
The spirit-world around this world of sense
Floats like an atmosphere, and everywhere
Wafts through these earthly mists and vapors dense
A vital breath of more ethereal air.

Our little lives are kept in equipoise
By opposite attractions and desires;
The struggle of the instinct that enjoys,
And the more noble instinct that aspires.
These perturbations, this perpetual jar
Of earthly wants, and aspirations high,
Come from the influence of an unseen star,
An undiscovered planet in our sky.

And as the moon from some dark gate of cloud
Throws o'er the sea a floating bridge of light,
Across whose trembling planks our fancies crowd
Into the realm of mystery and night—
So from the world of spirits there descends
A bridge of light, connecting it with this,
O'er whose unsteady floor, that sways and bends,
Wander our thoughts above the dark abyss.

—Henry W. Longfellow.

The Haunted House.

'Tis hard for human actions to account,
Whether from reason or from impulse only—
But some internal prompting made me mount
The gloomy stairs and lonely
Those gloomy stairs, so dark, and damp, and cold,
With odors as from bones and relics carnal,
Deprived of rite and consecrated mold,
The chapel vault, or charnel.
The air was thick, and in the upper gloom
The bat—or something in its shape—was winging;
And on the wall, as chilly as a tomb,
The Death's-Head moth was clinging.
Such omens in the place there seemed to be,
At every crooked turn, or on the landing,
The straining eyeball was prepared to see
Some Apparition standing.
Yet no portentous Shape the sight amazed;
Each object plain, and tangible, and valid;
But from their tarnish'd frames dark Figures gazed,
And Faces spectre-palid.
Such earnest woe their features overcast,
They might have stirred, or sighed, or wept, or spoken;
But, save the hollow moaning of the blast,
The stillness was unbroken.
No other sound or stir of life was there,
Except my steps in solitary clamber
From night to flight, from humid stair to stair,
From chamber into chamber.
Deserted rooms of luxury and state,
That old magnificence had richly furnished
With pictures, cabinets of ancient date,
And carvings gilt and burnished;
Rich hangings, storied by the needle's art,
With scripture history, or classic fable;
But all had faded, save one ragged part,
Where Cain was slaying Abel.

The silent waste of mildest and the moth
Had marred the tissue with a partial ravage;
But undecaying frowned upon the cloth
Each feature stern and savage.
The sky was pale; the cloud a thing of doubt;
Some hues were fresh, and some decayed and duller;
But still the Bloody Hand shone strangely out
With vehemence of color!
The Bloody Hand that with a lurid stain
Shone on the dusty floor, a dismal token,
Projected from the casement's painted pane,
Where all beside was broken—
The Bloody Hand, significant of crime,
That, glaring on the old heraldic banner,
Had kept its crimson unimpaired by time,
In such a wondrous manner!

The Death-Watch ticked behind the paneled oak,
Inexplicable tremors shook the arras,
And echoes strange and mystical awoke,
The fancy to embarrass.
Across the door no gossamer festoon
Swung pendulous—no web—no dusty fringes,
No silky chrysalis or white cocoon
About its nooks and hinges.
The spider shunned the interdicted room,
The moth, the beetle, and the fly were banished,
And where the sunbeam fell athwart the gloom
The very midge had vanished.

One lonely ray that glanced upon a Bed,
As if with awful aim direct and certain,
To show the Bloody Hand in burning red
Embroidered on the curtain.
And yet no gory stain was on the quilt—
The pillow in its place had slowly rotted;
The floor alone retain'd the trace of guilt,
Those boards obscurely spotted;
Obscurely spotted the door, and thence
With mazy doubles to the grated casement—
Oh, what a tale they told of fear intense,
Of horror and amazement!

What human creature in the dead of night
Had coursed like hunted hare that cruel distance?—
Had sought the door, the window, in his flight,
Striving for dear existence?
What shrieking Spirit in that bloody room
Its mortal frame had violently quitted?
Across the sunbeam, with a sudden gloom,
A ghostly Shadow flitted.
Across the sunbeam, and along the wall,
But painted on the air so very dimly,
It hardly veiled the tapestry at all,
Or portrait frowning grimly.
O'er all there hung the shadow of a fear,
A sense of mystery the spirit haunted,
And said, as plain as whisper in the ear,
The place is Haunted!

—Thomas Hood.

BILL NYE'S HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

Familiar Recipes.

To remove oils, varnishes, resins, tar, oyster soup, currant jelly, and other selections from the bill of fare—Use heozine soap and chloroform cautiously with whitewash brush and garden hose. Then hang on the wood-pile to remove the pungent effluvia of the heozine. To clean ceilings that have been smoked by kerosene lamps or the fragrance of fried salt pork—Remove the ceiling, wash thoroughly with horax, turpentine, and rain-water, then hang on the clothes-line to dry. Afterward pulverize, and spread over the pie-plant bed for spring wear. To remove starch and roughness from flat-irons—Hold the iron on a large grindstone for twenty moments or so, then wipe off carefully with a rag. To make this effective, the grindstone should be in motion while the iron is applied. To soften water for household purposes—Put an ounce of quicklime into a certain quantity of water. If it is not sufficient, use less water or more quicklime. Should the immediate lime continue to remain deliquescent, lay the water down on a stone, and pound it with a hase-hall club. To give relief to a burn—Apply the white of an egg. The yolk of the egg may be eaten, or placed on the shirt-hosom, according to the taste of the person. If the burn should occur on a lady, she may omit the last instruction. To wash black silk stockings—Prepare a tub of lather, composed of tepid rain-water and white soap, with a little ammonia. Then stand in the tub till dinner is ready. Roll in a cloth to dry. Do not wring, but press, the water out. This will necessitate the removal of the stockings. If your hands are badly chapped, wet them in warm water, rub them all over with Indian meal, then put on a coat of glycerine, and keep them in your pockets for ten days. If you have no pockets convenient, insert them in the pockets of a friend. An excellent liniment for toothache or neuralgia is made of sassafras, oil of organum, and a half-ounce of tincture of capsicum, with half a pint of alcohol. Soak nine yards of red flannel in this mixture, wrap it around the head, and then insert the head in a haystack till death comes to your relief. Woolen goods may be nicely washed, if you put half an ox-gall into two gallons of tepid water. It might be well to put the goods into the water also. If the mixture is not strong enough, put in another ox-gall. Should this fail to do the work, put in the entire ox, reserving the tail for soup. The ox-gall is comparatively useless for soup, and should not be preserved as an article of diet.

A Soliloquy on Carving.

Speaking about carving, there is a prospect now that in our best circles, within a short time, the old custom of making the host demolish the kiln-dried poultry at dinner will become extinct, and that a servant at a side-board, on a small salary, will take a hand-saw and a can of nitro-glycerine and shatter the remains, thus giving the host a chance to chat with his guests instead of spattering them with dressing and castling gloom and gravity over the company. This is a move for which I have long contended. It places the manual labor of a dinner where it belongs, and relieves a man who should give his whole attention to the entertainment of his friends at table. You would not expect your host to take off his coat and kill the fowl in your presence in order to show you that it was all on the square, and it is not customary to require the proprietor of the house to peel the potatoes at table for his guests to prove that there is no put-up job about it. Therefore, I claim that the lamented hen may be thoroughly shattered at a side-table by an athlete at four dollar per week, and still good faith toward the guests be maintained. If any one be doubtful or suspicious, etiquette will permit him to stand by the side of the birling carver and witness the inquest. Still it would be better fun for him to sit at the table, and if the parts given him are not satisfactory, he can put them in his overshoes pro tem., and casually throw them out the back door while the other guests are listening to the "Maiden's Prayer" in the parlor. Under the new deal the host will enjoy the dinner much more than he used to with his thumb cut off and a quart of dressing on his lap. No man feels perfectly at home if he has to wrap up his cut finger in a rag and then scoop a handful of dressing out of his vest pocket and return it to the platter. Few men are cool enough to do this, laughing heartily all the time and telling some mirth-provoking anecdote meanwhile. It is also annoying to have twenty guests ask for the "dark meat, please," when there are only three animals cooked and neither one of them had a particle of dark meat about her person. Lately I have adopted the plan of segregating the fowl by main strength, using the fingers when necessary, and then wiping them in an off-hand manner on the tablecloth. Then I ask the servant to bring in that dark hen we ordered, so that we might have an abundance of dark meat. If the servant says there is none, I smile, and tell the guests that the brunette chicken, by some oversight, has been eaten in the kitchen, and I shall have to give them such relics as may be at hand. This simplifies the matter, and places me in a far more agreeable place relative to the company. My great success, however, in carving is mainly confined to the watermelon. The watermelon does not confuse me. I always know where to find the joints, and those who do not like the inside of the melon can have the outside. Now, my great trouble with fowls is, that one day I have Nebraska chicken and the next trip I have to assassinate a Mormon Shanghai pullet, with high, expressive hip-bones and amalgam paletot. This makes me nervous, because they are so dissimilar, and their joints are in different places. The Mormon hen is round-shouldered, and her collar-bone is more on the hias than the Nebraska fowl. This gives a totally different expression to her features in death, and, as I have said, destroys the symmetry of the carve. I began my education in this line by carving butter in hot weather, and gradually led up to the quail on toast. In carving the quail, first mortgaged your home and get the quail. The quail should be cooked before carving, but not until the chronometer balance and other organs have been removed. Place your quail on the toast in a sitting position; then, passing the dissecting-knife down between the shoulder-blades, bisect the party. Another method is to take the quail by the hind leg, it, asking the guests to do the same. This breeds a feeling of stiffness that is apt to prevail at a formal party.—Boomerang.

SOCIETY.

DEAR —: You ask me to tell you what is going on. That is no easy matter for one who abjures society as frequently as I. San Francisco is growing. One recognizes this fact at the theatre, in the Park, promenade, or cars. The good old times no longer exist when there seemed but one clique, and every one knew every one else at the present gatherings. Society—to use a general term—appears at the present moment in a state of transition; the migratory members of the haut ton who have not chosen to remain away have hardly settled down to the routine of "at home" and the interchange of courtesies and hospitalities. In despair, those seekers of festivity the Carnival has not absorbed console themselves, in the interim, with joining the procession which wends its way Parkward with religious repetition Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, to bear the band play. In this age of monopoly there seems to be hardly a protest existing as to its being the only road, except perhaps it be the one leading to Lone Mountain. Music is always an attractive feature, and I have often wondered why some enterprising capitalist has not conceived of a lucrative investment in the erection of an enclosed garden, protected from the winds of summer and the rains of winter, where society people could resort for promenade and concert. It is a suggestion which the Institute directors might adopt with profit. This would utilize the new pavilion, and effect the beneficial result of bringing people together and combating their cliquish proclivities. San Francisco is young, and society has hardly reached that position in which it can imperatively issue its mandates, and depend upon having its dictates universally obeyed. Its cosmopolitan features render this a matter of time, for what would be considered etiquette in English society would be considered outré in French, or what a Puritanical New Englander would consider the right thing would be considered quite stupid and prudish to a German, whose manners, in turn, would seem either shocking or boorish to his Spanish neighbor. We are a community made up of all the essentials of good society. There are numbered in it men of mind, of letters, brilliant wit and intellect, travelers, statesmen, musicians, artists, and poets. There is required but the governing hand of some ruling spirit to mold it into a social system. Let it be a gossip club—a social feature existing in Paris presided over by Madame Edmond Adam (Juliette Lambert)—or a salon of sparkling wit and repartee, such as Madame Récamier's. Let it be something acknowledged and permanent. According to some, the refinement claimed by American society is the gentility which is the result of the acquired wealth of a generation, as Saxe so humorously expresses himself:

"A span across an hundred years
Without a prop to save it from sneers,
Not even a couple of rotten peers,
A thing for laughter, jibes, and jeers,
Is American aristocracy."

Social life in California is most luxuriant in coloring, but tropical in rankness. Sufficient time has hardly elapsed to enable us to fail to recognize our quondam milliner or maid in the exquisitely appareled woman who so languidly reclines in her well-appointed turnout as it rolls by. The impetus given to society by the nouvelle riche is needed to move it from stagnation; for of what use would be her gilded palace, if it were not to give less fortunate outsiders an occasional envious peep at them? What matters it if the architectural conception of her establishment is the effort of some starved genius, or her aesthetically devised frescoes and upholstery a suggestion of Garibaldi or Blum, or her collection of pictures the remunerated result of a poor artist's selection where she herself would be utterly unable to distinguish a Correggio from a Van Dyke, or the glowing coloring of Titian from the rich flesh tints of Rubens? Her library is gorgeous in bindings, with perhaps some works of standard excellence; but she never reads. True, she is a slave to her chef de cuisine; for how could she cater without his autocratic dictates? The origin of her falience and porcelain never occurs to her. Her crystal might have been blown at the San Francisco Glass Works, if there had not been an animated discussion of enormous duties and breakage. To her credit, be it said that her patriotism leads her to the choice of California wines. With an entourage almost beyond her conception, it not appreciation, with hardly more of an effort than to sign the check for the defrayal of expenditure, she, with American adaptability, takes to it most naturally. Yet she has her place in society. True, your musical friend plays for you; your traveled friend entertains you with his adventures; your scholarly friend gives you information; but she invites you to her parties; her cook cooks for you; her waiters attend you; what of beauty and art her money could buy is at your disposition to admire and enjoy. You meet Mrs. So-and-so there, and to have an entrée is quite the thing. She has hardly arrived at that stage which affects exclusiveness; her position is hardly enough assured; and so goes the world, not only in California, but everywhere.

Apocryphal to our nouveau riches, a most amusing instance was related a short time since of one of our million-bearers who, by enormous expenditures, was dazzling the Parisians with her unique entertainments. A certain count being asked if he were acquainted with her, said: "I attend her parties and dine there, but I do not know her." In one thing society seems to be gaining ground upon our European and Eastern rivals. The feminine article is becoming more numerous and less sought after. To analyze this condition of affairs, and discuss the whys and wherefores, would be a lengthy affair, and prove a wasteful and futile experiment. Consoling the fun-loving girls in their not promising society outlook, let me add a word in encouraging hints as to future festivities. Proposed charity tableaux will take place about Christmas time, under the management of Colonel Olarovsky, the Russian consul. There are on the tapis a series of musicales at the Grand Hotel under the auspices of Mrs. S. F. Thorne, assisted by Madame Berton and Professor Ferrar; also a series of commerce parties at the same place. The doors of the Nob Hill mansions are not likely to remain closed on royalty, who will again return to us, homeward-bound, the last of the month. The Crockers are in Paris, likely to return soon. Mrs. Mark Hopkins and her niece, Miss May Crittenden, who have been stopping at the Windsor, New York, will be back this month. The regular monthly receptions of Madame Zeitska are to be resumed, and those fortunate enough to have been recipients of Mrs. General McDowell's hospitality will be glad to hear she will receive every Thursday. It is reported the McAllisters will remain in San Rafael this winter; if so, it will be with regret to those who have enjoyed their Sunday evening teas. Lady Duffus and Miss Iza Hardy, whom we were pleased to entertain some time since, returned from Europe by the City of Rome and are guests of Mrs. Frank Leslie, who has moved to her aesthetic mansion, No. 13 West Fifteenth Street, New York; no doubt a salon is in prospect of inauguration for the winter.

After all my theorizing and rambling from my subject—and women are prone to ramble—I don't know as you are wiser than you were before as to the movements of the creme de la creme, or what the decided prospects are as to the coming season. With the advent of a few notable, the generous effort of the entertaining portion of the community, which, by the way, is little more than a handful, we hope for livelier times and a prospect of future gayeties. SAN FRANCISCO, November 3, 1882.

Notes and Gossip.

Mrs. Mark Hopkins and her niece, Miss May Crittenden, who have been spending the summer at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, returned home on Wednesday last. Miss Allie Hawes and Miss Tolson, who came down from the Navy Yard last week to attend Mrs. Julius Reis's reception, returned to Mare Island on Saturday, the twenty-eighth ultimo. Mr. and Mrs. H. P. Stanwood, who have been enjoying the delights of a New England autumn, returned to the Palace on Wednesday last. E. W. Hopkins, treasurer of the Central Pacific Railroad, who has been visiting his father in Michigan, accompanied by his wife and daughter, returned to the city during the week. Captain Oliver Eldridge, who has been in the East for a few weeks past, returned on Tuesday last. Kenyon Cox, a famous New York broker, is sight-seeing in this city. Lieutenant-Commander Benjamin L. Edes, Passed Assistant-Paymaster Reah Frazer, and Chaplain J. S. Wallace, of the navy, were at the Occidental on Saturday and Sunday last. A telegram from Sir Thomas and Lady Hesketh announce their safe and pleasant arrival home. Colonel William H. Lent and family arrived in New York on Wednesday last, where they will remain until next summer. Mrs. J. H. Jewett has returned to Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. W.

B. Bourne have returned from Napa County for the winter. Miss Platt, who is a favorite with every one who knows her—and well may be, for she is a very agreeable young lady—is to be made the recipient of two or three parties before her departure for her new home in the East, the first of which will be given by Mrs. James Robinson, at the Palace Hotel, at which place Mrs. Robinson has taken up her residence for the winter. Captain Royal T. Frank and Captain Alanson M. Randol, of the First Artillery, who have been visiting in Sonoma County, have returned. Lieutenant John M. K. Davis, of the First Artillery, has also returned from his trip in Sonoma County. Passed-Assistant Paymaster H. Trumbull Standiford, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Tuesday last. W. E. Brown is at the St. James, New York. Mr. and Mrs. James E. Mills, whose brilliant wedding in Sacramento some weeks since has been duly chronicled, returned to that city from their bridal tour a few days ago. Miss Lizzie Crocker, who has been visiting in Sacramento, has returned. Mr. and Mrs. Robert Graves, who lately sold their handsome residence on Van Ness Avenue to Mr. and Mrs. George Hearst, have taken up their permanent residence at the Palace. Mrs. E. B. Crocker and her daughter, Miss Amy Crocker, of Sacramento, have concluded to spend the winter in San Francisco, and have taken apartments at the Palace. Colonel Harney and family, of Menlo, came up to the city for the winter on Monday last. Albert Gallatin, who was married in New York lately, will return to Sacramento some time about the middle of December. T. S. Collins, U. S. Signal Service, has been assigned to duty in Los Angeles. Mrs. G. W. Grayson and the Misses Grayson, who have been spending some time in the East, returned home to Oakland on Tuesday last. Mrs. I. L. Regua, of Piedmont, has been at Monterey during the present week; also, Mrs. F. L. Chester, and Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Whitaker, of Virginia City. Colonel and Mrs. Mendenhall returned to this city on Monday last. Paymaster C. A. McDaniel, U. S. N., has been at the Palace during the greater part of the week. Mr. A. W. Bishop and Miss A. Stevenson, of Oakland, have been spending the week at Monterey; also, Dr. J. S. Adams and wife and two daughters, of Oakland, and Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Stevens, of Napa. Reverend C. T. Mills, of Mills Seminary, who has been visiting Southern California, returned on Tuesday last. Mrs. Volney Spaulding, who has been visiting Monterey, returned on Monday last. Mr. W. B. Chapman has also returned from Monterey. Mrs. Savage, of Oakland, has returned from the East. Assistant-Engineer Robert I. Reid, Midshipman John Gibson, Commander Frederick Pearson, and Captain Charles S. Norton, U. S. N., were here a day or two during the week, at the Baldwin. Governor Stanford and family went to Vina, Tehama County, on Sunday last, in their new car on special train, and returned yesterday. Eugene Dewey has arrived in New York, and is at the Windsor Hotel, at which place Mrs. Squire P. Dewey will spend the winter. Major Charles H. Whipple, U. S. A., and family leave this city on Tuesday next for St. Paul, where he goes to relieve Major Henry B. Reese, paymaster U. S. A. The San Francisco Yacht Club celebrated their closing day with a dancing party on Saturday afternoon last, and among the ladies present there were Mrs. and Miss Staples, the Misses Bunker, Miss Nellie Hopps, Mrs. and Miss Mathewson, Miss Hanlon, Miss Mahn, Miss Rich, and a few others. Mrs. L. T. Breckinridge and her three children returned from Monterey for the winter on Monday last. Captain W. L. Foulk, U. S. A., at present commandant at Fort Yuma, is visiting in Los Angeles. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, Miss Hattie Crocker, and William Crocker left Queenstown for New York on Tuesday last. Mrs. Albert Sidney Johnston and Miss Johnston, who have been visiting in Los Angeles, returned on Thursday last. Major R. P. Hammond, who has been recreating and recuperating in Sonoma County for two or three weeks, returned to the Hotel del Monte on Monday last. The many friends of Mr. and Mrs. T. H. Goodman will be pained to learn that Mrs. Goodman has been seriously ill at the Riggs House, Washington. Bret Harte and Clarence King were entertained at dinner in London lately by James R. Osgood, of Boston. Lieutenant Wood, of the Marine Corps, who was married to Miss Kate Thorn, in Washington, on the eighteenth ultimo, has left that city for his post at Mare Island, with his bride, whose mother is a niece of W. W. Corcoran, the Washington millionaire and philanthropist. Captain and Mrs. Nicholas T. Smith, who have been summering at Menlo, will soon return for the winter, and go to housekeeping at the corner of Octavia and Jackson streets.

CORRESPONDENCE.

An Attributable Critic on the Carnival.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: I have grown somewhat weary of the fulsome panegyrics which are being lavished upon the "Feet of Nations" by all the papers—including your own. It seems to me that a little wholesome truth would do no harm. What is this "Carnival"? It is the apotheosis of everything that is vulgar, of everything that is inartistic. A lot of young girls and old women, painted and raddled like haridans, are assembled in the pavilion night after night, engaged in an exhibition which is a gigantic, a colossal bore. You may say that no one is obliged to go. True. But we are obliged to have it thrust under our noses every morning with the news of the day, and we are obliged to have it dinned into our ears continually by the "participants" and their friends. I am ill of the "Carnival."

Yet it is for charity, and we must say nothing and bear it. Oh, charity, charity, what sins are committed in thy name! Sins against good taste, against the canons of art, against numberless dead and gone great men who would turn over in their graves were they to see the awful parodies of their immortal works. As for the living authors, let us mercifully hope that they will never know.

What can any one see in these crude, amateurish, inartistic pseudo "tableaux"? True, there are some pretty girls—not too many, by the way—but oh, those awful old women! And where were those lank and skinny youths, with spindle-shanks and knock-knees, procured from? The sight of an immature stripling clad in the garb of a Roman or Grecian warrior, his awful get-up crowned by a round, simpering, foolish face, bowing and bobbing to those among the spectators who have the misfortune to know him, is not one calculated to recall the god-sired soldiers of the Trojan war, or to make one think that "there were heroes before Agamemnon." The spectacle would be droll if it were not melancholy.

But if the vealy youths are unpleasant to look upon, what shall we say of the old duffers? To regard these venerable idiots capering around in their absurd finery is a sight to make angels weep. Yet if those who participate are unwise, what shall we say to those who allow their daughters to do so? I am not squeamish, but I have a daughter whom I most certainly would not allow to take part in this "Carnival." There is too much carnival about it to suit me. I confess I can not see why the fact that a number of benevolent ladies want to do benevolent things should warrant young girls in parading themselves before a grinning mob, partly composed of salacious and dangerous old bucks, and partly of equally salacious but not so dangerous young ones. I do not see why it warrants these young girls in displaying to the gaze of crowds portions of their anatomy which they had much better reserve for the contemplation of their future husbands. But perhaps I am an old fool, and do not know what I am talking about. I suppose the charitable ladies would say so, with a sweet logic of womankind.

I will say nothing of the danger of respectable young girls associating with improper characters of their own sex. The danger does not so much lie there. Miss Doubtful is generally on her good behavior when she happens to be with Miss Doubtless. But the young men who frequent the Carnival are not like Bayard. I do not mean the young men participating—they probably are. I took a walk around behind the booths one night, when the grand march was in progress. I know I had no business there, and that I am a prying old busybody. However, I was there, all the same. I noticed a number of young women who had apparently not been able to get ready in time. They were most of them in company with young men, and one couple I noticed particularly. The young man I know. He is a youth as to whose intentions I have every confidence—they are strictly dishonorable.

There are many things which might be touched upon, did space permit. Mention might be made of the elaborate hugging rehearsals of certain "intense" tableaux. The dressing-rooms, too, in some of the booths, are not so well separated as they might be. Visions of imperfectly attired goddesses and things present themselves to the view of the participants of the other sex. This might, by old-fashioned cur-mudgeons like myself, be supposed to rub the bloom off modesty. But then it is for charity, so I suppose it is all right.

There has been some comment upon the action of a certain Mr. Vulcan in refusing to allow Mrs. V. to exhibit her charms this year as in a former Carnival. I think Mr. Vulcan a very sensible man, and he will hereby accept the earnest appreciation of "Hawaiian Horrors"—A Personal Card.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: An article appeared in an issue of the San Francisco Chronicle about the middle of September, entitled "Hawaiian Horrors," which I should like to answer. The article is one of a great number manufactured by the Chronicle during the past year, with just enough truth mixed in with the tissue of falsehood and exaggeration to make them seem plausible. The Chronicle, in this instance, gets its material from an "escaped sugar-slave," named Andrew Lange, who was "sold" by Mr. Hitchcock, his master, to a few "sympathizing friends," for "fifty dollars, raised by them," on consideration that he (Lange) "would leave the island." I imagine that the services of Mr. Lange must have been very valuable to Mr. Hitchcock, and that he must have been a very peaceable and conscientious "Norwegian parson," as Mr. Hitchcock assented to the cancellation of his contract on payment of less than half of his passage-money! Mr. Lange neglected to tell the Chronicle that the Hawaiian labor laws, translated into Norwegian, were printed on the back of each contract signed by the immigrants before leaving Norway, and that they accepted the terms of this contract, of which they each retained a copy. Those laws punish the master for cruelty, etc., by fine, and the laborer for disobedience, etc., by fine; in both cases "confined in prison until paid." If either is wronged, he has an appeal, and the law is exactly identical for both. The immigrants accepted the contracts with the law in their own language before them, and acknowledged them again before an officer of the Hawaiian Government on arrival; so they can not complain if a few turbulent spirits among them lay themselves liable and are punished. I leave Mr. Hitchcock to defend himself against Mr. Lange's charges of cruelty, as he is too far off to be conferred with. All who know him, however, will attest that he is a humane and honest gentleman. The article refers to me (mis spelling my name) thus: "A Norwegian girl, who accompanied L'Orange from her own country, was sold by him to one Dickie, a planter of Maui, for two hundred dollars. The planter sold her again to a captain of a vessel, who had matrimonial intentions, for one hundred and fifty dollars." Now, it is really too bad that I, an anti-slavery man all my life, three and a half years of which were spent in the Union army, should be accused of slave-trading. I am afraid some of my friends may believe it. The truth is as follows: Captain L'Orange did bring the girl out, but not under contract. She merely ran in debt to him for her passage-money (first-class across the United States). After a few months, by mutual consent of all parties, the girl came to work for me, I advancing to Captain L'Orange the amount remaining unpaid of her passage-money. She served us well, and so endeared herself to us that when, a few months later, Captain Hodson, half-owner and master of the American barkentine Emma Augusta, claimed her for his bride, we were very sorry to part with her. She was more like one of the family than a servant. I made her a present of a part of her debt, and the captain repaid me the balance, (one hundred and fifty dollars,) and sailed away with his charming wife. They have visited us often since, and our relations are very pleasant. They dined with us last week, and were justly indignant to find that we had actually been accused of slave-trading. You can see, by comparing the truth in this matter with the statement of the Chronicle, how they can take a few facts, in themselves perfectly innocent, and manufacture therefrom a "Hawaiian Horror." I am not a sugar planter, and have never had any Norwegian immigrants under contract to me; but have had several of them work for me, by mutual consent of their employers and themselves, and have been well pleased with them. I live next to the quarters of the Norwegian immigrants working under contract for the Haiku Plantation. They are well housed and comfortably cared for. In case of sickness, a doctor is summoned at plantation expense, from a distance of ten miles, and their wants well supplied, in all respects. Most of them have saved sufficient money from their wages to buy horses and cattle, and, when their contracts are out, will be able to start in business for themselves. Owing to the false representations of the Chronicle, and those who have defrauded the planters of their passage-money by running away, a commissioner has been sent out by the Norwegian Government to look into the matter. He finds the immigrants in such a prosperous condition, and so well treated, that he is extremely disgusted at the tissue of falsehoods that sent him this long journey for no use. His report, and that of a wealthy philanthropic gentleman of Norway, whose sympathies were roused by the stories of "Hawaiian Horrors," and who came with the commissioner at his own expense to see for himself, will be interesting.

HAIKU, Maui, Hawaiian Island, October 20, 1882.

The Shooting Clubs.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: The Chronicle of Saturday last contained a most ungenerous attack on the shooting clubs of this State, in which it is charged that gentlemen thus banded together either lease or purchase marsh-lands which they preserve for their own duck-shooting, and that market-hunters and Sunday-sportsmen, who are not members, are all excluded. It is further charged that these preserves diminish the supply of game in the market; that it is against the spirit of the American people; and the writer advises outsiders not to respect the rights of the clubs, but to contest those rights; and winds up with a threat that the Wing-shooting Club propose to take the matter into court, and there investigate the legal status of the clubs on the subject. This investigation is, of course, open to whomever desires to invoke it, but the folly of such course is apparent; and a large number of the members (their president included) of the Wing-shooting Club being active members of the complained-of clubs, raises the presumption that the name of that organization was used without authority. Sportsmen, as a rule, are gentlemen; and it will be difficult to persuade them to go where they have no right to, to trespass where they are not wanted, or to appropriate to themselves the property of other people to which they have no shadow of claim. Even market-hunters, whose only interest in the subject is a financial one, have too keen a sense of honesty to take by stealth what they dare not openly appropriate. When they were in possession of these very marsh-lands (for the use of which they paid nothing) they defended their rights of possession by argument, protest, strategy, and often by force of arms. It will scarcely be supposed that men who have fairly bought those rights, and in many instances from the market-hunters themselves, will tamely submit to be trespassed upon. Each club, I am advised, is provided with sufficient force to repel these attacks, and, if they prove insufficient, San Francisco abounds in material that can be hired for the express purpose of driving off or capturing the bully or duck-thief, in whatever guise he comes. It would therefore be well for these bandits of the marshes to weigh well the consequences of the proposed crusade before undertaking it. It is not true that the supply of game in our market has been diminished by the formation of these clubs; but, on the contrary, it has largely increased, and now sells for about one-half what it brought five years ago, for the simple reason that the real market-hunter leases ground himself, and shoots where there is no conflict of title. He consequently makes larger bags, and the business is still remunerative. The only class that it affects is the pot-hunter, who is seldom an American. La belle France, England, and Canada are the main sources of supply of these bastard sportsmen, who respect neither game laws nor the rights of property. They kill every feathered thing, from a chipmunk to a pelican, and call it sport. This spirit of lawless appropriation may do for Her Majesty's dominions, but will scarcely be tolerated on American soil, where Feunism gets no foothold. We venture the assertion that any gentleman in San Francisco can obtain as many invitations to shoot over club ground as he desires; and any one who is denied this privilege, and is obliged to resort to flagrant trespass for a day's pleasure, with the chances of very rough handling if caught, is no gentleman, and deserves no consideration from that class. They may just as well claim the joint possession of any rich man's house, or intrude themselves at his table. The article, too, shows thorough ignorance on the subject of shooting clubs, for there is no Eastern city without them—and very expensively got up ones at that, with extensive preserves. NIMROD.

LILY LANGTRY'S ARRIVAL.

"Flaneur" Goes Down the Bay to Meet the London Star.

Manager Abbey's Invitation—A Wild Wet Night—How a Gang of Young Englishmen drove Sleep from Weary Eyelids—The Troubles of a Cot—The Salted Beer and Avalanche of Loaves—The Sad-eyed Herald Reporter and his Weird Make-up—The Jersey Lily arrives at Last—How she Looked, Talked, and Dressed.

Mrs. Langtry is the most beautiful woman I have ever met. Thousands of columns have been written about her, and the judgment of hundreds of thousands of men has been in her favor, but I presume that San Francisco, like New York, will not believe half that is said until it can judge for itself. I predict that your judgment will confirm what I say, and that you will pronounce her a thoroughly charming woman in every way. I was the first man presented to the famous English beauty on her arrival, and was in no mood for the reception of good impressions, but I was carried away, nevertheless. I have had many remarkable experiences, but none that equaled those of Sunday night and Monday morning. I propose to write a truthful account of a noted excursion.

I was at dinner in the Brunswick Hotel, Saturday afternoon, when Mr. Abbey, the manager, strolled into the caf   with his hands in his top-coat pockets, and his hat jammed over his eyes. He dropped into a chair at my table, and said:

"There are nearly a hundred men outside waiting for the news."

"What news?"

"The news of the arrival of the steamer Arizona in the lower bay with Mrs. Langtry aboard. They are going down with me to meet her. If you've never been on one of these excursions it would amuse you to go."

"Does it amuse you?"

"Well," muttered the man who brought Bernhardt, Salvini, and Nilsson across the water, "it amused me the first time, but candor forces me to admit that it begins to pall on me now. However, I am always more or less amazed."

"At what?"

"Judge for yourself. Will you go?"

"I don't mind. What time?"

"I think we shall start between three and four o'clock, Monday morning, so as to meet the steamer before she gets up the bay. I'll give you a wrinkle, though, that will save you from getting up at three o'clock A. M.—if it is possible for you to do it. Come down to the foot of West Twenty-second Street to-night about ten o'clock, and go to bed on the steamboat Laura M. Starin. We will have breakfast aboard on our way down the bay."

"Oh, that'll be quite comfortable."

"Will it?" said the moody Mr. Abbey, with a sad and sorrowful smile. "I'm glad you think so. Don't disappoint me."

He imbibed, and walked slowly away. It struck me that he was rather morose in view of a prospective excursion, with a party of good fellows, to meet the celebrated beauty, but I attributed it to his liver, and finished my dinner slowly while speculating on our reception by the woman whose charms had crazed the Prince of Wales and set all England talking. Later I went to hear Th  o sing, and met the music critics of the World and Tribune, who said they were of the party to meet the Jersey Lily, and we agreed to go down to the steamboat together. After they had sent their criticisms down town, we started over toward the North River. The Tribune man then remembered that he had to go down to the office, and left us to go alone. My companion, Kobb  , an old classmate of mine, who succeeded Copleson as dramatic and musical critic of the World, is not of a humorous temperament, and was fully as sleepy as I was; so we resolved to go directly to bed. When we went aboard, the watchman passed us into the after-cabin, where there was a long table covered with bottles and things and surrounded by half a dozen young English actors, now playing at Wallack's and Booth's theatres. They rose cordially and shook hands, and we inverted glasses several times, after which I announced that, as I was rather knocked up from the night before, I proposed to go to bed. This was received with jeers, followed by ominous threats, but I was really so much fatigued that there was nothing else to do; so Kobb   and I looked about and found a quiet nook on the next deck in the after-cabin, directly over the heads of the festive half-dozen actors. We lugged a small cot up stairs from the supply furnished by Mr. Abbey, and placed it well back from the light, got a mattress and some blankets, partially disrobed, and calmly laid us down to sleep. Half a minute later, young Jack Howell, who plays a small part in the "Romany Rye," came up and insisted upon our taking some cigars. He dropped one while we were explaining that we were sleepy, and, while looking for it, I was dimly conscious that he was fooling around the legs of the cot; but he went below and we settled down.

The night was very still, and the gentle motion of the craft was delightfully lazy. The reflection of the street-lamps was thrown gracefully on the water, whence it glanced off and played about our windows, and the low swash of the waters lulled us to sleep. I was dozing gently off, when there was a fendish yell, and an instant later our cot went rushing across the cabin at a furious rate, coming up, with a clattering bang, against the railing around the stairway. Fortunately, we were thrown out before the collision, and escaped death, but we were pretty thoroughly shaken up. A superficial examination revealed, in irrefutable fact, that the ingenious young Howell had tied a rope around the leg of our cot, and when they thought we were asleep the whole crowd seized the other end and perpetrated what they considered an extremely clever joke. I went down stairs    deshabill   to discuss the matter, but the good-hearted and joyful Howell had fled to the boiler-room. After a short argument, I went up-stairs again, and, after repairing the wreck, we once more turned in. Almost immediately, however, a committee of three arrived from below, with a lot of beer-bottles on a tray. I knew the beer had been salted, but said nothing; and when the actors went below, and stood at the foot of the stairs waiting to hear our agonizing cries, we carefully and conscientiously emptied the beer down on their heads. We enjoyed this, but we knew we would have to suffer; so we deserted the cot, and went stealthily forward behind some benches, and waited silently. A few minutes later the dusky forms of the jolly and comforting actors came silently up the stairs in the semi-light, each man armed with two big loaves of bread. Carefully and craftily they placed themselves within range of the cot, and, at the word, let the bread fly. If I was ever thankful, it was that I was not on that cot when the avalanche of bread arrived. The actors jumped forward to view us in our misery, but all they heard was low chuckles of satisfaction, and they went below feeling saddened and unhappy. We followed, and after pledging every man's health, and swearing that we were having a good time, went up-stairs and to bed once more. It took a good deal of courage to calmly lie down, but I was so very sleepy that I could not keep my eyes open. We were dozing off again, when there was a terrific uproar down-stairs, occasioned by the arrival of the police-headquarters' man of the Herald, a contingent of men-about-town, and some more men connected, in one way and another, with theatrical affairs. The hilarity subsided into a running fire of alleged wit, and I once more closed my eyes, when my companion gave me a dig in the ribs, and I saw the classic form of the police reporter of the Herald waltzing, with quiet dignity, around our cot. His high hat was in an extremely reprehensible condition, his coat-tails were pinned over his shoulders, and his trousers rolled up to the knees. He waltzed with transcendent grace, and wore a smile of singular beauty as he moved around the cot. I turned over five times, trying to get asleep, and thrashed around nervously in bed, but the police reporter waltzed placidly on. After half an hour of it, I arose and went out on the hurricane deck to cool my heated brow, while my friend of the World argued with the police reporter; but he never said a word, and waltzed unceasingly. When he had become quite dizzy, he went down stairs to greet twenty or more new arrivals—mostly newspaper men, reporters, correspondents, and critics, who had come down in a party from the walking match.

It was after one A. M., and I had not had a wink of sleep; but before I made another attempt, six robust and vigorous gentlemen came up-stairs, stood over our cot, and sang "Peek-a-boo," "The Lullaby," "Patience," and "Mr. Reilly," with enough force to be heard in Peru. We offered heartfelt thanks, and they went down-stairs. Half an hour later we heard them all coming up-stairs with a silent and ominous tread. Then we gave in. Our courage failed, and we sadly dressed, went below, and joined "the boys." A little incident occurred, after we had been there a few minutes, that caused a smile to play about my features. There was a bell-crowned silk hat placed carefully under one of the seats, and the joyous young actor, Howell, thought it was my hat, and filled it full of Apollinaris water. It was not my hat. It was that of Mr. Howell's manager, and the discovery of that fact went a long way toward restoring harmony, though the personal friendship between Mr. Howell and his manager was not strengthened. Then practical jokes ceased for a moment, until the door opened, and the long and lugubrious face of a notorious man looked in. His hair was dark and long, his eyes quite bloodshot, and his long green coat spotted with mud. He wore a sugar-loaf hat, and smiled in a soft, oily way as he came timidly through the door. The crowd no sooner recognized him as Oscar Wilde than a yell went up that nearly split the ear, and there was a furious rush toward the door where the aesthete stood. He saw the crowd, slammed the door, darted across the gang-plank, and sped up the dock, followed by the yells of the entire delegation. It was unquestionably very rough treatment, and I felt called upon to apologize to Mr. Wilde later for my share in it, as he came there as a guest of Mr. Abbey. I do not know exactly what caused such an outburst on our part, unless it was his extraordinary appearance; for nearly every one there had met him before, and he is no novelty in New York. But he looked so thoroughly broken up and bear-eyed that the effect, in connection with his aesthetic costume, was very odd. He asked the watchman on the dock what was happening on the boat, and the watchman said he was not sure, but he suspected that it was a prize-fight. Mr. Wilde waited in his cab till half past three, when he came aboard with Mr. Abbey, a score or more other gentlemen, and a brass band. The steamboat slipped her moorings and headed down the bay, and we all paced the forward deck and smoked, as the keen wind, fog-laden and misty, swept by.

"Was it quite comfortable?" asked Mr. Abbey, with a deeply significant smile as he noticed my haggard looks.

"Oh, quite," I said: "I enjoyed an excellent night's rest," whereat he shook his head sadly, and said he really hoped it was so.

We all boarded the Arizona between five and six o'clock, and stood in an awfully bungled-up group when Mrs. Langtry tripped forward. I was by her manager's side and he presented me. She smiled charmingly, and offered an exquisitely formed hand, and we chatted for ten minutes about her trip across the water. Then the herd of reporters pressed around. What she said to them, and what they said to her has already been telegraphed all over the country. Her manners, as every reasonable man may suppose, are those of a perfectly bred English lady, and she is cordial and pleasant. I was struck particularly by her complexion. No wonder it is famous, and Millais deserves little credit for calling her the "Lily." The first thing that strikes a stranger is her resemblance to that beautiful flower, and there is no other simile but that. I repeat that her success in America is assured.

NEW YORK, October 26, 1882.

FLANEUR.

Several public-spirited citizens and enthusiastic musicians of this community have made vigorous efforts to promote an enterprise which would give San Francisco an annual series of classical concerts, at which the old masters should be interpreted and the modern composers have their latest works represented. The Philharmonic Society succeeded admirably in their plans last year. One of the principal features was the extremely low price of the subscription tickets. This year the society is making great efforts to accomplish still greater things. On next Friday evening, November 10th, a concert will take place at Platt's Hall. One of the principal attractions will be the rendering of Raff's Concerto, by Mr. Julius Hinrichs, on his violinello. Mr. Henry Heyman has numerous assistants in his praiseworthy and laborious efforts, and he certainly deserves the unreserved support of the public.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Milady now adopts the English style or custom, and calls her maid by her surname. Thus we hear: "Jones, hand me my frizzes;" "Henderson, if anybody calls, say I'm out," and "Tbompson, keep the children away from me to-day."

"Nothing is so exasperating," observes Calino, the French Mrs. Partington, "as to hold a lottery-ticket and find that the next number has drawn a prize. But I've taken my precautions now to prevent that—I always buy the two adjoining numbers as well!"

Old Chief Pocotello, says the Boomerang, now at the Fort Hall agency, in answer to an inquiry relative to the true Christian character of a former Indian agent at that place, gave in very terse language the most accurate description of a hypocrite that was ever given to the public: "Ugh! Too much God and no flour."

The fact that Herbert Spencer subsists almost entirely on dry toast and sardines is hardly likely to stimulate the adoption of this fare by would-be philosophers, who may recall the fact that when Agassiz was asked by a humptious litt  rateur how much of a fish diet would benefit his brain, advised him to begin with two small whales.

General Oglethorpe, the founder of Georgia, used to tell of a missionary who, flattering himself that he had thoroughly imbued an American Indian with the right spirit in which to take the Lord's Supper, said: "Do you not feel a mental comfort, an inward refreshment from that holy cup?" "It is very good," said the promising proselyte, "but," with a smile, "rum's better."

A traveler was leaning at night against a railing at the Harper's Ferry railroad station. A locomotive came along, and he sprang lightly over the rail to escape possible danger. He thought it was a meadow on the other side, but knew his mistake when he struck in a muddy stream forty feet below. On being rescued he was asked his name. "I wouldn't tell you for a thousand dollars," he replied; "describe me simply as a fool."

A Geometrical Angler.—Mr. Wright, says the Whitehall Times, went out to fish. And he became a Wright angler. He thought he would try and catch a shark. And became a try-angler. He laughed to think how smart he was. And he became a cute angler. But he did not see the shark with its nose under the stern of his craft. He was such an obtuse angler. Until the creature tipped over his boat. When he became a wrecked-angler.

A wealthy Austin gentleman, whose name we suppress on account of his family, and who has got a frisky wife, observed that his hired man had bought an entirely new suit of clothes and had his beard dyed. "What a ridiculous idea that is, for you to be fixing up in that way," said the gentleman. "Well," said the hired man, "you dye your moustache and dress up, too." "I know that, but I do it to please my wife." "Well, that's just what I do it for."—Texas Siftings.

A young lady, says a recent number of the Atlanta Constitution, who is very heavily insured by strangers in the matrimonial insurance companies, on the report of her approaching marriage, went with a friend into a dry goods store last week. She knew that the clerk who was waiting on her had invested a year's savings in a policy on her coming marriage. While examining a piece of silk she said to her friend, in an aside perfectly audible to the clerk: "Since my engagement is definitely broken off, I will have no trousseau to buy. I think I might afford this." When she turned to ask the clerk the price, he had fainted.

A young Maine man, who until recently has resided beneath his father's roof-tree, married a few weeks since and leased apartments in another part of the city. The other evening, after completing his day's work, he left the office, went up street and climbed the hill to his father's house. Entering its familiar precincts he made his toilet, and then presented himself at the table. The family, who had been watching his operations, eyed him with amazement, and at last his mother softly inquired: "My son, have you procured a divorce thus early in your wedded career?" A pale crimson flush suffused the young man's face, which rapidly deepened into cardinal. Then he gasped: "I forgot all about being married." Leaving the table amid a roar of laughter, the young man hurried out and walked hastily home, where his young wife was impatiently awaiting his coming.

It is a mistake to overburden a waiter with orders. A good story is told of what happened at Nantasket last summer, because a waiter had a good memory in the wrong place. It seems three swells went down to, dine by the sea one afternoon, and ordered an elaborate dinner of numerous courses, beginning with Little Necks and ending with coffee. The waiter disappeared, his eyes rolling frantically, and the trio sat back and chatted as only hungry men with the prospect of champagne and food can sit and chat while waiting. Ten, fifteen, twenty minutes passed, and conversation flagged; the peculiarities of the crowds on the beach below, the gossip of the town, the last quotations from Wall Street, the dizzy heights of a new joke, had all been touched upon—still the waiter came not. Half an hour, thirty-five minutes—no waiter, no Little Necks. Then patience ceased to be a virtue, the soft salt air began to take a lurid hue, and bells began to ring, followed by indignant calls for "that d—elicious boy." Finally, after nearly an hour's delay, these three bowling swells saw, to their dismay, the waiter approaching loaded down with the entire dinner! Soup, fish, game, fruit, and coffee were all before them. Not an item had been forgotten except the champagne. Words failed these impatient young men; but words were not wanting with the head-waiter when called to arrest this fiend, who had spoiled a dainty repast by serving it en bloc. The dinner was only over again; but the sharp edge was a little worn and maddened appetites.

FROM FRIENDS OVER SEAS.

Our London Letter.

The Poet of Passion and his Daily Life—How Swinburne dispels Despair—His Poetry, his Loves, and his Friends—A Bachelor's Establishment that is the Scene of many an Orgy—Wonderful Powers of Improvisation.

An illustrious celebrity from Great Britain is about to visit the United States on a lecturing tour, in the person of Algernon Swinburne, the poet. People who have read his writings, both poetry and prose, and, never having seen him, have formed from the perusal of his works a romantic idea as to his manners and looks, will, I fear, be sadly disappointed. He is, perhaps, one of the plainest looking men in England; in short, he is positively ugly. Harper's Magazine, as an embellishment to an article about him published a few months ago, gave a wood-cut of his photograph. It was his photograph, certainly; but it was one taken twenty years or more ago, and gave about as much idea of the way he looks now as do the old postage-stamps represent the physiognomy of the Queen of to-day. The article in question, however, was about as full of errors as it well could be; so, after all, a portrait a generation old, which claimed to be of recent production, was a fitting illustration of its pages. Now, I happen to have known the poet and his family for years, and can vouch for what I say. Swinburne is of undoubted good family. His father, an admiral in the royal navy, was the son of Sir John Swinburne, a Northumberland baronet, and his mother is a daughter of the Earl of Ashburnham, whose direct ancestor was with Charles I. when he was beheaded, receiving as a mark of gratitude from the deposed monarch for his loyalty to him the blood-stained shirt which he wore at the block, which garment is to-day preserved and kept as an heir-loom by the Ashburnham family. The poet lives in London ostensibly a bachelor's life, but in reality, and in accord with the expressed spirit of his poetry, keeping up more than one establishment devoted as much to Bacchus as to Venus, and where a week-long orgy not infrequently terminates in a fit of delirium tremens of such severity as to necessitate the summoning of his mother from her country-house in Wiltshire. How he holds out is as much a puzzle to his medical men as it is to his friends, for his physique is none of the strongest; yet, like Poe, alcohol being the inspiration of his muse, as the immoral tone of his verses but too plainly shows, total abstinence for him would mean a total cessation of poetic work. It is needless to add that between him and his family there is little mutual intercourse; for, though his name in the literature of his country is a proud one, his writings are in the main forbidden pages for the perusal of the young, and his habits such as to render prolonged association with ladies impossible. He has one brother who resembles him in nothing except intemperance, though his sisters, of whom he has three, would be ornaments in any society. His youngest sister is looked upon as a beauty in the neighborhood in which she lives, and is noted as the possessor of four thousand a year in her own right and a pair of the smallest feet in England.

Lord Houghton is one of Swinburne's most intimate friends, and he frequently gives a dinner party to show the poet to his friends, at which he purposely manages to get Swinburne intoxicated as early as possible, the result being poetic improvisation of the most bewildering character, accompanied by a nervous movement of the hands and arms not unlike St. Vitus's dance. Much of the poet's eccentricity and waywardness are said to be due to the over prudish and straightbladed government of his mother during his earlier years. If so, Pope's idea as to the inclination of the tree being dependent upon the bending of the twig comes rather badly to grief.

The City of the Kremlin.

The Outskirts of Moscow—A Wild Ride in a Drosky through a Russian Thoroughfare—Visit to the Big Bell and Giant Cannon—The Service of the Greek Church—The Aristocratic Guide.

The approach to Moscow, coming from the west, via Warsaw, is not inspiring; in fact, is scarcely interesting. The low and interminable plain, chiefly occupied by a birchen forest, with an occasional opening marked by a peasant's neat log-cabin, (American builders of cabins could learn something in that special line of useful and æsthetic architecture from the Russian,) is not exchanged, as one might wish, for more varied or undulating features of the landscape. You only observe that market-gardens, well filled with wholesome cabbages, carrots, beets, and the like, have taken the place of the forest and peasants' meadow. With these and certain other indications of the proximity of a large city, you hasten to avail yourself of the privilege—here unrestricted by official notifications—to put your head and arms out of the window, and lo! there is Moscow, like another Venice, in the circumambient mist of the morning, which seems almost like a sea, out of which rise the characteristic forms of the gilded domes, airy turrets, fantastic towers, and the blue, green, and gold of lofty summits of churches, convents, palaces, and campaniles.

You realize your dream of the Kremlin—as some months ago of the Alhambra—and fancy a resemblance. But those bulb-shaped domes, which rise in such abundant richness together in and about the ancient fortress, are unique in all the world in their grandeur and magnificence, their brilliance out against the azure sky, their glistening and golden sheen dominating the great city underneath. And this is Moscow, the ancient capital of Russia, the lure that tempted the great Napoleon and his grand army to that disastrous campaign along the line that we have traversed, to advance to a conquest worse than defeat, and then to retreat again over those inhospitable plains amid the perils of the elements more dangerous than the most relentless of human enemies.

Moscow is in her glory this year. She has her grand exposition of all that Russia can produce, and that includes nearly everything, excepting constitutional government. Moreover, the Emperor and Empress have come to see it, and Moscow is gay with bunting and the glare of flags. Landing in the station, the Babel of an unknown world salutes us on every hand. We are fortunate, however, as usual, in having made the acquaintance of a Russian physician, who kindly pilots us to a pair of droskies, and launches us for the hotel. Have you ever ridden in a drosky?—in Moscow, in a crowded street, in a hurry, over the rattling cobbles, and through the shouting—and, I presume, profane—drivers? As a tonic for weak nerves I can not imagine anything more worthy of commendation—i. e., to those who believe in the "beroeic" method of treating that malady. It is likely to kill or cure. And then, just as we were nearing our hotel, and passing the porte of the Chinese wall, we were shot out of it by a fire-cart on the full gallop, charging through, and only missing us by a hair. Ah, well, we are here. Now for a guide. One appears. We engage him. Alas! now our troubles begin; for we are to be under the direction and largely in the power of that once great, but I fear never good, man for several days. He will say "Go," and we shall go; "Stop, and take something," and we shall stop, and shall have to pay for what he takes, which is generally from two to five glasses of cognac. But we might do worse than exchange him; for yesterday another of the seven shining lights which, as valets-de-place, serve to enlighten the minds of strangers patronizing our hotel, while resting and refreshing himself, passed into a state of helpless inebriety. Our count—I omitted to say that he was a count—had this excellence, which he himself did not fail to remark to us, that he took nothing on the sly, as some others did. Very well; so we go with this invaluable cicerone to see the sights of Moscow.

First, of course, to the Kremlin, with its palaces and churches, its big cannon, "The Czar," forty tons of bronze, a big gun centuries ago, and its bigger bell, "Tzar Rolokol," sixty-seven feet in circumference and of two hundred tons weight. What a pity it is broken and dismantled. Were it otherwise it would be worth the visit to hear it alone. Then we inspect the treasures of the Metropolitan, and from seeing forty pounds of real pearls on one sacerdotal vestment, we have some idea of the relative economy of republican and Protestant accessories and aids to faith and devotion. We have paid our respects to several shrines of worship, in some of which we heard the stately and impressive chants of the Greek service intoned by stentorian lungs of priests, and answered by mellow tones of antiphonal choirs, voices of men and boys, and in the convent churches the silvery tones of invisible nuns.

We next inspected the original palace of the Romanoffs—the reigning family of Russia—which we found a nice model in some respects for a Californian bome, and made a note of. We refreshed our minds and wearied our limbs at the Grand Exposition, rode on the electric railway, but did not find it so electrifying as the orthodox drosky; saw the model of Prince Demidoff's beap of gold—some thousands of tons—and sinned equally against our conscience and our self-respect by allowing the count the article requisite to maintain his efficiency and good humor—a moral weakness on our part, which had no shadow of justification except the pitiful one of expediency. So we have been roaming about the old city and mingling among its decayed aristocratic associations, and our poetical sense has approved the chance which has placed us under the protection of this decayed aristocrat.

MOSCOW, October 5, 1882. RICHARD WYLIE.

The Gossip of the Boulevard.

Victor Hugo's Charitable Amusements—How he Entertained Several Hundred Poor Children—A Bloody Duel and its Result—The Dampening Ardor of some Fire-eating Journalists—Three Foiled Challengers.

Victor Hugo is a wonderfully preserved octogenarian. He seems incapable of fatigue. A few weeks ago he went down to Veules-en-Caux, to visit the sea-shore villa of Paul Meurice. One would have thought he would rest for a brief space at least. But not he. His spirit seemed as restless and uncontrolled as in its youthful prime, and he must needs hunt up all the poor children in Veules, and give them a grand banquet. There were several tables set in the public hall, and there Victor Hugo seated himself, with orphans and ragamuffins on every side of him. Not content with that, he gave a reception to a large school of boys; and then again, when passing through the next village, held a public levee for the youth of the community. On every occasion the vicinity was thronged with people eager to see the old man who takes such earnest interest in the education and training of the children of France.

The fatal outcome of the duel of a month ago has had a salutary effect on this terrible practice during the past few weeks. In the beginning of September last, the warfare between D'ichard, of the Petit Caporal, and Massas, of the Combat, (both Bonapartist journals,) had grown to such a height of personal rancor that a sword-fight was deemed necessary to satisfy honor. The forest near Saint-Germain was the chosen ground, and the gendarmerie only reached the appointed spot in time to confiscate the dangerous weapons and separate the bloody-minded scribes. Paul de Cassagnac and M. d'Ornano, being chosen as referees, decided that a second meeting must take place, and therefore the next day found the two in a little private park at Nogent. The fight was furious, and poor Massas, the challenger, sank back dead into the arms of his second, while D'ichard was pierced by three gaping wounds, from which he has recovered. But this has been of good service; for during the past week three challenges have been declined. M. Lévy, of the Monde, was challenged by M. Teste, who has been writing abusive letters in the Gaulois. Lévy's confessor, however, forbade the duel, and Lévy very readily obeyed the mandate of the church, notwithstanding the fact that people are saying that the priest was asked for the occasion. Then, again, Meyer, of the Gaulois, sent a note and two friends to Dreyfus, the Jew banker. The old Hebrew treated them with sublime contempt, and informed them that what Monsieur Meyer or his paper could say of him would be a matter of no moment, in consequence of which Meyer and the Gaulois, metaphorically speaking, beat their heads against the floor in their baffled rage. The third case is that of Maes, of the Bataille, who, with no avail, challenged Marouck, of the Proletaire, who interposed his importance to the working-class cause as a barrier against risking his life. So, you see, all the formerly valiant duelists are becoming "Sir Andrew Aguecheeks." How long the lesson will have its effect, is the question.

LITERARY NOTES.

Two articles in the English magazines of the current month, a translation of De Musset's "Rachel" in Blackwood, and a translation of Charles Monselet's "Tour through my Pockets" in Temple Bar, were published in the Argonaut some years ago.

"A Transplanted Rose," which has been appearing serially in Harper's Bazar, is now issued in an artistic book-form. It is a very cleverly written story of New York society, and, indeed, might well serve as a text-book for Knickerbocker etiquette. The story is that of a young Western girl who is introduced into New York society by a rich aunt. The maiden is a rough diamond at first; but she is gradually polished to a surprising degree of brilliancy, and finishes by winning the hand of an English baronet. The book is one of the most entertaining that has been issued this season. Published by Harper Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.00.

One of the editors having happened to read the foregoing notice, read the book, which is contrary to his usual custom. He never reads—he only writes. He submitted the following paragraph, and readers can take their choice: "A Transplanted Rose" is the latest "novel of New York society." It has enough of society patter and slang to make it come from one of the concentric circles of New York society, if not, perhaps, the inner one. It has a Western girl, who is the "transplanted rose," and who, having come from the West, and had only San Francisco society experience, breaks glasses, upsets decanters, and eats oysters with her knife. This wild Western freedom wins her the heart of the usual English baronet, Sir Sydney Something, despite the machinations of the villain, a coarse, common, and American fellow. The girls who ridicule her in the first half of the book all come to grief in the latter half. The book is spangled with bad taste, bad French, and bad grammar, and will make excellent reading for any San Francisco "society young lady" who wants to know how her congener acts in New York. Published by Harper Brothers; for sale at Bancroft's.

The publication in America of "Spoiling the Egyptians; a Tale of Shame told from the British Blue-books," by J. Seymour Keay, might be deemed rather untimely as coming after the war in Egypt is finished; but the fact of the importance of four successive editions, which it attained in England during the war, was sufficient reason for its appearance here, however tardy that may be. The author endeavors to show through the Blue-books that England, aided by France, persuaded the last Khedive to accept enormous loans, and then, by successive extortions, tried to screw usurious interest from the whole country of Egypt. The book presents a startling array of facts, and arouses the reader's indignation against England. But in a late number of the Contemporary Review, Professor Sheldon Amos, a man of reputation in jurisprudence and one who has long resided in Egypt, asserts that Mr. J. Seymour Keay has been guilty of deliberate deception, and that—not taking into account the fact that the Blue-books are necessarily defective for diplomatic reasons—he has neglected to quote letters and documents of whose existence he could not be ignorant, and which refute the charges made in his book. Published by G. P. Putnam & Co., New York; for sale by booksellers; price, 30 cents.

Mrs. Oliphant has always been an agreeable novel-writer, and her success in other literary work has been nearly as good, if we take into consideration her books on Italian art-history and like studies. "The Literary History of England in the End of the Eighteenth and the Beginning of the Nineteenth Centuries," is apt to have rather the smack of the "pot-boiler" about it; but perusal shows that the author must have given the subject months of care and study to attain the degree of excellence which the three volumes possess. Another surprise is the modern air of all Mrs. Oliphant's writings. One would expect that an author—especially a woman—who dated from the first quarter of the century, and who began to write as far back as the forties, would be tinctured more or less with the prejudices of an earlier period; but, although this exists, it only exists in the case of the Scotch authors, a fact which may be due to the author's Scotch origin. But, throughout the volumes, Mrs. Oliphant evinces that she has kept pace with the progression of the age, and with her ready insight views the literary work of the period she describes with an impartiality unfettered by tradition. Her conception of the "Lake School" is as admirable as her judgment concerning Byron and Shelley is sound. One of the most attractive features of the work is the portion which treats of the English philosophers and their doctrines. Mrs. Oliphant has a graphic style, and her descriptions and artistic climaxes are well wrought, but her management of the language framework is cumbersome and very faulty. Published by Macmillan & Co., London and New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 53.

Announcements: Messrs. J. B. Lippincott & Co. announce "The New Arabian Nights"—not Mr. R. L. Stevenson's last book, which Messrs. Holt will reissue, but a collection of the tales left out of the current version of "The Arabian Nights," translated and edited by W. F. Kirby. They have also in press "The Princess and Curdie," by George McDonald, a sequel to the same author's "The Princess and the Goblin;" and a book by William Leighton, on "The Subjection of Hamlet," in which the question of the insanity of the prince is answered in the affirmative. Mr. Shorthouse, the author of "John Inglesant," has just published a second edition of his paper on "The Platonism of Wordsworth." "The Singular Vote of Aunt Tib-box" is the title of a story which Miss Sally McLean, the author of "Cape Cod Folks," has contributed to the December Harper. It is said to be full of humor. Mr. Henry James has dramatized his story, "Daisy Miller," and it will shortly be published in the Atlantic, under the title of "Daisy Miller; a Comedy." The story has been recast and rewritten, and new characters, situations, and incidents have been introduced. The family of P. J. Proudhon have lately discovered a manuscript of his bearing the title, "Le Cesarisme et l'Histoire;" and they intend to publish it.

The Plymouth Pulpit has been revived as a medium for the publication of Rev. H. W. Beecher's sermons. We have received the first two numbers. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; for sale by the American News Company; price, seven cents, or $2 per year. The latest number of the Franklin Square Library is "A Short History of Ireland," by C. G. Walpole, M. A. For sale by Bancroft; price, 25 cents. Harper's for November contains a fine frontispiece by Hamilton Gibson; the interesting article on "Southern California" is continued; and W. D. Howells is the author of "Pordenone," a rather tame historical poem. The Century for November contains two fine engravings, one of Florence Nightingale, and the other of Victor Hugo, which latter is accompanied by a delightful paper from the pen of Alphonse Daudet; and W. D. Howells gives a charming review of "Henry James Jr., and his works." Macmillan's Magazine for October opens with an interesting article on "Oxford Reminiscences," by the Archbishop of Canterbury; "George Eliot's Children" will attract many readers; "Moltke's Campaign Against the Egyptians" is a curious review of a former war. The November number of the Eclectic contains, among other papers, "Who was Primitive Man?" by Professor Grant Allen; "Rachel," an interesting account of the great actress; "Race and Life on English Soil," by Dr. B. W. Richardson; "Researches in my Pockets," a comedieta translated from the French; "The Salvation Army," by Cardinal Manning; "The Philosophy of a Visiting Card;" "A Night in the Red Sea;" and "The Coming of the Mahdy," which throws much light upon recent movements in the Mohammedan world. The North American Review for November contains "English Views of Free Trade," by the Hon. John Welsh, of Philadelphia; Joseph Neilson, Chief Judge of the Brooklyn City Court, writes of "Disorder in Court-rooms;" Dr. William A. Hammond, ex-Surgeon-General of the United States Army, offers "A Problem for Sociologists;" "Advantages of the Jury System," is by Dwight Foster, formerly a Justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Court. Other articles are "Safety in Theatres," by Steele Mackay, and a symposium on "The Suppression of Vice," by Anthony Comstock, O. B. Frothingham, and Rev. Dr. J. M. Buckley.

VANITY FAIR.

Fashionable society, of course, never laughs—that would be vulgar—but society at Newport has almost “smiled” itself into fits over a sentimental transaction which has just come to light, says the New York World correspondent. During the current season Newport has been visited by a young gentleman of very old family, and who bears a very well-known name. Though not so rich as Astor, he is possessed of large means, but his mental capacity is not perhaps so great as that of Daniel Webster. Some time ago he became much interested in a young lady here, a daughter of one of the “cottagers,” and paid her marked attention. He made her a present also, “Honi soit qui mal y pense,” in the spirit of King Edward III. of England, of a rare and royal pair—of garters! They were so elaborate in design and in workmanship that some ladies who have been fortunate enough to see them describe them as “perfectly lovely.” The fate of this beautiful gift was too good to keep, though the garters were not. The fair damsel told one or two friends about it, all in strict confidence, and they soon, of course, spread the news, until society is convulsed. Not long after he had made this gift, the fickle youth became enamored of another beauty, to whom, after a little, he offered, not a pair of garters, but a noose, and to whom he is now engaged. When this occurred he wanted to get back the garters, but the fair recipient refused to give them up. She vows she will not part with them until he jilts his actual lady-love, when she will send them to her in order that she may make her quietus with them, like the “unfortunate Miss Bailey,” of Halifax, famous in song.

New York is overrun with brides. Mr. and Mrs. Young-husband are thick as thieves in all the fashionable hotels, and it is good as going to the play to see the darlings decked out in all their bridal finery. A millinery opening is a mere nothing compared to the exposition of toilettes at the Windsor table d'hôte, and people who haven't committed matrimony enjoy the sight amazingly.

The India rugs, said a carpet-dealer recently to a New York reporter, run deep and rich in color, mostly in angular and odd mosaic figures, varied now and then by an occasional leaning toward rudimentary arabesque forms. They are soft and thick, and are much used in drawing-rooms. The Persian carpets are not so thick, but are closely woven and very durable. They are stiff and lie flat, not unlike the old Aubusson carpets, and are of heavier texture. In color the Persians are lighter, and are considered by some purchasers more tasteful and elegant than India goods. Persian carpets are thought to be more suitable for libraries and dining-rooms than those from India. The prices for Indian and Persian goods run about the same. The one you have seen, ten feet by fifteen feet, is worth two hundred and fifty dollars. These qualities are of the best; they vary in size from nine by twelve feet to fifteen by twenty-two, and sell at from one hundred to four hundred dollars. The styles most looked for are by no means such as a conservative taste would fully approve. They are made up of daubs or patches of all sorts of colors, seldom contrasting or harmonizing, and broken up into forms of no special significance, and no real beauty or effect. They are highly colored oddities, and often look not unlike the jumbled sweepings of a carpet-fitting room. Those which are most irregular in all respects have the call with some purchasers. Some of them are very odd in shape, yet no matter how askew such rugs may be, people buy them daily without making the slightest objection. The real antique Turkish rugs are rather rare. Some of them are exquisite in make and remarkable for their texture. This one, you observe, though mellowed by age and a little faded, is as soft and fine as silk. It is probably a hundred years old, and has suffered from some of the accidents of age. Here in the centre groundwork a small patch is inserted. There is another over in that corner, and near it you will find a narrow slit, which one of our salesmen declares to be a sword cut. I heard him entertaining a group of horrified customers over it the other day. As for moth-eaten places, you will find a half dozen at least. Yet we find no difficulty in disposing of even so small a rug for twenty-eight or thirty dollars. This beautiful Dagewatow, of three times its size and quite as fine, sells for twenty-three dollars. If it had been moth-eaten or pitched around and patched up it would bring more. Rugs seem to be the style, somehow, especially ragged rugs. A man told me the other day that in some dwellings the operation of moving across a floor was effected by stepping gracefully from one rug to another. Awkward tumbles, he said, were not infrequent. Of one thing there is no doubt: As mere articles of fashion Oriental carpets, not rugs, have gone nearly as far as they can go, and the craze will soon be on the decline. Carpets by the yard will soon be the thing, just as they used to be, and imported goods the exception.

Black stockings come high, but the girls must have them, observes Progress. Gloves are said to be as long as stockings, which is like saying something is as big as a piece of chalk. How long are stockings? Sensational fashion writers say there are stockings as long as a ballet-dancer's tights. It would be a problem to put on gloves as long as that. There is a fresh effort, say these same sensational writers, to have it la mode to wear stockings of different colors, as black for one leg and white for the other. It would not be queer, all things considered, if it had something of success. Women will obey almost any bizarre fashion if it has the right start.

“Society under the third republic,” says Theodore Child, writing from Paris, “is indeed a droll mixture. Take the brilliant crowd that throngs the Avenue des Acacias—the Rotten Row of Paris—and fills the Champs Elysées with its equipages and luxury; what is it composed of? Bookmakers, clever rascals of all kinds, horse-dealers, exotic millionaires, courtesans, and a few honest folk sprinkled thinly here and there, like the plums in what used to be called in economical households ‘Shouting Pudding.’ The ‘tout Paris’ of 1882 is not what it was twenty years ago—the élite of the Parisians who were distinguished by their birth, their talent, or their beauty. As Albert Wolff remarked the other day, there is no longer any line of demarcation between the different fractions of Parisian society. The fusion is complete; and there are perhaps none but the workmen of the faubourgs, the dustmen, and the scavengers, who do not claim to belong to the elegant entity called ‘all Paris.’ Just consider for a moment the mass of material, anecdote, and document the present generation is preparing for posterity! Maxime du Camp will shortly issue the second volume of his ‘Souvenirs.’ The eminent conservative critic, the Comte Armand de Pontmartin, is preparing the second volume of his literary ‘Memoirs.’ Jules Claretie is writing his ‘Memoirs’ day by day; so, too, is Madame Alphonse Daudet, the wife of the celebrated novelist. Claretie and Madame Daudet intend to keep their ‘Memoirs’ for many years before they publish them. It is the weakness of many to compare disparagingly the present with the past, and to profess an exclusive admiration, some for the eighteenth century, some for the epoch of the Renaissance, others for the art of the primitives, others for that of China and Japan. In certain things the praises of the past are doubtless in the right; in the matter of feminine attire I should venture to differ with them. Exquisite, delicate, ingenious, refined, as were the toilettes of the eighteenth century, I venture to think that those of the latter half of the nineteenth century will compare favorably with them. Just now the Parisian dressmakers are beginning to display their winter novelties. You ask what are the latest fashions? There are no latest fashions, and there is just the charm of it. Every woman may dress to her figure, to her complexion, to her taste. In the way of hats and bonnets there is all the variety of the Revolution and of the Directory shapes, together with the modifications of contemporary inventiveness. For simple dresses, demi-toilettes, and ceremonial dresses there is a greater variety of material than the eighteenth century had. The Lyons weavers now turn out plushes, embroidered silks, chiseled velvets, brocades, surahs, mervilleux satins, finer in texture and as artistic in design as the marvels Philippe de la Salle invented a hundred years ago for Marie Antoinette. For more modest dresses we have cloths and woolen stuffs of a suppleness and softness unknown till within the past twenty years. Then, again, to my mind, the wooden paniers always gave a certain hardness to the lines of the eighteenth century toilettes, and rendered impossible that elegance of fold and subtle charm of draping which is the triumph of our Parisian artists. Even the simplest Parisian dresses are draped with a freedom, a style, a sense of decoration, that render their makers worthy of the name of artists.”

The duty of making the interior of the White House pleasing to the eye, at least so far as the “Blue” and “Red” rooms and the entrance corridor are concerned, has fallen to one of the leading architects of New York City, Louis Tiffany. The corridor is to be beautified with stained glass, six hundred pieces of varied and original designs having been chosen for the purpose. The “Green Room,” newly decorated during the Hayes administration, will remain untouched. But certain blue satin furniture, belonging to the same period, will be replaced by something which appeals more directly to popular favor, and a few new carpets are in contemplation.

Stiffness amounting to angularity is the prevailing style both in dresses and bonnets. In the minds of the designers of costumes there must be a deeper intent than to bring women down to a democratic level by making them all as nearly alike as possible. Well-rounded figures being greatly in the minority, the average contour of feminine proportions may be indicated by long, stiff stomachers, kept in place by steel and whalebone; puffed sleeves, to eke out the narrowness of the chest, and paniers to exaggerate the voluminousness of the skirt. But there is doubtless a vague reminiscence of fashions existing some centuries ago to be revived for the edification of nineteenth century belles, and for the especial advantage of their modistes. If heads were removable, to be taken off and replaced at will, as in the case of toy mandarins, which smile as blandly with their heads drooping on their shoulder-blades as on their manly breasts, it would be convenient to find the front of a lady's waist indistinguishable from the back—as is the tendency of the new fashion. But in the natural order of things, there is a prejudice in favor of the more familiar and graceful outlines of the female form. This dim foreshadowing of the portentous future is discernible in one of Worth's recent costumes of black satin brocade, artistically mingled with blacked ribbed silk, and trimmed with black lace. The inner waistband, which proudly bears on its satin surface the name of the great costumer in gilt letters, is invariably suppressed by the New York modiste when the garment to which it belongs passes through the dreadful ordeal of the custom house, for the mark of its origin is wont to inspire the levy of additional duties, and the penalties of greatness cling to it in whatever corner of the globe it shows itself.

There are as many fashions in window curtains as in bonnets and gowns. Milady dresses up the front windows as carefully as she does her children or her new lap-dog.—Louis XIV. style of attire has been adopted for waiters at the Hotel de Paris, Monte Carlo. Black velvet coat and Knickerbockers, white silk stockings, and shoes with silver buckles make up the costume. Praise unbounded awaits the man who will invent a new costume for American waiters.—A fashionable church in New York has dressed its sexton in a new kind of ecclesiastical livery, which ladies pronounce stunning, you know. The sexton's opinion is yet to be heard.—At an alleged “tournament” held at Drayton Hall in England the other day, presided over by Lady Jane Teylour, all went well, we are told, saving a little contemps in the donkey race, when one lady fell from her steed and remained in a vertical position on her head for some moments.—First Class in Natural History: Have you a mops dog? Do you want one? Because you can't have it if you do, as only the imperial family of Russia and Victoria of England are owners of the mops. Where are they to be seen? Queen Olga has been traveling about with a mops this autumn, and every other lap-dog in London and Paris is talking about it.

TWO STRANGE DUELS.

How Seven Furies Fought in an Indian Arena.

Poplar River, Montana, was recently the scene of two exciting Indian contests, which are described in a letter to the New York Sun. The first was a tournament between two “medicine men,” to determine who should have the honor of attending the sick wife of Two Bears, the chief. The mode of fighting was for the two rivals to rush at each other from one hundred-yard distances, and to endeavor by the crash of the meeting to send the opponent to the ground. After each terrific “bump” the “medicine men” would at it again. Finally, one of them went reeling to earth, and stole crestfallen to his lodge, while the victor went with honors to the chief's sick wife. Following this was the fight between the four young daughters of Pole-cat, and a young buck who had assaulted one of their number. The scene is thus described by the correspondent: “The lines are broken and the tribe forms a huge ring, into which the savage who provoked the animosity of the Pole-cat family is summarily thrust. He looks sullen and dogged. He has a hard fight before him, and he knows it, but he is a man of his hands, and he means to wear those girls out if it lies in muscle and prompt and effective work. He may strike them anywhere above the breast, and kill them if a blow in the neck will do it, but bullets and arrows are ready for him if he strikes foul. The girls, on the other hand, must take off his apron. If they accomplish that, he is disgraced to the uttermost moment of his life, driven from his tribe, left to starve on the prairie, and all Indians cautioned against harboring, feeding, or associating with him. The injured woman is allowed to have such squaws as she may select to assist her. But if she chooses too many to effect her purpose it is a disgrace to her, and so she is careful to select only enough to make the battle nearly equal. The Pole-cat girls are the belles of the Yanktonais tribe. If a squaw can be pretty, these girls are beautiful, and by virtue of their attractions and their father's possessions in horses and other satisfactory property, they are the aristocrats of the camp. Perhaps for that reason they ask no help in their present undertaking; and for that reason also, perhaps, their savage sisters giggle and exchange whispers as the four girls step into the ring and approach the waiting buck. All five are in full war paint. Down the hunter's cheeks and along his neck are alternate sepia and green and yellow stripes on a background of brilliant red, while his chest, sides, and back are tricked out with rude pictures of guns, bows, and horses. The girls have smeared their faces with a coating of red, over which lies another of green striped with yellow. Their hair is unfastened at the back, and the front locks are braided with otter fur. Each wears a skirt and leggings, but their blankets are laid aside and their muscular brown arms are displayed. There are no preliminaries. The girls dash at their enemy and attempt to grasp him. If all hands manage to get hold of him, half the battle is accomplished. But he meets them squarely and fairly, planting a cruel blow between the eyes of the girl he had injured, knowing that if she is finished he can compel her to call off the rest. She is the general of the attacking forces and the prime object of his attack. Over she goes like a pin-wheel, but she is up again, her face streaming with blood and her eyes swelling. The elder girl has contrived to secure a waist hold, and locked her hands behind his back. His fists fall upon her upturned face with frightful force, but she keeps her hold. The other two girls are pressing him hard from behind, but his elbows work like battering-rams, and one steps back with her hand pressed tightly to her breast, and a look of agony in her eyes. Now he whirls suddenly, planting ponderous blows upon the face and head of the girl who, on her knees, still clings to his waist with a death-grip. He fairly raises her from the ground as he spins, but her hold never relaxes. His earlier victim again dashes at him, and is rewarded by a crashing stroke on the mouth. She reels, but recovers, and darts again, to receive his fist on her neck with a force that whirls her half a dozen paces off and drops her like a log. Not a word is spoken. The thud of his fists and the heavy breathing of the struggling contestants are the only sounds. The last rally of the prostrate girl has enabled the rear party to catch the buck, and one has twined her arms around his neck, while the other hangs to his right wrist. His left hand is still free, and it fairly twinkles in the air as he batters the maiden at his waist. Her grasp is like iron, but her head reels and sways as his heavy hand falls on it with a noise that reaches the farthest side of the irregular ring. Her eyes are closed, and her breath comes convulsively. Were the fourth girl there to grasp that arm, the fight would soon end. The girl behind is choking him, and he employs new tactics. Grasping the kneeling girl by the throat, he pounds the face of the one behind him with the back of his head. No vanity prompts her to let go. She tightens her grip, and buries her face in the back of his neck. The fourth girl is up, staggering and dazed. Brushing the blood from her eyes, with an angry motion, she approaches him, crouching as she moves. If the blow he has in store for her reaches the mark he will have another chance, for the girl at his waist is growing faint, and he can easily dispose of the other two. She comes at him like a cougar. The blow is delivered full upon her breast, but she grasps his wrist, and writhes up his arm. Now he is beset with danger. The two on his arms and the one at his waist pull him forward; the girl behind, still strangling him, throws her weight on his back. In vain he attempts to straighten. The kneeling girl bends, in her despairing struggle, until her hair hangs on the ground. The other three show the muscles rigid in their arms as they press him down upon their kneeling sister. Suddenly he springs backward with a marvelous effort of strength. The fainting girl at his waist finds her hands torn apart. But that triumph was his defeat. With a crash he comes to the ground, three girls upon him. One plants herself on his face, and the other two kneel on his arms. There is a struggle, and then the youngest rises, with a wild yell, waving the apron in her hand. Her yell is echoed by a low moan, as the mother of the prostrate hunter staggers out of the circle; and by a grunt of satisfaction as Pole-cat recognizes the victory of his girls. Somewhere up the river, that disgraced buck with a bullet in his brain.”

Before the next issue of the Argonaut Mr. Estee will have become, by virtue of his election to the highest office of the State, its "first gentleman," or he will have been retired to a prominent obscurity, from which he will never again be permitted to withdraw himself. If chosen Governor, he will exercise the power of a large influence in the Legislature of the State, and be in position to enjoy the highest of social and political stations. His vetoes may be exercised to determine many of the laws that will pass the Legislature. He may have the authority to decide all questions touching the "better observance" of the Sabbath, and all laws governing the regulation of the liquor traffic. It will be his privilege to suggest, in inaugural and special messages, the policy of the State. He will largely control legislation on the debris question; bis the power to direct the executive branch of government, and, in event of vacancies in judicial or other positions, to fill them. He will control the appointments along our water front, the managers of our public institutions, and our bank and other commissioners. He will, by virtue of his office, be commander-in-chief of our army and lord high admiral of our navy. He will be president of our Board of Regents, and ex-officio a gentleman. He will naturally call into his councils his chosen friends and political associates. General Miller will not be one of them, and no prominent early Republican will be admitted. He will naturally call around him those persons to whom he will owe his elevation to office. Let us fancy the following eminent peers as composing this most respectable Republican court: William, Lord Higgins, First Gentleman in Waiting; Colonel Sir James Gannon, Gentleman Usher of the Black-rod; Richard Chute, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Back-stairs; Honorable Pierre Cornwall, Grand Chamberlain; with the chief of the clan, McClure, as Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal and Dish-washer of the Royal Pots. If Mr. Estee should not be elected Governor, these gentlemen will be relegated to their early employments. What those employments were we are not unkind enough to mention. It is our opinion that Mr. Estee will not be elected Governor, and that he and all the mob of ward politicians, who have crawled forth to daylight in this campaign, will crawl back to their holes and the companionship of their mean associates. The farmers know, and the travelers across our plains have observed, with what seeming friendship the owl, the rattle-snake, and the ground-squirrel burrow together. When the train comes thundering by, the snake is quickest to wriggle in, the ground-squirrel or prairie-dog flies to cover and quickly disappears, while the stupid owl stands hlinking at the sun, either ignorant of danger or conscious that he is not worth the killing. Among these denizens of the lower party depths who crawl to the surface on every political occasion, there is owl, or snake, or ground-dog, it is hard to say. They are difficult to scare and hard to kill, and there is only one way to extirpate them. Destroy one, and another takes his place; shoot Bill Carr, and up comes Bill Higgins; skin Black-and-tan, and some other prairie-dog comes barking up to daylight; get rid of Tom Rodgers and other parasites and lo! Jim Gannon and Dick Chute jump up like jacks-in-the-box. The only way to destroy the prairie-dog family is to inundate the plain. The only way to destroy the machine in San Francisco is to overwhelm it with the tidal wave of defeat. Drown out the whole barking, blinking, biting nest. And in this metaphor of drowning rats, we do not mean the respectable and honorable gentlemen who compose the State ticket and the municipal ticket in San Francisco, nor in the counties throughout the State.

We do not desire to destroy the Republican organization, but to purify it. We would so cleanse, strengthen, and embolden it, that at its next State Convention it will dare to be honest, brave, temperate, and American; that it will dare to announce itself in favor of controlling the liquor traffic and supervising the sale of alcoholic drink in all groceries where provisions are sold, and demanding a high license from reliable persons for selling alcoholic drinks under any conditions. We would have a party have enough to keep the Sabbath-day in a respectable manner, and resolute enough to compel all German, Irish, or American liquor-dealers to close their saloons on Sunday, unless they are in sufficient strength to enact a law against all Sunday observance, and throw this day, as all others, open to unrestricted labor. A party is needed that is brave enough in all matters of railroad control, taxation, fares, freights, and management; in all matters of mining regulation, irrigation of lands, appropriation of waters; to declare the right under general laws—the absolute right—without fear of railroad or mining corporations, without demagoguery, and without any desire to make a fictitious popularity by bidding to the prejudice, passion, ignorance, or selfishness of the mob. This party should dare to be American, and have the courage to stem this insweeping tide of ignorant and vicious paupers, who are now invading the country. It should put forth its best effort against the incoming of foreign crime and bigotry, and say to the Roman Catholic part of that immigration that civil allegiance to the hierarchy of Rome is treason to the constitution and laws of our country; and that any effort of pope, priest, or layman to interfere with our schools or school moneys is the act that defines the crime of treason. This party of brave and earnest men with honest principles will be, in its main composition, men of American birth, with intelligent and honorable Protestant foreigners in affiliation with it. It will be the party of patriotism, intelligence, and property, entirely independent of any ecclesiastical domination. It will proclaim the right, as in Germany, to disfranchise all individuals in municipal governments who have no taxes to pay and no possessions to protect; as in England, to demand some other and higher qualification than the outward form of humanity. It will be the party in America that will endeavor to give to property and to persons the protection of the law. It will be the party in San Francisco that will endeavor to avoid the history of the city of New York. The politics of that city demonstrates the results that are inevitable under Irish Catholic rule in alliance with the whisky, criminal, and pauper element in all our great cities. Tweed and his associates comprised a band of municipal robbers. With enormous taxation and most extravagant expenditure, they imposed upon the municipal government a debt of one hundred and eighty millions of dollars, with an unascertained and floating debt of thirty millions of dollars additional. When this band was broken up, imprisoned, exiled, and destroyed, Kelly succeeded, and is now almost as firmly intrenched in power as was Tweed. If the machine element in San Francisco, which is composed of the same kind of men, obtains control, we shall be overwhelmed with a burdensome debt that will reduce the value of property and increase the burden of taxation. The defeat of Mr. Estee will demonstrate the strength of the better classes, and work a bealthful reformation that will be felt for years to come.

We have a right to question the sincerity of Mr. Estee's allegiance to the Republican party, as he came late into it and has not been true to it. Not till after the party had achieved success in this State by the election of Governor Stanford, and not till it had gained national dimensions by the nomination of General Fremont, and national success by the election of Abraham Lincoln, was he known as a Republican. Three times since then in State and national elections has he claimed and exercised the privilege of individual judgment in opposition to the party. Of this we do not complain, but we suggest it as a precedent that illustrates the right of individual judgment against the intrigues and tricks of Irish bosses and a party machine, and plead it as a precedent that justifies rebellion against them. No excuse, however, is necessary for an effort at emancipation from Rome, nor is any apology demanded for an insurrection against the Irish. If Mr. Estee is now sincere in his opposition to corporations, he is untrue to his entire past record, both in private and public life, or else in all that part of his life he has been insincere to himself and untrue to his convictions. In his professional career he has acted as the attorney of corporations. In public life he has been their recognized champion and advocate. So pronounced was his friendship for "corporations other than municipal" in the Constitutional Convention, and so zealous was he in their advocacy, that he did not escape the charge he is now so freely making against others, "that he was the secret servant and paid advocate of railroads." When the Sand-lot sent its cooks and scullions, saloon-keepers, a French hair-frizzing barber, a German corset-maker, butchers, draymen, and porters to form an organic law for the people, Mr. Estee had the adroitness to become chairman of the Committee on Corporations, other than municipal, and when this wise body of agrarian Dapiels undertook to take railroads out of politics he had the genius to accommodate himself to both sides of the new issue, and loaned his great mind and brilliant oratory to the achievement of this difficult task. He and his associate demagogues devolved legislative, judicial, and executive functions upon a political commission to regulate and control railroad affairs. It took from the courts the privilege of adjudicating differences between railroad companies and individuals. It imposed upon the commission the duty of regulating fares and freights, and gave to it authority to make, adjudge, and execute all laws governing the subject of transportation by land and water, ship and rail. Of course, this is illegal, and the courts decide that such authority can not be delegated, and that this commission has no right to usurp legislative, judicial, and executive powers. Every intelligent man, from John T. Doyle down to Estee, down through Foote and Sumner to the original protoplasm of the Sand-lot, knows that this railroad commission is an illegal body. The same unwise body of Constitution-makers also provided that a Board of Equalization should be clothed with power to tax railroads. This highest function of political sovereignty was withdrawn from legislative control, withdrawn from judicial investigation or review, withdrawn from the county assessors, where it belonged, and where all other property is valued for taxation, and imposed upon a commission of politicians. Of course, the courts decide that this is not admissible, or in accordance with our system of equal laws; that it is illegal, and therefore powerless to perform the duties assigned to it, and that all its acts in the direction of assessing railroad values are inoperative and void. Thus all this effort to place railroad property and railroad control at the mercy of party highwaymen is made of no effect, and leaves railroads substantially outside of authoritative control. Mr. Estee should have had sense enough and known law enough to foresee the consequences of such provisions in the organic law; and instead of being now engaged in the denunciation of railroads, he should have sense enough to know that in his attempt at riding this hobby he is not deceiving an intelligent people. He must be made to realize by the popular verdict of the ballot-box that insincerity and demagogism do not constitute the highway over which statesmen reach the highest executive honors of the State.

The Prohibition State ticket, with Dr. McDonald at its head, will poll a large vote in the city of San Francisco and throughout the State. The intelligence comes from the interior that in many localities it is received with a genuine enthusiasm. The Prohibition party is full of earnest workers, both men and women, and no exertion will be spared to make its first demonstration at the polls worthy of the cause for which the temperance people have struggled so long and well. It is a matter of regret that any temperance Christian man should not recognize that the opportunity is now afforded him of so casting his vote that it shall demonstrate that he regards this principle of prohibition and regulation as superior to any mere party organization. It is to be regretted, now when those citizens who have not heretofore cooperated in the temperance movement are willing to come in, and as allies unite their forces with the forces of temperance reform, that some factions of the temperance people proper should hold back and be unwilling to lay the foundations of a party promising such beneficent results in the future. However, such is human nature.

In this city the Republican municipal ticket will command very nearly the united strength of the party. The Republican party in this city has passed through a severe struggle with the machine and the Irish bosses, and it has achieved a triumphant victory over them. When the primary election for delegates to the Republican State Convention had accomplished its work, it was found that by fraud, violence, trickery, and deception it had secured three-fourths of the delegates to the State Convention. Honest Republicans had been denied the privilege of voting. They were overruled, and the result was a State ticket with Estee as candidate for Governor, and a platform that satisfied the demagogism of the machine and would give their lobby the pretext of a black-mailing raid upon all corporate property. Flushed with victory, insolent in their triumph, this most vile combination of party adventurers determined to go for the whole business, and when in San Francisco the County Committee, supported by respectable Republican citizens, called "halt" to this army of Dugald Dalgettys, and determined to call a municipal nominating convention independent of the machine, these political free-hooters resolved through the clubs to have a convention of their own. Enough good men were hamboozled into its support to give it the color of respectability, but it was run by Higgins, Gannon, and Richard Chute, Esquire, from the Mint Saloon. There hovered and gathered its huzzards of plunder. Thence issued the orders for its control. It nominated a ticket. It determined to destroy the party unless it could control it. Thanks to the firmness of the other convention, and thanks to the fifty respectable Republican gentlemen who came to the rescue, this alliance between the machine and the Bulletin was outwitted, and a convention resulted which has given a most respectable candidacy. The Estee-Higgins-Bulletin conspiracy was defeated.

In San Francisco there are two machines. At Sacramento the Higgins machine nominated Estee. At San José the Buckley machine did not nominate Hearst. In San Francisco the Buckley machine nominated an entire Democratic municipal ticket. In San Francisco Higgins & Co. did not succeed in getting more than one or two men upon the Republican ticket. The Higgins machine is literally kicked out of the party. It has secured but three members out of forty-five in the new County Committee. The result of this is that the Democratic machine, with its Irish bosses, will work with the Republican machine and its Irish bosses in San Francisco for Estee, while the Republican machine and bosses in San Francisco will work with the Democratic machine for the election of the Democratic municipal ticket. The respective bosses of the two parties care nothing for party success. They demand a Legislature they can sell. They demand a Board of Supervisors they can sell. They demand officials with whom they can divide and whose patronage they can distribute. It is business all the time, and coin. The Democratic municipal ticket is in some respects infamous, and in all particulars contemptible. The convention that nominated it was almost solidly Irish. It was in no sense representative of the wealth, the intelligence, the respectability, or the decency of the Democratic party. It was ruled by Irish bosses. The candidate who stood the best chance of nomination was not the best man. Washington Bartlett was nominated for Mayor to please the Bulletin, which had gone so crazy over the water question that it allowed the Higgins machine to direct and almost to dictate its editorials. The Republican machine inspired its politics. There were Pat. Connolly for Sheriff, O'Grady for Tax-Collector, Bryan for Recorder, Seson for Clerk, Sullivan for Attorney, Roach for Public Administrator, Lowney for Superintendent of Streets; McGuire, Toohey, Clough, and Coffey for Superior Judges; for Senators, nine Roman Catholic Irish; for members of Assembly, Roman Catholic Irish; for School Directors, Roman Catholic Irish; for County Committee, Roman Catholic Irish; Sullivans, McCarthys, Harrigans, Callahans, Keatings, Whaleys, Healys, Doughertys, Kelleys, Flynns, Cronans, O'Connors, and Murpheys are everywhere. The whole ticket, from top to bottom, is Roman Irish. Here and there was some poor, cowardly, contemptible American, German, Jew, or Scandinavian put on the list to take from it the "curse of Rome." It is made up by Irish Democratic bosses in the interest of a class of professional politicians, who make the pursuit of plunder the occupation of their lives. Here and there, upon the Democratic ticket, is a negatively "good" man, a "respectable" citizen, some unknown, quiet, inoffensive, and altogether obscure individual, a seemingly unobjectionable candidate, but one whom the bosses know, whom they have interviewed in their bunko rooms, and with whom they have made terms—such terms as a pawn-broker makes with a panel-thief. The Republican municipal ticket was not made up by bosses, but in defiance of their wishes and in defeat of their programme. There is probably not one candidate on the Republican ticket to whom, in event of his election, the bosses can go and demand a division of salary, a percentage of the pay of deputies, or claim as reward for nominating service the appointments of clerks. There are probably not five on the Democratic ticket with whom direct and specific bargains have not been made.

And yet we hear that the Germans, as a class, and the Jews, as a class, will vote for the Democracy. We do not believe this. There are Germans and Germans; there are Jews and Jews. There are Germans whose religion and patriotism rest in their bowels. There are Jews who descend in direct line from those who cast lots for the raiment of Christ, and have been in the second-hand business ever since. But there are Germans and Jews whom we number among our most intelligent, honorable, and wealthy class; whose every instinct identifies them with good government; who have children to educate and taxes to pay; who have every incentive and every inducement to preserve for this city an economical and respectable administration. We do not believe it is true that as a class the Germans, the Jews, or any other body of our respectable foreign citizens, will identify themselves with party machine bosses, or by their votes contribute to their ascendancy in the management of our political affairs. What reputable gentleman, of any nationality, would have our County Clerk's office again become the vile and hawdy thing it was under boss rule? The present incumbent has cleansed and purified it so that virtuous women are not ashamed to write in it, and Mr. Wilder has reduced expenses sixty thousand dollars per annum. Our appeal is to the respectable of all classes—American and foreign. We do not reach the lower class. We have no influence over it. Vagabonds do not read the Argonaut. We have no compliments to pay to the mob. We seek no favors from it, and stand in no awe of it. We have no influence over any class other than in plain statement of facts. The newspaper press carries with it no influence further than in that its bold and honest enunciation of correct opinions may impress its readers. Every false, partial, passionate misrepresentation of facts, and every misstatement, lessens its influence, till, like all thick-and-thin party journals, it becomes the hollow, mocking echo of a meaningless party cry. The Republican municipal ticket, in all its parts, is composed of fairly representative men. Mayor Blake, Sheriff Sedgwick, Auditor Brickwedel, and Clerk Wilder have been tried, and found both honest and competent. The Board of Education has had no superior in the personal intelligence and respectability of its membership, and its old members should be reelected. The Superior Judges renominated have demonstrated their capacity and fitness for judicial position. The gentlemen in nomination for the Board of Supervisors are each and all of them highly respectable representatives of our best business men and property-owners. They are pledged to an economical government. Their past lives and business standing are a guarantee of honorable conduct in office. In contrast with this Republican ticket, the Democratic municipal Irish boss affair is altogether odorous.

We have the authority of Mr. W. W. Foote for saying that he is owned by the Railroad Company. This confession he made in his speech at Santa Cruz, when he said: "The Central Pacific Railroad Company has bought up all the scrub politicians in the country." The Examiner declares that Mr. Foote is the exponent of Democratic sentiment upon the railroad question. In this speech of the candidate for Railroad Commissioner, he defends himself for having prejudged the question of fares and freights, by denying that it is in any sense a judicial question. Either Mr. Foote has not read the debates of the Constitutional Convention, the writings of Mr. John Doyle, and the current literature of the last five years upon this question, or he is not as honest as a man of his intelligence ought to be. If Mr. Foote can find no reason why fares from San Francisco to Los Angeles, competing points, should be out of proportion to fares from San Francisco to Merced, a non-competitive point, then he lacks the first qualification of legislator or judge—viz., common sense. If he can not understand why grain should be transported at less cost from Red Bluff to San Francisco, along navigable streams and natural highways, than from Sumner, a like distance in the interior where competition does not exist, he is eminently deficient in practical brains, and, because of that deficiency, he must not presume that the farmers of the respective localities are equally stupid. When Mr. Foote, with the two W's, asserts that the General Government gave the railroads twenty-seven millions of dollars, he is guilty of a misstatement so palpably untrue, that he must rely upon the generosity of his audience that they do not characterize it by using that strong Saxon sword of speech spelled with three letters, and usually accompanied by a profane expression. When he treats a concession of lands as a "free gift" and "without consideration," the statement would be regarded in diplomatic circles as "inexact." When he refers to Mussel Slough as the place "where our citizens were shot down," he is guilty of the crimes designated in the learning of his profession as suppressio veri and suggestio falsi. When he declares that "in bonds and lands one hundred millions of dollars have been diverted from the people's hands into the pockets of the monopolists," he piles the Pelion of misstatement upon the Ossa of misrepresentation. If Mr. Foote believes the statement as broadly as he has stated it—viz., "that railroads have been a curse instead of a blessing"—it will be generous to admit that he is a bigger fool than he looks. Whether anybody who owns a kiln at Colton refuses to sell lime for San Diego, we do not know; but if there is a "marble mountain" anywhere in the vicinity of a railroad which runs to the harbor of San Diego, we will venture the suggestion that there are some little hills in the neighborhood where lime enough can be found to supply the wants of that rising metropolis. If Mr. W. W. Foote is endeavoring to stir up the people of this State to the same resentments that existed in Iowa, where men burned railroad depots and pulled up tracks, he is like Shakespeare's character who hung half way down the cliff, gathering samphire—engaged in a devilish bad business. It is to be wondered whether this mild-mannered adviser of conflagration and spoliation has ever contemplated the result of railroad destruction in California. Has it occurred to him that, when rails are pulled up, the engines will be run into the roundhouse, fires banked, and the company stop business till the rails are relaid; that in the meantime traffic will be suspended; that San Francisco would run out of food in ten days; that he could not walk from his home in Oakland to his office in San Francisco; that all the industries of town and country are thrown into chaos and confusion; that passengers are arrested from travel; that merchandise and farm products could not be exchanged? Has it occurred to this fluent horn-blower of the hand-wagon which precedes the political circus that popular indignation might rise and scalp the political mountebanks who preach this doctrine of rapine? Perhaps Mr. W. W. Foote will permit us to refer to the history of railroads in Iowa, and ask him to draw a moral therefrom. There was a time in that State, when a set of ignorant demagogues succeeded in so arousing the jealous passions and so stirring the hatred of ignorant men, that they became inimical to railroads, and railroad builders, and railroad enterprise. That time passed as railroads demonstrated their usefulness. When Iowa lands increased in value, and the population in numbers; when wealth grew up around them, and the State was transfigured from an unoccupied wilderness till it became the very heart of abundance and the home of plenty—then the people saw their mistake, and drove the W. W. Footes into obscurity, silence, and contempt. Iowa has no quarrel to-day with railroad corporations. It is crossed, and paralleled, and gridironed with rails in every direction. It is one of the most prosperous of all our prosperous States. It will be so in California. This anti-monopoly, anti-railroad cry is the despairing wail of political idiots, and W. W. Foote is one of the last of the banshees whose shriek will be heard in the State.

The following is the correspondence extraordinary which passed between the alarmed Republican State Central Committee and Judge Brunson of Los Angeles, candidate for Judge of the Supreme Court on the Prohibition ticket:

[TELEGRAM.]

SAN FRANCISCO, October 31, 1882.

HON. ANSON BRUNSON, Los Angeles, Cal.: If favorable to your views, would like public repudiation of candidacy on Prohibition ticket; confident your better judgment will approve this course.

[Signed]

JAMES R. FINLAYSEN, Secretary.

[REPLY.]

LOS ANGELES, Cal., November 1, 1882.

JAMES R. FINLAYSEN, Esq., Secty R. S. C. C., San Francisco, Cal. DEAR SIR: Your telegram of yesterday is before me. In reply, permit me to say that I was never consulted with reference to my candidacy, nor have I yet been officially notified of my nomination by the Prohibitionists. I fully appreciate the high honor of a personal endorsement by so respectable a body of my fellow-citizens. I heartily sympathize with them in all their noble purposes in behalf of tempted and fallen humanity. I would rather be an obscure citizen in a Christian land than an autocrat of a kingdom without a Sabbath. But I am now, and for more than twenty-five years last past have been, a Republican. I have not yet lost faith in the party, nor in the masses who compose it. I am not now, nor have I been, a candidate for any office since I, in common with my part of the State, was forgotten in the house of our friends; nor is my zeal for the triumph of Republican principles in the least abated because I have to battle as a private and not as a commissioned officer. Respectfully yours, [Signed] A. BRUNSON.

The League of Freedom will put forth a secret ticket on the morning of election. It will be distributed covertly to all its members. Thus the rum-seller, by his acts, declares his defiance of the law, and his intention to rule parties in the interest of his infamous traffic. We concede to these foreign conspirators a first success. Let them enjoy it; for, as sure as God reigns, they will be in the end defeated and humiliated. The lesson must be taught in this republic that rum-selling Germans and Irish can not set laws at defiance with impunity.

We are informed, upon the authority of a Yosemite Commissioner, that the Reverend M. C. Briggs, of the Methodist Church, voted for and advocated the issuance of a license to keep a saloon for the sale of intoxicating and alcoholic drinks in the Valley of the Yosemite. The proposition was voted down, and rum is now sold in the valley by only one hotel-keeper. If this is true—as we believe it is—our very good and reverend brother had better secure a "proxy" when he presents himself to our other friend, Saint Peter, to demand his harp and stool.

Frederick MacCrellish, long time proprietor and editor of the Alta California, long time resident of this city, and for more than a quarter of a century prominent among the prominent men of San Francisco, died at his residence, after a painful and lingering illness, on Tuesday last. His was a gentle, generous, kindly nature, oftentimes tried, oftentimes imposed upon, yet few have so long filled the peculiarly difficult position occupied by him in journalism against whose personal qualities so little that is unkind can be truthfully said.

Judge Henry L. Joachimsen has been for many years officiating as Justice of the Peace. He has performed his duties with ability, industry, and unquestioned judicial integrity. He is renominated for the same position by the Republicans. We sincerely hope he may be reelected. Judge is an old resident of San Francisco, and is jeered by all who know him.

COUSINS: A CONFESSION.

By Philip Shirley.

SCENE—A luxuriously furnished library. MRS. FLETCHER seated before the fire. A servant enters and announces MR. KINGSLEY, who presently appears.

Mrs. Fletcher.—Come in, John. It was very nice of you to think to come to-night.

Kingsley.—Didn't I say I would?

Mrs. F.—Oh, yes; but I had not the least idea that you meant it, or would remember it if you did.

Kings.—Where's Zachary? I love to call him so—to show that I can. My cousin-in-law!

Mrs. F.—You like to call him so because you are a provoking tease. Some one came for him early in the evening, and they went out together. How did you survive the ball?

Kings.—Judge how well, when I tell you that I went home and wrote those verses for you.

Mrs. F.—"When he performs astronomers foretell it; the sun borrows of the moon when Diomed keeps his word."

Kings.—Do you say so? Have you not learned yet that your lightest wish is law to your abjectly devoted family? Have you forgotten that you made the rich match, that we have only to say to an indifferent world, "my cousin, my daughter, my sister"—as the case may be—"Mrs. Zach. Fletcher," to reduce it to a quaking mass of obsequiousness?

Mrs. F.—You are pleased to be wonderfully satirical; I am at a loss to understand why.

Kings.—Shall I read you the verses?

Mrs. F.—Do. What are they about?

Kings.—A woman I saw at the ball.

Mrs. F.—How characteristically tactless of you to make, for me, verses on a woman you saw at the ball!

Kings.—Listen: [He reads.]

I saw your dark-bright face last night,
Brave in its "pride of place" again,
And yet to me 'twas worn and white,
And drawn with pain.

What tragic shade is cast across
Your love-illuminated way?
For in your look I read of loss,
Of joy astray.

Like a trapped panther I could see
Your baffled soul impatient rise,
And, unsubdued, look out at me
From your dark eyes.

I thought—and may it be forgiven!—
Seeking the cause of that fine rage,
A tamer soul had foregone heaven
For such a cage.

Meaning that she is so excessively good-looking, that her beauty should make her willing to absent herself a while from felicity to be enjoyed only by a disembodied spirit. See? Good idea admirably expressed, isn't it? Praise me, please.

Mrs. F.—Thank you very much. I think the verses are pretty. Let me take them. [She has grown white, and her hand trembles as she holds the paper. She reads her own initials, "M. K. F.," above the verses, and throws them into the fire.]

Kings. [aside].—I wondered if I should touch the sensitive chord. You look ill, Mary—shall I call some one?

Mrs. F.—If you call any one I will never forgive you. Do I look sad? Did I look dowdy at the ball?

Kings.—If dowdy means a look of suffering desperately controlled.

Mrs. F.—I tell you it's impossible. I was radiantly happy. I am now; I always mean to be. Why do you look at me so? What have you heard?—what do you know?

Kings.—Fairly trapped, my queen! What will you give me for this? [He shows her a sealed envelope on which her name is written. She becomes agitated. He throws the envelope contemptuously into her lap.]

Mrs. F. [in a whisper].—Open it. Read it.

Kings. [reading].—"Ave imperatrix, moriturus te salutat."

Mrs. F.—Is that all?

Kings.—Every word; see for yourself. About a month ago I had a long talk with Grafton, and he gave me that letter, which he said I was to give you when he was gone out of the world; he smiled, and said I should not need to wait long to deliver it. Well as I knew him, I could not help thinking for a moment that he meant to take his own life, but he told me that he had been examined by a physician, who warned him that unless he had immediate and prolonged rest he could not live two months. He said there was another payment due for his brother's forgery, and when that was made he would rest as long as they liked. "It will be in my grave, though," he said. "I believe the doctor's right. Something's wrong here about my heart. It flutters and troubles me."

Mrs. F.—Poor heart! O God, I loved that man! If you guessed it before, triumph in hearing me confess it now.

Kings. [kneeling by her side].—Hush, Mary; control yourself. It is all over now, and he is at peace at last.

Mrs. F.—Do you know about his brother's forgery? Tell me what you know. Mr. Fletcher was against him and how could I defend him? But I always believed in him; I know he was loyal and honorable.

Kings.—Grafton had an elder brother named Edward, a rake and something of a sneak, who got his affairs, pecuniary and amatory, into such bad shape that he levanted one fine day, greatly to the relief of his family, and was not heard of for years. Our Grafton, Hilary, went through West Point and in time was ordered out here, and waltzed and walked on the sands with you, and studied, and schemed, and got a reputation for being fitful and cold. One day a tenement house in an obscure part of the city falls in, and the papers overflow with accounts of the heroism of a man, who, with heavy beams across his legs, a cook-stove on his chest, and a stationary wash-tub on his head for all I know, gives directions to the assistants where to find sufferers whose necessity is greater than his, and how to restore to consciousness various women and children, and finally faints from excess of pain. This martyred creature's name is Edward Grafton, the deserving brother of Lieutenant Hilary Grafton of the navy, now stationed here. This was a chance for society, always the defender of the weak against the strong. The stupid women Hilary had ignored, the fops he had supplanted, the mischief-makers and scandal-mongers at large, drew their faces down and wondered why Lieutenant Grafton, the swell, the prosperous, had permitted his angelic brother—they immediately adorned Edward with all the virtues, gratuitously—to remain in the ignominious position of book-keeper in so humble an establishment, for it appeared that Edward was factotum of the collapsed tenement. The next time the story came round it had been settled to everybody's satisfaction that Edward Grafton's unremitting exertions had put his young brother through West Point, and maintained him in luxurious ease in good society for the family credit. Men cut Hilary; he was shunned, and hounded, and traduced. He resigned from the army, and, before he could leave the city, it comes to his knowledge that the great and good Edward had forged his name, and had departed to Central America. Hilary honored the draft, gave all he had, borrowed the rest, and set to work to pay off the debt. You may be glad that you did not see him in those days; he was terribly altered. His was not work—it was slavery; and the hopelessness of his life when the task was accomplished killed him even sooner than the physician's prophecy.

Mrs. F.—I wonder if I could have helped him, if it would have been different or better if— But I am forgetting that it was by his advice that I married. [KINGSLEY regards her curiously. She gets angry, springs from her chair, and walks about the room.] You call me heartless, when you know nothing of the circumstances. You are presumptuous and cruel.

Kings. [laughing].—You are utterly absurd. [She remembers that he has really said nothing, becomes calm, and seats herself again.]

Mrs. F.—Let me tell you about him. If he had lived, I never would have told a living soul; but to-night I long to talk about him and old times to some one who knew him. Don't look as if you were judging me! I have been so wretched.

Kings.—I am far too much in need of charity for my own shortcomings to venture to judge any one, and least of all you.

Mrs. F.—No one knows better than you the home I had when our love for each other was all the wealth we could muster. My refined, sensitive father, without power even to conceive the first principles of the vulgar trickery that constitutes the "smartness" of successful men; my mother, patient and hopeful, striving to console my father in his failures, and to prevent the seamy side of life from warping all my youth to me; my brother, a dear, good boy, and the kindest fellow in the world—that was our family circle.

Kings.—And you?

Mrs. F.—Life seethed in me. From the time I can remember I craved luxury, experience, and power, with a hunger that consumed me. Not with the silly discontent of the commonplace girls who look to their parents and say: "Having brought me here, why do you not make the world endurable to me?"—but with a determination that hardened in my little brain like a steel bar, to conquer, in some fashion, wealth, ease, and endless pleasure for us all. I didn't know then what a woman's weapons at such warfare are. I fancied myself working, and hoarding a salary. My mother kept up her relations with the ball-giving faction for my sake, that I might have my share of dancing, like other girls; and heaven bless her for her courage!—for it is easier for such a woman to walk up to the cannon's mouth than to confront the insolence of purse-proud plutocrats. But I have avenged her. At least, she did not work in vain. I was invited to the jams, and went with my brother. Everybody asked who I was, and, being told, concluded they did not care to know me. I came to the world full of hope, and good faith, and charity, with my small sensitiveness, and enthusiasms, and vanities quivering and expectant, like all young things; and the world twisted a little sneer, a little shrug, a look askance into each poor little sensibility, and jerked it out by the root, and watched the subject writhe, then laughed, and turned away. The subject has grown very callous, but she can count her scars. And yet I think they have not hurt my nature.

Kings.—What have you preserved?

Mrs. F.—Ah, you may sneer; but, indeed, when I examine myself most rigidly, I feel that I pity heartily the vulgarity and limited horizon of my old tormentors; and I know that if I could keep them out of God's holy heaven I would not use the power—I'd help them in. I'd feel pleasure, and not of the mean sort, to nurse them if they were sick—to feed them if they were hungry. But every social pin-prick, every petty humiliation that is in my power to inflict or expose them to, I never spare; I never will spare while I live. Oh, the prestige I have blasted, the invitations I have smiled into slights, the mortifying awkwardnesses I have presided over with a bland word to drive in the sting! What balm those achievements would have been to the girl who stood gazing into the glass at home after a ball, while every heart-beat blinded her eyes with furious tears!—and even her defeat did not change for her the knowledge that she had been at least as kindly treated by nature as those who distanced her in the race; so she learned that the golden calf is the lord of the world. Out of the empyrean of the sons of God—I mean the drove of dancing men at balls—leaned one fine day Lieutenant Hilary Grafton, and I found favor in his sight; and once in a moment of panting excitement, a furious waltz just over, I stood in a strong draught, screening him from any danger of a chill. I confided to him my wild ambition to crush the people who had slighted me, and to rule supreme where I was then unknown. The cold light I grew to know so well flamed up in his eyes, and he told me—I did not know how truly then—that he recognized in me an ally. We became the greatest and most intimate of friends. We called ourselves—it seems too foolish to believe it to-day—"brother" and "sister." He wished me to make a rich and powerful marriage. I wished his Washington combinations to prosper. Meantime, all our every-day interests were in common. He was my all-the-world; but we were always matter-of-fact—rather ironical in our strictures on tenderness. He had a formula—"best and holiest feelings of our nature"—which it was a pleasure to hear him use.

Kings.—I have had that pleasure. His irony was the shield of a big, tender heart, all the same.

Mrs. F.—Didn't I learn that to my cost? The hour came when my husband dawned on my horizon. He was a catch; everybody pursued, and dined, and flattered him. He chose me; it was his whim, his pleasure. To me, who could give him no dinners. Mr. Fletcher threw the matrimonial rope to fish me, wretched, from the unplumbed seas of poverty, and set me—captain's captain—at the helm of his triumphant establishment. I should have fallen at his feet chanting a hymn of thanksgiving, and, instead, I froze, and asked him for time to reflect. He was kind then, as always. He told me he wished me to reflect; that he knew that meant a girl's serious discussion of what was best with my mother; and more about my mother being my nearest friend and guardian angel; but, oh! I saw only Hilary Grafton's great, luminous blue eyes; it was with him I meant to consult. My ambition was fulfilled first. He was not ready to go to Washington yet; but when I thought of telling him, I felt all my ambition oozing out at the palms of my hands; and that the old tame, poverty-stricken existence with him was better than luxury with anybody else. Then I fancied I saw a peculiar smile of his as he divined my weak sentimentality—a smile that always cut me like a whip-lash, and I was strong once more. I told him my tale during one of our walks on the sands that you spoke of. He was very white and quiet. He bowed his head gravely when I finished, and said we never expected my good fortune would come soon. I felt as one does in earthquake weather—as if there were calamity in the air. He was so self-contained, while I could see that his nails were driven into his palms, as they always were when he was mustering his courage or controlling himself; and when I could bear it no longer, I said, in a weak, little voice: "Shall I marry Mr. Fletcher?" He stopped walking, and turned slowly toward me. You may laugh, if you like, and talk about modern dress, but he looked like a god. Jove smiles through the shadow on Io so in Correggio's pictures. His face was perfectly transfigured with exalted passion, approval, triumph; then the light died out of his eyes; he turned away and walked on, and said, quietly: "Of course." I didn't dare to speak. I felt dazzled, as if I had been staring at the sun, and at last he went on: "I am in trouble up to my eyes. You will hear about it soon enough, and I know that you will understand that I am not to blame. You have been a good 'sister' to me. I thank you very much." Then he muttered something about "striking pang from pang as note is struck from note." You know how he was always murmuring poetry; and he said good-bye to me in his usual friendly way, and except for a sort of stirring under his eyes that was a sign of trouble in him, I should hardly have felt what it cost him to decide my future for me; for he knew that I put it in his hands when I asked him that question. As it was, I had the selfish pleasure of knowing that he suffered in letting me go, and was saved the humiliation of thinking that I had made proffer of the province of my wayward will to a prince who cared nothing for the submission. So that is the history of my intimacy with Hilary Grafton. Do you see how I could have acted differently?

Kings. [smiling bitterly].—No; but, by heavens, I don't wonder he died! [There is a long silence, during which KINGSLEY sits with his hand over his eyes, lost in thought. MRS. FLETCHER slowly pulls a deep red carnation apart.]

Mrs. F.—John, sing for me. Sing me Wolfram's song in the hall, in "Tannhäuser." The score lies there on the books, in the circular case. [He gets up without speaking, goes to the piano, and sings.]

Mrs. F.—That means all good and holy things to me. The last two lines remind me of one midnight, when I was leaning over the ship's side, watching the moon set. It was a faultless night, and I was, mercifully, alone. The moon was a great globe of "honey-colored fire," and she was going down among black clouds that looked like a grove of trees. There was a kind of regularity about them that made me think of an orchard; and though I knew perfectly well that we were far from any land, still that was a charmed country to me, the place where I should be happy if I could only reach it—my San-Borondon. It was Hilary's word for an impossible paradise. He said it was the so-called eighth island of the Canary Archipelago—only a cloud-picture, made by conflicting ocean currents; but real to the Portuguese, who insist on its existence, saying that a devil keeps people from landing on it, though it is the most beautiful island in the world. Has Hilary found his, I wonder? [She hears her husband's entrance, though MR. KINGSLEY does not. With the greatest vivacity.] You horrid boy, you never remember anything! I told you I worship the very pans white caramels are made in, and you have forgotten me and my tastes, and— [While KINGSLEY is wondering if she has suddenly lost her mind, ZACH. FLETCHER enters. MRS. F. flies to meet him.]

Zach.—Did I hear something about caramels? How are these? [He produces a blue-and-gold paper box. MRS. F. falls into an ecstasy.]

Mrs. F.—You are altogether angelic. Here, John, have some candy. I forgive you.

Kings. [uneasily].—Thanks. I've been smoking.

Zach.—Now, aren't you going to give me a song before I go to bed? I declare, those fellows have bored me to death this evening.

Mrs. F. [cautiously].—Anything you like.

Zach.—Well, then, sing me "Sweeter than Marmalade." That's what I call a good song—bright, and with a jolly chorus. Go, join in the chorus, Jack. [The cousins' faces lengthen perceptibly. MR. FLETCHER remains impassive. They sing, without enthusiasm, how the lady celebrated is "all jawn" and other pleasing attributes, ad nauseam. MR. FLETCHER applauds to the echo. He comes and lays his hand gently on his wife's shoulder.]

Zach.—Isn't she a good girl, Kingsley, to sing me a song like that, when she only cares for high art wails with her serious friends? Why is high art so grumpy, pet? [She bestows upon him "the lightning of the angelic smile."]

Kings.—I am sorry to be obliged to run away just as you come in, Mr. Fletcher, but I am a slave, and must sleep at night to work by day. Good-night, Mary; good-night, sir.

Mr. and Mrs. Fletcher.—Good-night.

Kings. [to himself on the front steps].—She can not keep the moth and rust of such a wretched life from eating into her soul. Better for her if she were taking in washing and Hilary Grafton's wife, to-day, than— [He walks over the horse-block and falls perfectly prostrate. Exit with maledictions.]

TALES FOR THE TODDLERS.

By Joseph Medill, the Chicago Tribune Humorist.

Little Lucy's big brother Charles promised to buy her some ice cream every Saturday if she would keep her hair nicely brushed during the week. One day Lucy and her brother were going to the place where the ice cream was kept. Lucy was trotting along, holding Charles's hand. She heard a strange noise in the street near them. Looking, she saw two boys with a little dog's tail. One boy had tied a string to the poor little dog's tail, and on the other end of the string was a deserted oyster-can.

"O brother!" said Lucy, "see what the wicked boys are doing."

And then tears filled her eyes, because she felt sorry for the dog.

Then Charles asked the boy to let the dog go. They would not do this, but said they would sell him the dog for twenty-five cents.

"If we buy the dog, Lucy, you can have no ice cream, for I have only twenty-five cents in my pocket," said Charles.

Then Lucy was very sad, for she loved ice cream dearly, but still she knew it was her duty to prevent the dog from suffering.

So, for a moment she was silent, and then looking up to her brother she said, in her pretty way: "You kick in the ribs of the boys, dear brother, and I will hustle the pup up the alley."

And so Lucy had her ice cream, after all.

After Lucy returned from Boarding-school, and began Laying Pipe to secure a Young Man, she coaxed her Papa to let her take lessons from a Singing Master, and pretty soon she could vocalize quite well, and loved dearly to sit in the Parlor and Turn Herself Loose at the Piano. Lucy was very partial to sentimental songs, and seemed to be a Little Gone on those that had rather sappy titles, and the words to which did not mean anything in particular. She would hustle around the Music Stand for a while, and then come to the surface with a lot of such Truck as "Angel Voices Now Are Calling," "Darling, Kiss My Eyelids Down," "When the Brown is On the Heather," and so forth. To hear Lucy singing "Tread Lightly, for Mother is Sleeping," while her Mamma was out in the Yard, with her mouth full of Clothes-pins, was worth quite a journey. But Lucy never seemed to think of the incongruity of such proceedings. She would Wrestle with the Piano every day, while both her Parents were working hard, and never think that Idleness is the Mother of Matinees, and that the Singing Girl Gathers No Boss. One beautiful summer evening she was Having Her Hoot as usual, and had got far enough into the pile of music so that she was singing Sentimental songs. Finally she started in on one that begins: "I Am Sitting in the Glen," when suddenly her Papa, who had been trying to read the Paper, turned to his Wife and said: "How much do you think it would cost, mother, to move a fair-sized glen about nine miles, and fix things so that it couldn't come back?" Then Lucy began to cry, and said that her Papa was a Brute.

One day when little Charles, the good boy of whom I have before told you, was on his way to School, he passed by a large Orchard in which there were a great many kinds of Fruit, and as the sunshine came streaming through the branches of the Trees, and fell upon the rosy-cheeked Apples, the sweet, mellow Peaches, and the red Cherries, Charles thought they looked very Beautiful, indeed, and would Go Down Nicely with the Lunch which his kind Mother had wrapped up in a white napkin for him, and placed in the little Basket he carried in his hand.

Some of the Fruit hung very near the Fence, and as Charles looked at it wistfully he said to himself: "How easily I could climb over there and Pluck several of the Apples and Pears without being discovered, for there is no one in the Orchard now. But that would be Wrong, and if I did it I should always be Sorry, and suffer dreadfully from the Pangs of Conscience."

So he stood there a little longer, as the little Birds in the trees were singing their Merriest Lays.

Many times Charles looked up at the Fruit, and thought how easy it would be to take it, but every time he did this, the Small Voice would say: "That would be wrong, Charles," and he would resolve not to make any such Break.

But pretty soon a Bright Thought struck him, and his young face lighted up with a Sunny Smile. "I will go to the Owner of the Orchard," he said, "who lives in yonder House, and tell him how I conquered Temptation. Then he will give me all the Fruit I want, because that is the way sturdy Farmers always do in the little books I get at Sunday-School."

So he went boldly up to the farm-house, but just as he entered the Gate a fierce Dog grabbed him by the seat of his Panties and Wiped the Ground with him for a few moments. The nice Lunch that his mother had put up for him was Distributed all over the Yard, and his new jacket looked as if it had been Out With the Boys. When the Farmer heard the Noise he came running out of the House and called off the Dog.

"What do you want, my Little Man?" he said to Charles.

So Charles told him he had been tempted to take the Fruit, but would not do so because it was Wrong. And then he asked the man for some Fruit.

The Farmer looked at him for a Moment, and then he said:

"I have two more Dogs, both larger than the one you tackled, and unless you are out of here in Three Jerks of a Lamb's Tail, they will be Lunching, and you will be Quite Conspicuous in the bill of fare."

So Charles ran quickly away, not even stopping to get his Basket. A little way down the Road he overtook Thomas Tough, who was eating a Delicious Peach.

"Where did you get that Peach, Thomas?" asked Charles.

"Over in that Orchard," replied Thomas. "I waited until the Old Crank who owns the place had gone to Breakfast, and then appointed myself Receiver of the Orchard."

"You are a very wicked Boy," says Charles.

"Yes," replied Thomas, "I am a trifle wicked, but I keep Getting to the Front all the time, and my clothes don't seem quite so much Disarranged as yours. You will also notice that my lunch Basket is with me, and that my piece of Pie for the Noonday Meal is not lying in Farmer Brown's Garden."

When Charles went home that evening, he told his Papa what he had done. "You know, Papa," he said, "that I would sooner be right than President."

"Yes," replied his Papa, "but I am not seriously alarmed about your being President, either."

PRIVATE ASYLUM,
For the Care and Treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases.

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION

called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1882, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious. In order to thoroughly enjoy a melodrama, it is first necessary to approach the performance of it in a proper frame of mind. One should always seek one's entertainment with the correct bias. When a man makes up his mind to go to church (as men sometimes do even yet, if the world, the flesh, and the devil have not too powerful a clutch upon them) he puts his mutilated coin for the plate in his pocket, works himself up to a sufficiently gloomy view of the hereafter, and slides into his pew in a devotional frame of mind. When he goes to see the ballet he puts his opera-glass in his pocket, glides comfortably into his seat in the orchestra, and briefly resumes his anatomical studies upon the kindergarten system. When he goes to the circus he puts nothing in his pocket, reduces his intellect to its pulpulent condition, and has a brief period of flaccid enjoyment. But when he goes to see the melodrama he should approach it with his heart upon his sleeve, and his emotions violently inflamed and quickly responsive. For is there not always a fair and virtuous young woman in a peck of trouble through no fault of her own, and a well-intentioned young hero who is never able to do anything to help her out till just before the fall of the last curtain, and a delicious villain so full of schemes, and plots, and counterplots, that it makes one dizzy to follow the tortuous course of his depravity? All of these you will find in "The White Slave." The gentle persecuted heroine is own dramatic sister to Zoe in the "Octoroon," and Anna in "The Danicheffs." A bond-maid reared as gently as a lady, and unconscious of the pressure of her shackles till the plot of the play begins to ferment. In the person of Miss Georgie Cayvan she is a very charming young woman. Miss Cayvan has a graceful young figure, a rich, sweet voice, and a pair of dark, earnest eyes, with that excessive width between them which is said by many to denote the artistic temperament. She has the happy faculty of immediately placing herself en rapport with an audience, a faculty which will do more for her in her career than shining talent, perhaps. She is not heavily taxed in "The White Slave," which really plays itself, it being a grouping of incident rather than a study of character, but such as falls to her share is well done; notably, perhaps, in her interview with that deliciously wicked villain in white duck at Oscola. By the way, what a curious effect the bills have when, in quoting from the scene, they run:

"Rags are royal raiment when worn for virtue's sake." J. Thompson.

The scenic artist must have been unspeakably amazed to find himself accredited with this bit of declamatory virtue when he sought praise for nothing more than a rather well-set scene, which was particularly good in the background. Its vivid sunset effect was duly appreciated, too, but a wobbling plank in the foreground distracted the attention of the in-artistic and heedless, who saw an impending catastrophe in every kick of the insecure plank. This all the more as the hero is likely at any moment throughout the play to dash from his ambush in the wings, execute a most remarkable bit of pedestrianism down the length of the stage, and fold the heroine in his arms, with a loud and apparently irrelevant cry of "Liss! Liss! Liss!" Some one, describing the sectional differences of manner and speech, once said that you could always tell a New Yorker by his "rawr oysters." Years of training would not make him take his oysters without a final r in the raw. Mr. Levick must be the traditional New Yorker, for he will not have Liss without an r. For the rest, he has a handsome stage presence, a good voice, and a melodramatic impetuosity. In fact, every time that he achieves one of his remarkable entrances there is a general dodging down the middle row of the orchestra, for he does not look as if he were going to be stopped by a few paltry footlights.

But if there be any one character which is the point d'appui of "The White Slave" it is the villain, the new McCloskey. Wessels, once the Ivan Ogareff of "Michael Strogoff," having been inducted into Tartaric splendor, was not to be dismayed by the commonplace of the plain American toilette in the plain American melodrama. So he wears a long sweep of tangled locks, and a Billy Buffalo hat, and a very low-necked collar. And his brows are blackened a preternatural black, and his cheeks are reddened a preternatural red, and his tailor has clothed him in preternatural white. I do not know what is the established costume of the Southern planters, but I should fancy that a dazzling vision like this prancing about the cotton-fields would have made them open their honest eyes with amazement. Upon the stage, however, he is a delicious article of ten-cent villainy, and his brilliant plumage does not really seem amiss among the swift succeeding sensations of "The White Slave"—the foreclosure of the mortgage close upon the death of Judge Hardin, the sale and transfer of Liss, the wreck of the Bulle Creole, the murder of the creole mistress, etc.

The creole mistress is but a minor character, yet a feature of the life of the times. Miss Louise Sylvestre, who always had a clever knack at small character like this, infuses her with life and interest, but had been just as well to have finished this character in one act, and when the amiable Mr. Lacy, her lover, to have concluded the octoroon girl's career before the footlights. The Camille-like death of her death in the last act is an unnecessary piece of tediousness in the hurry and rush of the general action. However, as the play is interspersed with almost everything but humor, death-scenes here and there are part of the filling.

Taking "The White Slave" for what it is, a spectacular melodrama, it is unquestionably a success. It is not written upon the same plane of literature as the other plays of the author, and has none of the warm human interest that made "Van" a pretty play, or "My Partner" a new idyl of friendship. It is a fair picture of life and manners in the South in the old times, framed in a singularly improbable plot; for, although one shudders even now to think of what men did with their black progeny in those times, it would not have been easy to find a man in the South willing to stain a white child's brow with the curse of black blood. Both the law and the sympathies drew the lines of caste too terribly to make such a story probable.

But every appeal to the audience is answered, and, when there is a storm in the gallery, there is something more than a flutter in the dress circle. The truth of the matter is, the dress circle is more willing to view melodrama than it professes itself to be, and is more stirred by its startling situations than it cares to acknowledge, for we are all made of one clay, whether we sit in the high places or the low. The difference is a mere matter of decoration, physical and metaphysical.

The comedy of "The White Slave" is entrusted chiefly to the negroes. They have procured a band of the real article, and, as all the world knows, the negro is never comic when it is expected of him. Charley Reed's eyes snapping through the burnt cork, or Billy Emerson's head built out like a New Orleans levee darkey's, is more mirth-provoking than a band of the genuines doing their best to be amusing. And, since they are genuine, why do they sing ever the hybrid Christy melodies when they might preserve the strange characteristic music of the levees, the cornfields, and the camp-meetings, a music which is passing away with this people?—how often does one see any more in their race-stained faces the unmixed blood of the African? Through how many successive seasons of "Uncle Tom" and "The Octoroon" have we all heard the "Old Kentucky Home," a spurious article, however sweet it be. Let any one strike up a real negro melody, and in a moment every one in the house keeps time to it. That curious non-descript at the minstrels, Conchita, is simply insufferable till she begins her negro music, and how many encores does Billy Emerson always get for "Weep, Little Children, Weep."

There is a refrain of sadness in every note of it, as there must be in everything in this world to make it appeal to the heart. And in every song that the real negro ever sang there is a longing for peace and rest in the "happy land of Canaan." One of the old songs which they used to sing at their funerals, when it was the custom of the race to bury their dead at night, runs thus:

"I walk in de graveyard; I walk too de graveyard
To lay dis body down.
I lay in de grave, and I stretch out my arms
When I lay dis body down.
I go to de judgment in de evenin' ob de day,
When I lay dis body down;
And my soul and your soul will meet dat day,
When we lay dis body down."

Some one of vivid imagination said once that when he heard this sung at a midnight funeral with the peculiar quality of the negro voice, the line: "I lay in de grave, and I stretch out my arms," seemed to him one of the most plaintive longings for peace and rest ever uttered since man first lived and suffered. Barbaric madrigals are all sad, being sung much in the minor key; but negro music has suffered much from miscegenation, and we shall probably never hear it again in its native peculiarity. Even aside from the music, the straight-haired negro has come in on the minstrel stage, and people laugh absurdly over a simple tuft of hair, because it has not a kink in it. Witness the musical genius at the Grand Opera House in that singular pot-pourri of entertainment which includes pantomime, minstrelsy, tumbling, and specialties. A pantomime is lop-sided without a ballet; but people go to see this one more because it is one more place of amusement than for its intrinsic worth. There is patronage for more than the California, notwithstanding its burning floating spar with the whole interest of the melodrama lashed to one end of it, and its thrilling but singularly deliberate explosion.

They promise to open the Baldwin for the holidays, but in the meantime it is closed, excepting on the fifteenth instant, when an amateur dramatic performance of Gilbert's comedy, "On Guard," will be given for the benefit of the British Benevolent Association. The cast is filled with the names of those ladies and gentlemen who were so successful dramatically when the association was last benefited in this wise. The following is the cast: Dennis Grant, John I. Housman; Corry Kavanaugh, J. Evelyn Bell; Guy Warrington, E. M. Greenway; Grouse, W. T. St. Auburn; Druce, F. Matthieu; Mrs. Fitzborne, Mrs. Charles Mason; Jessie Blake, Miss May Scott. BETSY B.

CCLIII.—Bill of Fare for Six Persons—Sunday, November 5.

Purée of Lima Beans.
Cantaloupe.
Fried Halibut. Saratoga Potatoes.
Broiled Teal Ducks, Currant Jelly.
Baked Tomatoes. Summer Squash.
Roast Beef, Yorkshire Pudding.
French Artichoke Salad.
Strawberries, Whipped Cream, and Sponge-cake.
Peaches, Figs, Oranges, Apples, Pears, and Grapes.
PURÉE OF LIMA BEANS.—Put cold water and a little salt on the fire, and at the first boiling throw the beans in; boil until tender; drain, wash through a colander. Put back on the fire, with warm stock or broth to taste—that is, to make it thick or thin. Season with salt and pepper. Boil gently for five minutes, stirring the white; turn into the soup-tureen over croûtons, and serve. It may be served without croûtons.

A DRAMATIC EVENT.

What the New Yorkers Think of Mrs. Langtry.

Mrs. Langtry seems to have taken New York by storm. A large crowd went to meet her, and every one is endeavoring to get sight of her face. The ticket sale for the first night amounted to nearly ten thousand dollars. Turning to the burning of Abbey's theatre, the opening was changed to Wallack's. The reporters give various accounts of the Jersey Lily. The following is what the Tribune representative saw:

Mrs. Langtry had come up the companion-way with her friend and drama teacher, Henry Labouchère, wife of the editor of Truth. She stood now upon the promenade, gracefully poised upon shapely and dainty feet, that peeped out from under a short knitted skirt of blue serge. Her hands were employed with her gloves, and her eyes and features with welcoming smiles from her friends; and her appearance and bearing presented a realization of their ideal to which Americans are partial. Mrs. Langtry's voice is full and vibrant, and her speech rich in melodious modulations that keep time with the expressive play of her features. Her manner was never discomposed yesterday. Much of her conversation was necessarily about herself, her experiences, sentiments, and aspirations; yet she never hesitated, but replied to every question with unaffected directness. This was well illustrated when it was suggested by a reporter that she would probably make a fortune on the stage, and she was asked what she intended to do with the money. "Oh! I don't know," she replied, artlessly; "I don't think much of money, although it is very pleasant to have plenty of it, especially after you have been poor. But if you had a great many friends, and they were very kind to me, and people who make one fortune get stingy—don't they?—and go ahead making more. I think I might do something for the profession if I should make a fortune—establish a theatre, for instance." When a reporter asked if she was not now judged in England not as a member of society, but as a member of the profession, she replied: "Yes, that is so. I had a great many friends, and they were very kind to me; but now the people judge me on my merits, and I haven't any." With little turns of self-depreciation like this she frequently interspersed her conversation, saying at one time that the fact that the Americans (as was suggested to her) would take her not as a novice, but as an actress with an established reputation, would be all the worse for her.

The Sun man gushes in much the same manner, but differs on the question of the color of her eyes:

She stood erect with her shoulders back, and the full lines of her figure perfectly revealed by a dress that fitted without a wrinkle. The dark blue bodice was unrelieved except by a brilliant mass of gold braid down the front and around the collar, and the plaited skirt fell in straight lines within a few inches of the deck. Beneath two remarkably small English walking-shoes, and on her head the actress wore a small hat that after her own fashion. Her hair was in loose and graceful ringlets over her forehead and drawn in a simple knot behind. Her waist was very small, and her whole costume was characterized by elegant simplicity. Her hair is brown, with a tinge of rich auburn that looks like gold. Mrs. Langtry is unquestionably a very beautiful woman. Her beauty is of the kind that has no photograph, and those who have seen her pictures only have no conception of the charm of her face. Her complexion is pure white, and almost transparent. The mouth in repose has a pathetic or serious expression, and the lips are as clearly cut as a statue's. The eyes, however, are the most winning feature of all. They are gray, with little jet black pupils, and often by long and rapid glances they are so wonderfully expressive, and certainly very effective, for they did remarkable work yesterday. Mrs. Langtry raised them slowly, and glanced around into the faces of the men about her, looking at each one fully. The faces had been sleepy, perhaps, but they woke up. As Mrs. Langtry talked she looked at the faces about her with an expression of charming frankness, and often with an ingenuously when she was amused. Her cordiality was infectious. When she smiled every face burst into a broad and sympathetic grin, and when she laughed her musical tones were drowned in the subterranean gurgles of the enthusiastic spectators. Her voice is soft, agreeable, and so clear that it travels far, and she is a perfect master of the English accent so common in some of the theatrical people from the mother country. Mrs. Langtry so thoroughly charmed the circle about her yesterday, that when she gracefully withdrew the men turned to each other and lost themselves in enthusiasm.

No one seems able to decide the eye question; indeed, the Times refrains from any opinion on this vexed question. The World reporter was polite and indefinite. He gives the reader his choice between two shades:

She is a flower of the Norman islands in the Channel, and in her eyes the effects of the benign influences of the sea which the Greeks deified in their Venus Anadyomene, and which the pretty women of modern New York seek so earnestly at Newport and amid its cosmetic fogs. Her hair is chestnut—"an excellent color; your chestnut was ever the only color," her eyes are large and gray—the Provencal people would have called them "green" and meant to praise their eyes full of light, which kindle when she smiles. Her voice is musical, as the voices of Englishwomen are apt to be. For the rest, everybody who imagines himself to be a judge of female beauty will of course consider it to be his duty to see Mrs. Langtry and to pass judgment upon her claims to the apple of Mount Ida.

The World thus describes some of her most striking theatrical costumes:

Mrs. Langtry makes her debut as Hester Grazebrook, in Tom Taylor's "Unequal Match." It is a part which calls for considerable versatility. Her costumes, like those in her other plays, are of her own designing. In the first act of the "Unequal Match," in which she is a poor country girl, she wears a flowered cotton dress, tucked up over a red petticoat, with a white apron and neckerchief; in the second she has a pale turquoise blue dress, of soft material, made up in innumerable platings, loopings, and fillings, and trimmed with cream lace, and in the third an elaborate gray silk dress, trimmed with "steel jet," which look like the scales of a silver fish. In "She Stoops to Conquer" her first dress is of rich antique satin, brocaded with pink roses, over a tawny-colored petticoat, English, flounced, and trimmed with embroidery; point lace ruffles and fichu. The second dress is of sprigged muslin, with sack tied with marigold-color ribbons, brown hat with ostrich feathers, Suede gloves and Suede-color shoes. The third dress is gray cashmere, short petticoat with overskirt tucked up, white apron with pockets, plain laced bodice with white fichu and ruffles, gray stockings, and black shoes with buckles, lace cap. In "Rosalind" Mrs. Langtry wears what she believes to be the true "doublet and hose" of Shakespeare while the daughter of the banished duke is masquerading as a youth. When she comes upon the stage with Hymen and Celia she appears in a quaint semi-Oreocian costume with touches of flamboyant about it. These extravaganzas from the traditional wear of the Rosalind of the stage are understood to have been adopted by the advice of Mr. Labouchère. Upon this point Mrs. Labouchère, who accompanies Mrs. Langtry, however, may be heard. As to the "doublet and hose," the London critics have fallen in among themselves, but there seems to have been a general disappointment among the audiences in the British metropolis at Mrs. Langtry's infidelity to the conventional type of Ganymede.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Mr. Bartley Campbell has been very successful, pecuniarily, with his plays, mainly from the fact that he is a good business man, and personally manages the performing of them. Mark Twain is said to have realized some hundred thousand dollars from the sunny Colonel Sellers. Bronson Howard derives a handsome income from royalties and percentages on his plays. Usually the royalty is twenty-five dollars for each performance. For his new play, "Young Mrs. Winthrop," just brought out successfully at the Madison Square Theatre, Mr. Howard has received three thousand dollars in cash, with a contingency on future receipts. The limit of this contingency is twelve thousand dollars, to be paid in installments of three thousand dollars for every one hundred and eighty nights. Mr. Howard retains the right for England. Mr. Hart Jackson, who adapted the "Two Orphans" for the Union Square Theatre, is reported to have received seventy-five thousand dollars in royalties for that play. Joaquin Miller received a large income from "The Danites." But the dramatist who has received the largest revenue from his plays, either in ancient or modern times, is Mr. Boucicault.

"Pretty Georgie Cayvan," says Clara Belle, "wore, as a part of her costume, the Gypsy Girl in 'The Romany Rye,' when that play was produced in New York, a yard or two of just such stuff at a cost that would have absorbed the ablest fortune-teller's fortune for a year. I forgave her, however, in view of the delicious swagger produced by a peculiar rolling of the hips, that made her picturesque. Of course, the real gypsies don't walk that way. They sneak and slouch awkwardly, judging by those that are introduced in the play, and are encamped near Central Park. The women of that lot are too disgusting to go near, as I ascertained on trying. Speaking of those bodice patterns, and of going into queer places, I have seen once more the tattooed girl of whom I wrote. She has reappeared at one of our museums. She is the identical woman, but has changed her spots somewhat. Running across the calves of her legs now are bands of the newest fashionable patterns. The lecturer declared that the colors were pricked in by savages ten years ago, and he resented the insinuation when I called his attention to this fresh pattern of the present season, done in newly invented colors. As for the girl, she is a Greek, and understands no English; yet when I talked about the new-fashioned design on her legs, and said I was sure I could match it at a dry-goods store around the corner, she turned fiery red in the face, exactly as she would have done if she had understood English."

"An undeniably handsome woman," says the Cincinnati Enquirer's New York correspondent, "is a conspicuous figure in the 'Vicar of Bray,' the comic opera just brought out at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. I mean Edith Bland. She is half a head taller than any man on the same stage, finely proportioned, and has rather a pretty face. She personates a ballet-dancer, and wears a novel costume, almost wholly black, the only other color being a very little yellow. Even her stockings are jet, and they are shown considerably above the knees when she dances. 'She is an English lady,' said an observer. 'She is the wife of Mr. Solomon, the composer of the opera, you know. Her father is a baronet, and she is highly cultured. Don't you notice how softly English her accent is, and how well she carries herself? Just about a year ago I happened to be in Buffalo with a near relative. We were total strangers in the city, and had an evening on our hands. He suggested that here was my chance to go to a variety show without detection. We went. I found myself in a stuffy little box, and peeping out from behind the curtains, I saw a smoking, drinking audience of men. Myself and two others were the only women in the house, aside from those on the stage. One of the latter was this same Edith Bland, just as stately and fine as she was the other night at the Fifth Avenue. Remembering this, I wondered if the admirer of her ladylike demeanor and soft English accent would have changed her mind if informed that, whether or not the actress was of aristocratic birth, she had acquired her grace of bearing on the despised variety stage."

To attempt to give representations of Italian operas in French, at the Châteaufort Theatre, has been most unsuccessful. The house closed with "Don Pasquale." In the middle of the opera, Madeleine Mineur, who was singing Norina, suddenly stopped and said to the leader, Monsieur Bourgeois: "You are accompanying me abominably; besides which, you suppress all the ritornelli." "Well, I won't accompany you at all," coolly said Monsieur Bourgeois, and, suiting the action to the word, he got down from his seat and walked out, followed by the whole orchestra. The curtain fell, and the lessee rushed after the musicians and endeavored to bring them back, but was unsuccessful. The curtain was then raised again, and an actor, addressing himself to the public in an agitated voice, asked: "Can not somebody play the piano?" a query which was immediately answered by an old lady, who quietly left her seat among the audience, sat down to the piano, and accompanied exquisitely during the remainder of the performance.

A very ugly old barrister, arguing a point of practice before Plunket, claimed to be received as an authority. "I am a pretty old practitioner, my Lord." "An old practitioner, Mr. S—," was Plunket's correction.

Sir Fletcher Norton, whose want of courtesy was notorious, happened, while pleading before Lord Mansfield on some question of manorial right, to say: "My Lord, I can illustrate the point in an instant in my own person. I myself have two little manors." "We all know it, Sir Fletcher," the judge interposed, with one of his blandest smiles.

The near approach of the winter stimulates the prudent man to the purchase of fuel. Prudent Householder—Hi, ho, there! Stop! What do you ask for your coal? Peripatetic Dealer—Three francs a hundred kilos, sir. Housekeeper—Weigh me a thousand kilos, and dump it here. Dealer (hesitatingly)—Certainly, sir; but—well, ahem!—the fact is, that when we weigh it in the presence of the customer the price is three francs and a half.

Charles Dickens had a very good story about the early days of a renowned mourning establishment. He went there one day about some mourning, and was ushered into a room where sat a shopman with an attendant in woe-stricken habiliments, who groaned out: "A father, a mother—perhaps a wife." "Oh, no," said Dickens, "only a distant relative." "Oh, sir," said the funeral one, "you have made a mistake; this is the chamber of agonizing woe. John, toll the bell, and show the gentleman into the light affliction department."

His majesty George IV. once appeared in full Highland costume and begged the ladies to tell him how he looked. They all assured him nothing could be better. At that moment appeared the portly Alderman Sir William Curtis, also in full Highland costume—a most ridiculous figure. The king bit his lip, and said: "I hope I do not look like that; at all events, that my kilt is not so short." One of the ladies made the king a low curtsy, and said: "As your majesty stays so short a time in Scotland, the more we see of you the better!"

A venerable lady in green glasses, a calico dress, and alpine sun-bonnet, entered the art-gallery of a Norwich dentist the other day. She carried a carpet bag and took snuff. Setting the bag at the feet of the dentist, she opened it, fumbled around in its capacious mouth, and drew out a set of worn but serviceable false teeth. "There," she said, "what'll ye gimme fur these things? They belonged to my sister, but as she's dead she won't have any further use fur 'em. They are good yet fur second-hand, an' reckon I can get 'bout half price fur 'em."

The wit of Sergeant Ballantine appears to be of a very caustic character. When, some years ago, a distinguished journalist was forced to appear in the witness-box, the sergeant, just before cross-examining him, entirely deprived him of his self-possession by coolly observing: "There is flour on your nose, sir." On another occasion he publicly rebuked Mr. Justice Hawkins—then Mr. Hawkins, Q. C.—for his inveterate love of accumulating wealth, assuring him that he had much more money than he would ever need in this life; that he could not possibly hope to take the surplus away with him, and that, if he did, it would most certainly melt.

The famous conjurer Hermann has arrived in Paris from Vienna, after a sojourn of six months in South America. During a performance at the house of the Governor of Montevideo, Hermann determined to mystify three half-savage Patagonians who were present, and whom no one dared to approach. He stupefied the first by taking an orange from his nose; he astonished the second by producing a series of plasters from his hair, but the third seemed overpowered with terror as he extracted from his nose a living rat. Uttering a cry of fright, the Patagonians withdrew, and the company congratulated Hermann upon his success. While receiving their congratulations, he suddenly discovered that his watch was gone, and that his chain had gone with it. His purse, too, had disappeared, and the thief had also appropriated his eyeglass and his pocket handkerchief. Half an hour afterward the chief of the Patagonians returned, bringing the missing articles. The savage from whose nose Hermann had extracted the rat had emptied the conjurer's pockets at the moment when he was pretending to be overcome with terror at the apparition of the rat from the tip of his nose.

A young man arrived at an inn, and after alighting from his horse went into the traveler's room, where he walked backward and forward for some minutes, displaying the utmost importance. At length he rang the bell, and upon the waiter's appearance gave him an order, nearly as follows: "Waiter! I. The waiter replied, 'Sir.' 'I am a man of few words, and don't like continually ringing the bell and disturbing the house. I'll thank you to listen to what I am going to say.' The waiter again replied, 'Yes, Sir.' 'In the first place bring me a glass of brandy and water, cold, with a little sugar, and also a teaspoon; wipe down the table, throw some coals on the fire, and sweep up the hearth; bring me a couple of candles, pen, ink, and paper, some wafers, a little sealing-wax, and let me know what time the post goes out. Tell the hostler to take care of my horse, dress him well, stop his feet, and let me know when he is ready to feed. Order the chambermaid to prepare me a good bed, take care that the sheets are well aired, a clean night-cap, and a glass of water in the room. Send the Boots with a pair of slippers that I can walk to the stable in; tell him I must have my boots cleaned and brought into this room to-night, and that I shall want to be called at five o'clock in the morning. Ask your mistress what I can have for supper; tell her I should like a roast duck, or something of that sort; desire your master to step in, I want to ask him a few questions about the drapery of my own.' The waiter answered, 'Yes, Sir,' and went to the landlord and told him a gentleman parlor wanted a great many things, and among the things he wanted him, and that was all he could get."

MRS. LYDIA E. PINKHAM, OF LYNN, MASS.,

Woman I can Sympathize with Woman.

Health of Woman is the Hope of the Race.

Grass for Health
Lydia E. Pinkham

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

Is a Positive Cure for all those Painful Complaints and Weaknesses so common to our best female population.
It will cure entirely the worst form of Female Complaints, all ovarian troubles, Inflammation and Ulceration, Falling and Displacements, and the consequent Spinal Weakness, and is particularly adapted to the Change of Life.

It will dissolve and expel tumors from the uterus in an early stage of development. The tendency to cancerous humors is checked very speedily by its use. It removes faintness, feebleness, destroys all craving for stimulants, and relieves weakness of the stomach. It cures bloating, Headaches, Nervous Prostration, General Debility, Sleeplessness, Depression and Indigestion.

That feeling of bearing down, causing pain, weight and backache, is always permanently cured by its use. It will at all times and under all circumstances act in harmony with the laws that govern the female system. For the cure of Kidney Complaints of either sex this Compound is unsurpassed.

LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S VEGETABLE COMPOUND is prepared at 233 and 235 Western Avenue, Lynn, Mass. Price $1. Six bottles for $5. Sent by mail in the form of pills, also in the form of lozenges, on receipt of price, $1 per box for either. Mrs. Pinkham freely answers all letters of inquiry. Send for pamphlet. Address as above. Mention this Paper.

No family should be without LYDIA E. PINKHAM'S LIVER PILLS. They cure constipation, biliousness, and torpidity of the liver. 25 cents per box.
Sold by all Druggists.

AYER'S SARSAPARILLA, For Purifying the Blood.

This compound of the vegetable alteratives, Sarsaparilla, Dock, Scillaire, and Mandrake, with the Iodides of Potash and Iron, makes a most effectual cure of complaints affecting the blood. It purifies the blood, purges out the lurking humors in the system that undermine health and settle into troublesome disorders. Eruptions on the skin are the appearance at the surface of humors that should be expelled from the blood. Internal derangements, such as the determination of these same humors to some internal organ or organs, with action they derange, and whose substance they disease and destroy. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA expels these humors from the blood. When they are gone, the disorders they produce disappear, such as Ulcerations of the Liver, Stomach, Kidneys, Lungs, Eruptions and Eruptive diseases of the Skin, Rose or Erysipelas, Pimples, Pustules, Blisters, Boils, Tumors, Tetters and Salt Rheum, Scald Head, King-worm, Ulcers and Sores, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Pain in the Bones, Side and Head, Female Weakness, Sterility, Dropsy, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility. With their departure health returns.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

SHERIFF'S SALE—EXECUTION.

THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, Plaintiff, vs.
JAMES DALY, ET AL.; Defendants.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Alias Execution issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the 12th day of October, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Daly and Michael Hawkins, defendants, on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1879, for the sum of Six Thousand ($6,000.00) Dollars, lawful money of the United States, which amount is entitled to a credit of $2,188.18 made on two former executions, with interest thereon and costs, etc., I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the sixteenth day of October, 1882, the day upon which the hereinafter described property was levied upon in the above entitled cause, or which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter described property situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said City and County in the names of James D. Daly, Michael Hawkins, John O. Kane, and A. J. Moon, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Broadway Street, 95 3/4 feet easterly from Baker Street; thence running westerly along said line of Broadway Street 95 3/4 feet to the easterly line of Baker Street; thence running northerly along said line of Baker Street 63 5/12 feet; thence easterly parallel with Broadway Street 63 5/12 feet; and thence southeasterly to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, the 13th day of NOVEMBER, 1882, at 12 o'clock noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the 16th day of October, 1882, the day upon which the above property was levied upon, as aforesaid, or which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the above described property, to the highest and best bidder for lawful money of the United States.

SAN LEANDRO VILLAGE CARTS

I present this week a copy of the working drawing of one of my handiwork Carts—a Phaeton, with canopy top. For elegance of design, beauty of proportion, and grace of outline, it is pronounced by good judges superior to anything yet produced having two wheels. I, individually, like some of the other styles as well, if not better; but by most persons, ladies especially this vehicle is given the preference. Looked upon simply as a pleasure carriage, to be used by ladies and children when calling or shopping expeditions, it certainly is superior to anything else to be had for twice its cost.

When requested, I give a written guarantee as follows with each vehicle:
First—I warrant it to be wholly free from that indolent and annoying bobbing motion common to other two wheeled vehicles, which tires the occupant and hurts the horse's back, and to ride as smoothly and easily as the best buggy. I think no other responsible maker dare give such a warranty.

Second—My Patent Leveling Device simply perfects two-wheeled vehicles, and makes my Village Carts, in connection with their admirable system of springs and linkages, equal in every important respect to a four-wheeled vehicle. The Leveling Device enables the occupant to level the body in a moment, whether a large or small horse is used, and entirely prevents the seat from tipping backward or forward. This advantage is peculiar to this vehicle alone.

Third—The body is independent of the shafts, and can move up and down freely 10 or 12 inches, remaining level while doing so.

Samples of these Carts may be seen at Studebaker Bros., corner Main and Market Streets, San Francisco. Prices from $94 to $135. Send for illustrated circular and price list. Address

CRIMINAL OR CRANK?

By J. T. Goodman.

I have known few men so intimately, and esteemed none more highly, than I did Godfrey Waldegrave. A community of age and tastes conduced to the intimacy, but the esteem rested solely upon the purity and loftiness of his nature. I use the word nature instead of character, because there appears to me to be a marked distinction between the terms—the one implying an inborn attribute, while the other may denote a trait that is merely acquired. The nobility of Waldegrave was an inalienable birthright. I have known men who, pricked by the spur of circumstances, could comport themselves as loftily, and whose souls could give out as pure a lustre on the touchstone of chance occasion—freakish men, whose lethargic virtue required a strong stimulus to arouse it, and only burned spasmodically, like an intermittent fever; but I never knew another than Godfrey Waldegrave in whom loftiness and purity were predominant and persistent forces, independent of all motives and surroundings, and inseparable from every action of his life.

These qualities would have distinguished him had he been only of a passive mood, content to unbonnet himself graciously to the world as it passed along. But his nature would not permit him to play the elegant bystander. Amid the pageantry of that world, as it moved before him, he saw wrongs to be righted, sufferings to be alleviated, high purposes to be achieved; and his soul would not suffer him to rest while the accomplishment of any of these objects lay bow remotely soever within his power.

He was a physician—an eminent and popular one—but the practice of his profession did not afford scope enough for the full volume of his impulses and energies. The superfluity expended itself in a multiplicity of extra-professional actions, some of which were eccentric to the extreme of quixotry, but all alike inspired by high and unsullied motives. He went solitarily upon midnight missions, to do good whenever and however it was to be done, to the extent of his means and ability; he delivered public discourses upon current errors and abuses, or upon themes calculated to instruct and elevate the masses; he held, at times, regular religious services, preaching a broad humanitarian faith, designed to attract those who rebelled against the rigor of more orthodox creeds; he overwhelmed the press with contributions upon every conceivable topic; and when the severity of some of his articles was modified by the prudent editor, he established a periodical of his own, in which his opinions might find unrestricted utterance.

Such force and activity imply strong personality, and are likely to suggest its usual concomitant—egotism; but Waldegrave was singularly free from this weakness, if I rightly apprehend it. I take egotism to be a sickly outgrowth and manifestation of egoism—an obnoxious excrescence upon a wholesome trunk. A man may be superabundantly endowed with the faculty of introspection and the consciousness of individuality, which constitute egoism in its broad sense, and yet be destitute of that personal vanity whose tiresome exhibition renders him an egotist. Waldegrave possessed a greater amount of egoism than any person I ever met. The incessant strain of his mind, the unrelaxing nervous tension, the shock of endless encounters, the reaction from futile endeavor, scourged him to subjective study, and made him involuntarily a lesson to himself. The problem of his being, in which there appeared to be no possibility of an equation between the large purposes and the small achievements, was constantly forced upon him, and in his baffled search for the unattainable solution he gnawed his heart away, as other scholars gnaw a book. But this intense consciousness and study of self did not betray him into egotistic display. He never alluded to himself out of self-love, or in a manner intended to obtrude his personality upon the listener. Yet his discourse was so surcharged with latent self as the unpivoted needle is with polarity; but he treated of his individuality only as a known quality in the problem of existence, an entity that served as a fulcrum for induction, a factor, a sign, a key—or what you will—a knowledge of which furnished the only clew, however unsubstantial, on which he could rely in the bewildering maze of life's incomprehensibilities.

His vagaries won the sure reward of eccentricity. The sneer of unpracticalness, the innuendo of insanity, came flippantly from men incapable of understanding either his motives or his methods. It was this very incapacity, undoubtedly, that hegot the scoffs. People are tolerant only toward what is commensurable with their own plane and circumference. The things above or beyond them are equally objects of scorn with the things beneath them. If to know what they do be still a valid plea for pardon, these ignorant scoffers must be forgiven, I suppose. It might be pardonable, moreover, in one who knew Waldegrave measurably well, yet not wholly, to have doubted the practicality and soundness of his mind, so extraordinary were some of his idiosyncrasies. But to me, who was as familiar with the structure and workings of his intellect as if I had anatomized it, he appeared the most practical and sane of men. Obliquity and straightness are merely matters of standpoint. Vary the angle of sight, and the oblique will become straight, the straight oblique. According to the laws that govern it, the boomerang goes as directly to its aim as the arrow. The ostensibly unpractical schemes of Waldegrave became entirely practical when viewed from the conditions under which he saw them; and his apparently erratic ways, surveyed from the base of his peculiar mental organization, showed themselves to be the most straightforward of courses. It might be urged that, in weighing his sanity, this peculiarity of organization should itself be thrown into the scales. I am not of that opinion. Exceptional facts are to me as authoritative proportionately as general ones. The laws that govern the eccentric flights of comets have equal force with those that regulate the entire planetary system.

Waldegrave was not ignorant of these jeers, nor altogether insensible to them; but they provoked no resentment in him, and even the pity they inspired reverted upon himself. He grieved he had so failed in making himself understood that his purposes and actions could be thus misconstrued. But neither the sense of failure, nor the certainty that every fresh effort must encounter the same scoffs, could abate his zeal, or cause him to deviate in the least from the course along which his enthusiasm impelled him. He had but a single object in view—to benefit his kind. His eagerness to accomplish this rendered him indifferent to all else, and he moved onward with the exalted spirit of one who cares not, so long as victory is gained, whether his own part be honor or martyrdom.

Our friendship extended through many years, during which I noticed no particular change in Waldegrave. At length, however, I could not fail to observe a difference in him. His form became wasted, his features careworn, and his ordinarily uniform demeanor gave way to spells of moody inertness and feverish activity. It was evident that his health was impaired, or that something unusual was brooding upon his mind. But he laughed at my solicitude, though with visible effort, and persistently maintained it was nothing but a slight derangement of his system from overwork. I was forced to accept the explanation. I knew he was engaged upon a work that was taxing the extreme powers of his intellect, and it was not unlikely that in prosecuting this too diligently in conjunction with his other labors he had overtasked himself.

One evening I was sitting in my study, thinking of my friend, whom I had not seen for several days, when a card was brought me bearing his name. I was surprised at this, for he was accustomed to enter without any such formality; but I was still more surprised when I read the words written in pencil underneath: "Would like an hour's interview with you if it can be absolutely private."

I shall never forget Waldegrave's appearance as he entered the room. The change in him was startling. His eyes were sunken, his cheeks hollow, his carriage drooping, and the old, beneficent, saintly look, that once lighted up his countenance with a holy beauty, was replaced by a haggard, haunted expression, befitting only the faces of the damned.

He never heeded my astonishment; he never heeded the hand I eagerly extended; he never heeded the affectionate words with which I welcomed him. Glancing anxiously about the room, he asked, in a whisper:

"Are we quite alone?"

"Entirely so."

"Is there no one in the next room?"

"There is no one else on this floor."

"I must feel certain of that," he said, opening in turn the two doors leading from the study, and peering cautiously into the adjoining apartments. The scrutiny satisfied him, apparently, for he closed the doors and locked them. Then he noticed that one of the transoms was open. He shut that also, remarking that even walls were said to have ears, and he wished to stop as many of them as possible.

I was unable to conjecture in the remotest degree what all these precautions meant. Nothing suggested itself—no topic we had ever discussed, none conceivable to be introduced between us—that called for privacy, much less for the absolute secrecy upon which his whole mind seemed concentrated. As I watched him during his inspection of the room, the stealth and intensity of his manner suddenly gave a new interpretation to his ghastly aspect. These were the symbols of a dethroned mind, these the actions of a lunatic, I thought; the ignorant many were right all the while; I alone had been deceived. The sorrow occasioned by this apparent revelation was poignant, and I dreaded the shock about to succeed, when his words should leave a doubt of his madness no longer tenable.

When every possible precaution had been taken, Waldegrave directed his attention to me for the first time. The strain visible upon him until then relaxed, his manner softened, and a helpless, pleading expression came into his eyes. He spoke in a low tone, husky with emotion:

"I have no right to pledge you to secrecy," he said; "I have no right to force my horrible confession upon you. I make it because the weight of my guilt has become unendurable; and I make it to-day because you have always been so indulgent to me that I believe you will be indulgent to the last, and because I can trust you beyond all other men."

This was not the kind of utterance I expected. The precision of its terms and the quietness of its delivery dispelled the supposition of insanity; but its hint of some terrible disclosure was equally distressing. I could conceive of nothing horrible in connection with Waldegrave; and could I have done so, no sense of moral outrage would have been able to withstand the sympathy excited by his appearance and manner. In my earnestness to express this feeling, I rose and extended my hand to him again, saying:

"You have not misjudged my friendship for you, Waldegrave. You may rely upon my sympathy, my secrecy, my assistance, to the utmost."

"I accept the assurance more gratefully than I ever before received anything in my life," he replied; "but withhold your hand. When you have heard what I am about to say, you will never proffer it to me again."

"Always as now, no matter what transpires," I answered, fervently, still insisting upon his taking my outstretched hand.

"Withhold it, I say!" he exclaimed, shrinking back affrightedly. "Do you wish to clasp the hand of a murderer?"

"You are jesting, Waldegrave."

"Would to God I were!—would to God I were! Do I look like a jester? You have been solicitous regarding the change in me. I have deceived you basely all along. My crime was attested by every symptom you observed—by the wreck you now see."

"This results solely from overtaking your brain; this is hallucination. You know as well as I do it is one of the commonest of maladies, and have only failed to recognize it because you yourself were the sufferer."

"I repeat, would to God it were!—would to God it were! But you deceive yourself. This is no phantasm, from which I shall some day awake with a buoyant sense of relief. It is natural that in your inability or reluctance to associate me with a hideous crime you should have recourse to the common belief in my madness. I have thought of it myself. I have reckoned, in the event of justice pursuing me, how securely I could entrench myself behind it, should I choose to do so. I have even become a partial convert to it—not that any action or utterance of mine appears to me less rational now than ever, but that it seems a sort of madness, as this world goes, to think or act otherwise than by rote. In this case, however, it is not my madness but my trespass that speaks. The burden of secret crime has become intolerable. I want to unbosom myself. There is more in confession than the delusive hope and promise of absolution. It subdues the bitter stubbornness of heart, relaxes the torturing constraint of silence, and brings the only rest and peace a guilty conscience can ever know. Will you listen to my confession?"

"I will listen with interest to anything you see fit to tell me, Waldegrave."

"The only motives for my crime were defiance of what I conceived to be senseless adages, and exasperation at their thoughtless reiteration. I lay particular stress upon the latter consideration, as I believe it to have been the chief provocation. Many a felon has let temptation to crime pass by him unheeded at first; but when it presented itself again and again, the recurrence became a provocation impossible to withstand. Repugnance to iteration is instinctive in human nature. The boy who wished his mother dead because he was tired of seeing her about, the man who voted for the banishment of Aristides because he was weary of hearing him called the Just, were not exceptionally splenetic; they simply gave expression, albeit in a whimsical way, to a sentiment as common to mankind as filial affection or love of justice. Within a certain limit repetition may be used with propriety, even with artistic effect; but if carried beyond the strict boundary, it becomes an exasperating repetend, an iteration that has been justly characterized as damnable. This is as true of what we admire as of what we detest. Something too much of the thing whose beauty enraptures us to-day, and to-morrow we consign it to oblivion, with the opprobrious epitaph of hackneyed and stale. The senselessness of the whole range of proverbial lore combined would never of itself have driven me to crime. It might have excited disgust, but it could hardly have aroused active defiance. But my passive antagonism was goaded to action by the satisfied manner with which brainless opponents endeavored to quench argument with some trite adage, as if any vital topic could be extinguished by a stale misconception. The thing occurred and recurred until I regarded everything in the shape of a proverb with intense hatred, and sought every opportunity to discredit their assumed wisdom. A statement of the sea of bubbles I pricked by one method or another would degenerate into a mere catalogue, and be irrelevant likewise, as my course was innocent until I grappled with the saying: 'Murder will out.'"

"When I first confronted it, I had no purpose of putting it to test. It was offensive to me, in common with all adages; but it was not offensively thrust at me, or exasperatingly reiterated within my hearing; I was therefore content for a while with an attitude of armed neutrality toward it. But a singular circumstance rendered the maintenance of such a position impossible. As if some malign spirit of iteration vitalized every apothegm, I was at length impelled irresistibly to repeat the adage to myself until my brain ached with the monotonous repetition. Every effort to banish it from my mind was useless; still the clatter would run on—'Murder will out,' 'Murder will out,' 'Murder will out.' Superstitious people would call this a premonition, or say that I was possessed by an evil spirit. You and I know it was an automatic action of the nerve-centres of the brain; but the unerring law of fatalism its consequences were the if it had been the hoding wail of uncommitted crime, or a demoniac voice inciting me to murder.

"The self-repeating sentence assumed to me at length the aspect of an exultant challenge. I presumed upon my forbearance. In a desperate moment I resolved to disprove the arrogant assumption, and thus make a final disposition of it so far as concerned myself. I never for an instant hesitated in my purpose after I had once determined upon it. My conscience did not interfere, either to restrain me from guilt or to plead in behalf of the innocent victim. The proceeding never presented itself to me in the light of a crime. I regarded it simply as an experiment, and thought no more of the life to be taken than I would of the life of an animal I was about to vivisect. My whole mind was bent upon gainsaying the proverb—or, in other words, committing a murder that should never be found out. I entered upon the project deliberately and methodically.

"The first point to be decided was how to do the deed. Naturally, my pursuits suggested that I should do it under the cloak of my profession, which, you are aware, could be managed easily enough; but I discarded the idea for two reasons: the experiment was personal, not professional, and should therefore be made outside of my calling; and, moreover, if the deed were done in the line of my practice, it would be indistinguishable from the common run of practical killing—hence, not a fair test case. I wanted an outright murder; not a mere professional one. The knowledge and weapons of my craft, however, entered into the plan I finally settled upon. I decided to commit the murder in some public place by injecting poison hypodermically into whatever subject I might select. This selection was a matter of serious consideration. My original impulse was to choose some one obnoxious to me, thereby rendering the killing of double utility; but such a course would introduce an element of malice into the affair, whereas I desired it to be purely experimental. Revenge should be alien to a calm, philosophic purpose. In order to prevent any bias from adulterating my motives, I determined to leave the matter of selection entirely to chance. The choice of a poison presented little trouble, as any one of a dozen or more could be made to serve. I decided upon using hydrocyanic acid, knowing that, if administered chemically pure, less than a drop would kill almost instantly, while there would be little likelihood of its odor being detected in the open air, and no possibility of a timely application of antidotes.

"When my plan was thus completely matured, I went forth to do the deed. The night was fine, and the streets were thronged with people. I had thought that opportunities to perform my experiment would present themselves on any of the principal thoroughfares; but, for the first time within my recollection, the city appeared to be ablaze with light, and I seemed to be an object of universal scrutiny. I strolled about for hours, with the hypodermic syringe carefully concealed in my hand, looking in vain for a chance to use it unobserved. The difficulty would not have been so great had I wished merely to kill a person and escape detection. With only that aim in view I could have prodded almost any one in the throng as I passed. But that was not all I was seeking to accomplish: I desired the cause of death and the fact of murder to escape detection as well. To insure this, I purposed injecting the poison in the scalp or chin, where the hair or beard would conceal even the slight puncture made by the instrument. Such an operation would necessitate a movement of the arm likely to attract attention on a crowded and well-lighted street.

"A man dropped his cane, and stooped just in front of me, to recover it. My hand was within an inch of his head when he suddenly sprang erect. A lady bent low to examine something in a window. The sharp point of the instrument caught in her hair as she rose quickly and turned away. After these two failures, I realized that it was next to impossible to find the opportunity sought without resorting to some obscure place, or mingling in a dense crowd.

"Just then I passed the entrance to a theatre. No better chance could have presented itself, I thought. I consulted my watch; the performance would be over in a quarter of an hour. I walked along leisurely for seven minutes, then turned and walked as leisurely back. When a few paces from the entrance I loitered until I heard the tramp of the outgoing audience. I then advanced, forced myself into the thickest of it, and was borne along with the stream as it surged down the street.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

At Chester, during Pennsylvania's recent Bi-centennial, says the New York Tribune, the neighbors divided among themselves the characters of the personages who figured in the old affair, and then repaired to the bank of the river. All of their families and friends went down to look on. Eight or ten shop-keepers, grocers, and bakers put on war-paint and feathers and peeped out of the woods, muttering Ugh! at intervals. A well-known farmer appeared as Penn in a boat, and a young druggist, painted copper-color, rose and said: "I am Bear's Meat. I am old. Here, Tamenend, chief of many years." Whereupon Tamenend (a dry goods man) said: "I, Tamenend of many years. The world rests on my turtle. It is enough," etc., etc. And all the grocers and bakers responded Ugh! while the people of Chester looked on gravely and saw nothing to laugh at in the matter. At Philadelphia the fun was more complicated. The Government sent men-of-war; fleets came from the northern ports, and ranged themselves in the Delaware; fifty steam-tugs went down to escort the Welcome up; and when the hour struck, behold, Penn was tipsy! There was an agonized search for somebody, no matter who, to come and land. Finally the eyes of the committee fell on the son of the costumer, who had brought a bundle of clothes down to the wharf. He was equipped in knee-breeches and shad-bellied coat, and when he stepped ashore was met by the Governor of the State and all the city dignitaries. As his foot touched the ground every bell in the city rang, cannon pealed, and a million sedate Pennsylvanians cracked their throats. And nobody saw anything funny in it. Italians or Frenchmen would have carried on the joke with a joyous, enthusiastic gayety that showed it was a joke and they knew it. Englishmen would not have done it at all. But the staid Pennsylvanians went through it as gravely as if it had been serious exercises. It was a most unexpected and astounding revelation of character.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

England does substantial pecuniary reward to those who render her distinguished services in battle. After the Ashantee war Sir Garnet Wolseley had a parliamentary grant of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars. After Waterloo the grants to Wellington amounted to three million five hundred thousand dollars; Nelson, nearly one million.

The following correspondence between a New York newspaper man resident in Brooklyn and Reverend Henry Ward Beecher, apropos of the sermon denouncing Folger's candidacy, is published:

DEAR MR. BEECHER: You made an ass of yourself yesterday.

DEAR SIR: The Lord saved you the trouble of making an ass of yourself by making you an ass at the beginning, and "His work stands sure." H. W. BEECHER.

Mr. William H. Whitman, clerk of the courts for Plymouth County, Massachusetts, says the Boston Gazette, has received the requisite legal notice through counsel in the cases of Rosetta Nightingale, Cynthia Cahoon, and Stanton Fisher, of the discontinuance of their suits against A. Williams & Co., for publishing "Cape Cod Folks," and they will be removed from the docket of the court. The suit of Adeline A. Fisher expired with the death of the plaintiff, and public curiosity will not be gratified by witnessing a trial of these famous cases.

Mr. Tohy Rosenthal, the artist in whom San Francisco takes a just pride, has nearly finished a picture for a gentleman of this city. Its subject is taken from Scott's "Marmion," representing the scene when Constance de Beverly, in her page's dress, is taken before the tribunal of the convent. The abbot and the abbesses stand at the left with unrelenting faces. The unfortunate girl stands in the centre foreground. A brutal monk is tearing from her shoulders a cloak, while a mass of golden hair streams over her shoulders. In the right background the monks are preparing the opening in the wall for her immolation. They hold torches in their hands, which spread a ruddy glare over the dull stone of the convent walls. The picture has been much praised by the critics.

In his book about the Turco-Russian war, Lieutenant Greene tells of the coldness of the Russians toward him whenever he was mistaken for a British officer, and how completely their treatment changed as soon as they found out he was an American. Indeed, their attentions were so marked as to prove rather embarrassing, since on some occasions they insisted on sacrificing their own comfort and convenience to his. The testimony of Engineer Melville is to the same effect. In conversation with a reporter the other day, he spoke highly of his treatment by the Russian authorities, saying that even the lower officials distinguished themselves by their courtesy and refinement. The feeling for Americans among the Russian lower classes seemed to be very warm and far different to that entertained toward the English.

It is understood, says an Indiana journal, that the events in the closing chapters of W. D. Howells's last novel, "A Modern Instance," took place in one of our neighboring cities. The Tecumseh of the novel is Crawfordsville. The plot of "A Modern Instance," so far as it can be, in the divorce scene, is from actual study. Mr. Howells visited Crawfordsville last summer, and spent several weeks there in studying the city, the court, and the Indiana divorce system. Augustus H. Hawkins, the county clerk in the fiction, is Mr. T. D. Brown, uncle of Miss Mary H. Krout, and present clerk of Montgomery. The judge of the book is Judge Britton, now on the bench in that county. We think the paper in which the divorce advertisement was printed must not have been of Crawfordsville, as Mr. Howells refers to it as "a flimsy, shabbily printed country newspaper." There is a study of the Crawfordsville bar in the closing chapters of this remarkable novel, said to be quite realistic.

Two poverty-stricken young Irish noblemen have recently done well in matrimony. The Earl of Desart was living from hand to mouth in London, making his subsistence by story-writing. Not long ago he stepped into a fortune of three hundred thousand pounds by marrying Miss Bischoffsheim, daughter of an old London Jew money-lender. And now comes the news that Sir Maurice Fitzgerald, Bart., hereditary Knight of Kerry, and equerry to H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught, has just married the other Miss Bischoffsheim. Glanleam, in the island of Valencia, is the family residence of the Fitzgerald family; and a most isolated place it is. But Sir Maurice will build on his estate at Ballinruddery with some of his bride's dowry. The place is well wooded, and known to gunners as a capital place for woodcocks. It is well for young Fitzgerald that he has acquired this fortune, for the Valencia estates have been laboring under heavy mortgages for nearly a century. Five years ago, when Sir Maurice's sister was married off, the estates were denuded of half the trees, in order to meet her settlements.

The New York Times's Egyptian correspondent relates a curious story of how a young Baltimorean, George Tinney, was made a Bey with a present of five thousand dollars. Said Pasha lay at the point of death. His successor was to be Ismail (the present Khedive's predecessor). The custom is that the messenger first announcing to the new Pasha the news of his predecessor's death shall be made Bey, and receive one hundred thousand piastres. A man by the name of Thomas owned the only telegraph line then running from Alexandria (where Said lay dying) to Cairo, the home of Ismail. Thomas was at the Cairo station awaiting the death announcement which should give him the coveted prize. Growing sleepy, he told Tinney, the operator, to awaken him at the first telegraphic click. But Tinney had plans of his own, and so, when the expected dispatch came, he did not awaken his sleeping employer, but rushed off to Ismail's palace himself, where, after a short wait, he gained admittance to the august presence, and made known his secret. The new Pasha's first question was, "What is your name?" and, quickly learning, exclaimed: "Tinney Bey, I thank you much; here is an order for one hundred thousand piastres, and the irade, naming you bey, will be the first I sign."

Good Manners and Household Decoration.

Rag carpets are coming into fashion again in the shape of large rugs for bed-rooms and nurseries, and the man whose under-clothes have been butchered to make a rag-carpet holiday is hunting for a warm place where he can escape the balmy breath of November.

A host should always anticipate the wants of his guests and never compel them to ask for what they desire. It is not only annoying to the guest, but to others, to stand up at the table and spear a hot potato with the fork, or to carve the pie with his own knife.

When an engagement is broken the ring and all the presents should be returned to the gentleman. They can then be used again by him on subsequent occasions, and the masher will thus be able to continue his business without additional capital.

After luncheon tea and coffee are never served in the drawing-room, as the guests are not expected to remain long, for the hostess may wish to go out. Nothing can be more annoying than the hungry, longing look of a guest after luncheon, who still yearns for provisions not in the house.

Answers to Correspondents.

LOUISE.—Who was Blackstone?

Mr. Blackstone was a man who flourished several years ago, and wrote a little work on English law and primogeniture, salvage, replevin plea in abatement, ouster, onus probandi,oyer and terminer, and other evils of his time. He would go out and weed onions an hour or two, and then come in and swear a few lines; after which he would dash off a poem on the habes corpus, the non-suit, misjoinder, chattel mortgage, mayhem, misfeasance, or other beauties of nature. He was perfectly at home while dealing with messages, mesne process, torts, mandamus, and high certiorari. Blackstone has been more largely read and quoted, perhaps, than any other humorist in the English language. His favorite joke was called the rule in Shelley's case, and he loved to monkey with the lex non scripta and assumption. Blackstone is now dead. His parents also are dead. They were cut down in their youth.

LOTUS EATER.—About the time of our war with Mexico, you published an account of a duel which took place at Gibraltar, soon after the close of our last war with England (1842-43), between one of our officers (a lieutenant) and two British officers, then stationed at that place. The article was apparently written by the American's second, who was represented as the captain of the brig Monmouth, of Baltimore, and who closed his statement by saying that the lieutenant was at that time (1847 or 1848) an officer in the United States Navy, high in command and stationed off the coast of Mexico. Will you please republish that article again and very much oblige an old reader?

We would gladly republish it again, and then republish the poem again some more, if we had it, but we have not. We were not publishing the Boomerang during the Mexican war. We would have done so if we had been born, but we were not. This was no fault of ours. It was an unavoidable delay for which we were not responsible.

INQUIRER.—Will you be so kind as to inform me how the ancients represented Nemesis in their mythology?

Nemesis, in Grecian mythology, was the goddess of night. She worked the doubtful precincts in the interest of the enemies of human happiness. She disturbed the conscience, and by means of the goddess Nightmare, contrived to make it unpleasant for those who strayed into hy and forbidden paths. She was particularly worshiped by Rhamus, Patrae, Cyclicus, Lucretia Borgia, and other old-timers. She is usually represented as a virgin, standing in a thoughtful attitude and low shoes, holding in her left hand the branch of an elm tree, and in her right a link of bologna sausage.

D. C. W.—I. Will you please decide the following questions in your next issue, and oblige a constant reader. A and B are playing a game of casino, 21 points up. A stands 20; B, 13. It is B's deal. He deals the cards, and on the first hand played A makes an ace, and calls game. B insists on A playing the game out, which he objects to, as B is only 13, and if he made the cards, spades, and big and little casino, he would then be only twenty, and obliged to make an ace to make 21. Is A or B right? II. And again, if there should be two 20's in the game, is not the one who makes the first point and calls game?—or have you got to play the game out and give the cards precedence?

We do not know exactly how it would be; and as our casino editor is at present away from home working in a tie-camp, we would prefer to lay the question over till another meeting.

RAOUL.—Please inform me concerning the tradition of St. Denys.

St. Denys, after martyrdom, carried his head six miles, and laid it down at the spot where the cathedral now stands which bears his name. As soon as he had done so he fainted from loss of blood, and afterward expired. This choice and popular lie originated from the fact that the artist who painted St. Denys represented him as headless, and then, remembering that the friends of deceased would not easily recognize him, painted the head in the hands of St. Denys.—Boomerang.

Labouchere says that France is now one gigantic gambling establishment. At Paris, every one, from the fine lady to the cabman, speculates at the Bourse, and in every French town of any pretensions to "civilization" there are one or more public casinos, which derive large dividends from allowing the game of baccarat to be played. "Now, for my part," he says, "I hold that, a fool and his money being made to part, it signifies very little to the State whether money be in the pocket of fool A or fool B—or, indeed, for the matter of that, of swindler C. But I would point out to the British traveler in France that, if he risks his cash at haccarat, it is about fifty to one that he will be cheated. Any one may hold the bank, and there are numerous gangs organized for this purpose. One of the gang holds it and deals the cards, while another of the gang makes a sign to him, to let him know the exact value of the cards given to the players. With this advantage, it is not, perhaps, surprising that the gang should win, and that the unsuspecting traveler should lose."

Palmistry is very fashionable in London society with young women. It must be pleasant to sit in the gloaming and have a beautiful girl hold your hand in hers and tell you all about your past, present, and future, and all that sort of thing. Pleasant for the girl, we mean.

LONDON LORDS AND LADIES.

A Chronicle about Pheasant-shooting and the Professional Beauties.

October is, par excellence, England's pheasant-shooting month. The season begins on the first of the month and lasts till the first of February: but while, of course, shooting goes on through November, December, and January, and pheasant, as a game, is a regular thing to be seen both in Leadenhall Market and on the tables of country estate-owners and their friends, who get a hamper sent them now and then, the edge is taken off the sport when November arrives, by which time the birds who have survived the slaughter of the first four weeks have grown sufficiently wild to make their attempted bagging a matter of more exertion than the average English sportsman of the present day cares to subject himself to. Then again, with November's initial days comes fox-hunting, and once the weekly "fixtures"—as the appointed days for hunting are called—are settled by the M. F. H.'s of the different packs of hounds within reach, shooting of any sort becomes a sport of secondary consideration, only to be indulged in as a means of recreation, in a sort of desultory fashion, when there is nothing else to do. So the early days of October mark the return to his English home of more than one absentee, to whom the potting of grouse on the Scotch moors has grown stale, the excitement of Aix-les-Bains become a bore, or to whom the delights of grouse or partridge-shooting were insufficient attractions to lure him back sooner to his native land.

Pheasants are shot in covers, and the sport is called "cover-shooting" in contradistinction to partridge-shooting, which is done out in the open. A clump of trees, high bushes, or timber capable of affording the requisite "cover," is surrounded by the shooting party, numbering from two or three up to a dozen or more. Then "beaters" are sent in to beat the bushes with sticks and frighten the birds, which fly out singly or in twos and threes, and are shot (or shot at) by the party without. Cock pheasants, only, are shot, except toward the end of the season, when the scarcity of the male birds renders the sparing of the hens no longer advisable. When a bird is seen to fly from the cover, whoever sees it, should it not come within range of his own gun, calls out to those of the party in whose direction it flies, to warn them, thus: "Mark cock to the right!" "Mark cock to the left!" "Mark forward!" etc. As the shooting party are stationed at equal intervals from each other round the cover, their distance apart is often very slight when the circuit of the cover is small and the party large, as is most frequently the case. The customary injunction to "fire high" is therefore a most necessary precaution. It is one, however, not as carefully observed as it ought to be, and when the birds come out with a rush, as they sometimes do, and there follows a banging on every side and a whistling of shot all about one, there is a painful sensation of insecurity to life and limb not unlike that experienced in action when the line of fire is reached in a charge, except that one doesn't feel quite the same exhilaration from the thought that if one is hit he will be looked upon as a hero.

Accidents from careless and flurried shooting at such times are by no means of rare occurrence in England. Lord Powerscourt not long ago lost one of his eyes at the hands of an excitable young Nimrod, whose anxiety to bring down a bird flying below the safety line caused him to blaze away straight into his lordship's face. Happily the aim was a bad one, or the effects might have been even more disastrous. The Earl of Dunmore, whose frequent voyages back and forth between Liverpool and New York, and journeys overland to Colorado, where he has large cattle interests, have made him almost as well known in America as at home, has also had an eye injured, if not destroyed, in the same way: and only the other day Sir Hervey Bruce was shot in the face, luckily without injury to his sight.

There is a good story told of the Marquis of Waterford (Lord Charles Beresford's uncle) and the way he served a young fellow, whose indifference to the lives and limbs of other people when out shooting with them had gained for him somewhat of a reputation. The young man, though he ought to have been deprived of his gun license by special act of Parliament, was the son of a duke of such high standing in the political world that nobody ventured more than a mild remonstrance with him for his carelessness, and while few cared to join a shooting party of which he made one, his position got him invited where men of more caution, but less blood, would have been excluded. It so happened that one October both the Marquis and Lord Joceline Clinton—the young man in question—found themselves staying for the shooting at Wolterton Park, Lord Orford's place in Norfolk. There was a large party staying at the house, and more than one fortuitous escape from Lord Joceline's reckless gun was the nightly topic over brandy, and soda, and birdseye in the smoking-room. Several of the men had already been grazed on one or two occasions by shots fired at close quarters, and one who had been his nearest neighbor one morning had had one of his whiskers and eyebrows singed off by a flash from a muzzle heedlessly placed within an inch of his cheek. Lord Joceline paid small heed to the remarks he heard, and laughingly treated all that was said as a joke. But Lord Waterford smoked his pipe in silence, only joining in the talk so far as to confide to a friend who sat near his determination to put an end to the young man's exploits should it come in his way to do so. It is said that Lord Joceline overheard the remark, but said nothing. At all events, next day the party went out as usual, and as chance would have it, when shooting an outlying cover, Lord Waterford and Lord Joceline stood about ten feet apart. In the midst of an exciting battue a rabbit darted out of the bushes and ran between the two. Lord Joceline, disregarding all orders to the contrary, leveled and fired at it. The rabbit got safely away, but about a dozen of the shot intended for it lodged in Lord Waterford's legs. His hack happened to be turned at the moment, but wheeling round without a sign of pain ere the reverberation of the discharge had died away, he called out, in a loud tone: "Whoever fired that last shot, hold up his hand!" Lord Joceline, in the bravado of the moment, held up his hand with a laugh. Hardly had he done so when Lord Waterford raised his gun and let him have the contents of one barrel into his palm. Fortunately it was a defective cartridge, from which much of the shot had fallen, else it would have been a bad day for Lord Joceline. As it was, he carried away enough leaden pellets among his finger joints to make a sadder and a wiser man of him, and cure him effectively of the peculiarity that had made him a terror in the shooting field. No one after that had ever cause of complaint against him.

Now that Mrs. Langtry is gone, the other professional beauties of less note, who had to play second to her in the beauty line while she remained in England, have begun to plume their heretofore overshadowed feathers, and are coming to the rescue of the poor photographers who have been obliged to surrender the Jersey Lily to Sarony of New York. It is curious to notice how the windows of the print-shops are huddling forth with photographs of Lady Lonsdale, Lady Garvagh, Mrs. Livingston-Thompson, Mrs. Cornwallis-West, and Mrs. Wheeler. Lady Dudley seems to be getting too passé to resuscitate. A few years ago, however, she was unquestionably the bandswoman woman in England; but now—well, a woman's beauty can't last forever. Luckily for her, her position does not depend on her looks, like the others. Her husband, the Earl of Dudley, though as plain a looking man as you would meet in a day's walk, is one of the richest noblemen in the kingdom, and the combined forces of rank and money which she has on her side have enabled her to do what none of the others would have dared. Unlike the others, she has ever spurned the notice and attention of the Prince of Wales, going so far as to refuse to speak to him. Indeed, she has been known on more than one occasion to deliberately turn her back upon him at a ball. She is a sister of the unfortunate Lady Mordaunt, which tells the whole story.

Mrs. Cornwallis-West has generally, in a popular sense, counted number two after Mrs. Langtry. Some people there are who think her the prettier of the two. But her figure, though undoubtedly a fine one, does not approach that of the Jersey Lily, and her face at public entertainments is too elaborately embellished with bismuth and rouge to allow it a moment's place of comparison beside the purely natural, untouched-by-art complexion of Mrs. Langtry. I was at a country hall last winter down near Henley, and late in the evening a large party arrived from some house in the neighborhood where they were staying. Among them was Mrs. Cornwallis-West. Strange as it may appear, I had never seen her before. But until I was told which she was, I had supposed it was some opera-bouffe actress who had got into the place by mistake, she was so painted and powdered over cheek, arms, and neck; her eyes were so picked out with belladonna, her corsage was so décolleté, her voice was so loud and boisterous, and her poses and gestures had such a decided smack of the heroines of Offenbach and Le Cocq. On her bodice just over her heart she wore a large gold padlock. This, she informed several young men who inquired its meaning, was the lock to the entrance of her love, adding, with a glance worthy of Schneider in her best days, that even her husband had not the key. Major Cornwallis-West, the man who occupies that unenviable position, is a gentleman of considerable private means, arising from large landed and mineral interests in Wales. In favorable comparison with Mr. Langtry he goes about with his wife, and their names are frequently mentioned together. In short, he does not believe in chaperones.

Of another type altogether is Lady Lonsdale, or Gladys, Countess of Lonsdale, as the death of her husband, and the consequent step down to dowagerhood, now compels her to be called. Tall, dark, and stately, she has been known in society since her debut, in 1877, as "the gypsy." A penniless beauty she was when she came out, even though her brother was the Earl of Pembroke, and her mother Lady Herbert of Lea, so that within a year she was only too glad, when but eighteen, to take as her husband the young Earl of Lonsdale, who, though scarce four years older than herself, was looked upon as one of the most famous reprobates the English peerage had produced. A great, lubberly, heavy-featured fellow he was—an animal, in fact, whose sensual tastes first exhibited themselves in a secret, but unhiding, marriage with his tutor's housemaid before he was seventeen; his proneness to the inordinate use of alcohol also showing itself in numerous fits of délirium tremens ere he had got out of his teens. But he was the possessor of a hundred and sixty thousand a year, and estates so vast that even his reckless extravagance and dissipation had not appreciably diminished them. Once she was married, the gypsy-like beauty did pretty well as she liked—her flirtations, while yet a bride, with several titled young guardsmen, who have lately seen service in Egypt, causing more than one scandal in high life. She was away somewhere abroad during her husband's last illness, and had actually to be summoned home to be present at his death-bed.

As a widow, she does not appear to have altered in the least. She has a house down near Windsor, at which she now and then entertains the Prince of Wales, she and the late earl having always been prominent members of the Prince's set. She has a jointure of six thousand a year, besides the control of what was settled on her three-year-old daughter; so she doesn't want for money to do whatever she likes. She is to be one of the party who are going with Lord Charles Beresford and his wife for a tour through India. Of course, it is her rank that smooths over whatever she may do. But were she a plain "Mrs." with no blood in her veins traceable through the labyrinthine pages of Burke and De Brett, it would be all the other way.

COCKAIGNE.

A watch nowadays is not so much for use as for ornament. It must be of the tiniest, and balanced by a chatelaine as elaborate in workmanship as an exquisite piece of jewelry. The little oxidized silver watches are fascinating, but the prettiest "ticker" to be worn for a "charm" is no bigger than a checker, with a spray of leaves and acorns in diamonds raised on a plain gold surface. On the chatelaine dangles a minute gold acorn, incrustured with brilliants, and containing "salts," besides other toys fashioned in precious stones and metals.

Nuna Dunlop, a Kentucky blue-grass belle, has aroused comment by going to Evansville, Ind., and appearing as Hebe in a beer-garden performance of "Pinafore." Shedid it for fun, agreeing to sing for a week without salary; but her family took her home at the end of the second evening.

ANONYMITY IN LITERATURE.

John Morley's Valedictory in the "Fortnightly Review."

One chief experiment which the Fortnightly Review was established to try was that of signed articles. It is now impossible to realize that only fifteen or sixteen years ago scarcely anybody of the class called practical could believe that the sacred principle of the Anonymous was doomed. One of the shrewdest publishers in Edinburgh once said to me, while Mr. Lewes was still the editor of the Review, that he had always thought highly of our friend's judgment, "until he had taken up the senseless notion of a magazine with signed articles, and open to both sides of every question." Nobody will call the notion senseless any longer. The question is rather how long the exclusively anonymous periodicals will be able to resist the innovation. One indirect effect that is not unworthy of notice in the new system is its tendency to narrow the openings for the writer by profession. If an article is to be signed, the editor will naturally seek the name of an expert of special weight and competence on the matter in hand. A reviewer on the staff of a famous journal once received for his week's task, "General Hamley on the Art of War," a three-volume novel, a work on dainty dishes, and a translation of Pindar. This was, perhaps, taxing versatility and omniscience over-much, and it may be taken for granted that the writer made no serious contribution to tactics, cookery, or scholarship. But being a man of a certain intelligence, passably honest, and reasonably painstaking, probably he produced reviews sufficiently useful and just to answer their purpose. On the new system we should have an article on General Hamley's work by Sir Garnet Wolseley, and one on the cookery-book from Monsieur Trompette. It is not certain that this is all pure gain. There is a something to be said for the writer by profession, who, without being an expert, will take trouble to work up his subject, to learn what is said and thought about it, to penetrate to the real points, to get the same mastery over it as an advocate or a judge does over a patent case or a suit about rubrics and vestments. He is at least as likely as the expert to tell the reader all that he wants to know, and at least as likely to be free from bias and injurious prepossession. Nor does experience, so far as it has yet gone, quite bear out Mr. Lewes's train of argument that the "first condition of all writing is sincerity, and that one means of securing sincerity is to insist on personal responsibility," and that this personal responsibility can only be secured by signing articles. The old talk of "literary braves," "men in masks," "anonymous assassins," and so forth, is out of date. Longer experience has only confirmed the present writer's opinion, expressed herefrom the very beginning: "Everybody who knows the composition of any respectable journal in London, knows very well that the articles which those of our own way of thinking dislike most intensely are written by men whom to call braves in any sense whatever would be simply monstrous. Let us say, as loudly as we choose, if we see good reason, that they are half informed about some of the things which they so authoritatively discuss; that they are under strong class feeling; that they have not mastered the doctrines which they are opposing; that they have not sufficiently meditated their subject; that they have not given themselves time to do justice even to their scanty knowledge. Journalists are to open to charges of this kind; but to think of them as a shameless body, thirsting for the blood of better men than themselves, or ready to act as an editor's instrument for money, involves a thoroughly unjust misconception." As to the comparative effects of the two systems on literary quality, no prudent observer with adequate experience will lay down an unalterable rule. Habit no doubt counts for a great deal, but apart from habit there are differences of temperament and peculiar sensibilities. Some men write best when they sign what they write; they find impersonality a mystification and an incumbrance; anonymity makes them stiff, pompous, and over-magisterial. With others, however, the effect is just the reverse. If they sign they become self-conscious, stilted, and even pretentious; it is only when they are anonymous that they recover simplicity and ease. The newspaper press has not yet followed the example of the new reviews, but we are probably not far from the time when here, too, the practice of signature will make its way. There was an unwise cry at one time for making the disuse of anonymity compulsory by law. But we shall no more see this than we shall see legal penalties imposed for publishing a hook without an index, though that also has been suggested. The same end will be reached by other ways. The press is more and more taking the tone of a man speaking to a man. The childish imposture of the editorial We is already thoroughly exploded. The names of all important journalists are now coming to be as publicly known as the names of important members of parliament. There is even something over and above this. More than one editor—the editors of the Spectator and of the St. James's Gazette are conspicuous instances, in very different ways—have boldly aspired to create and educate a public of their own, and they have succeeded. The press is growing to be much more personal, in the sense that its most important directors are taking to themselves the right of pursuing an individual line of their own, with far less respect than of old to the supposed exigencies of party or the communiqués of political leaders. The editor of a review of great eminence said to the present writer (who, for his own part, took a slightly more modest view) that he regarded himself as equal in importance to twenty-five members of Parliament. It is not altogether easy to weigh and measure with this degree of precision. But what is certain is that there are journalists on both sides in politics to whom the public looks for original suggestion, and from whom leading politicians seek not merely such mechanical support as they expect from their adherents in the House of Commons, nor merely the use of the vane to show which way the wind blows, but ideas, guidance, and counsel, as from persons of coequal authority with themselves. England is still a long way from the point at which French journalism has arrived in this matter. We can not count an effective host of Girardins, Lemoignes, Abouts, or even Cassagnacs and Rocheforts, each recognized as the exponent of his own opinions, and each read because the opinions were known to be his own. But there is a distinctly new approach to this than there was twenty years ago.

SOCIETY.

The Johnson-Williams Wedding.

On Thursday morning Frank H. Johnson, of San Francisco, was married to Miss Mary B. Williams, daughter of General Thomas H. Williams, of Oakland. The wedding ceremony was solemnized by the Rev. Benjamin Akerly, at the residence of the bride's father, in the presence of a few friends of the contracting parties. Miss Ella Barstow acted as bridesmaid, and Carleton Coleman as groomsmen. The presents included a check for ten thousand dollars and a house and lot in San Francisco from General Williams; a check for five thousand dollars from William T. Coleman; a valuable silver tea-set from the employees of William T. Coleman & Son, to which body the bridegroom belongs. After the wedding ceremony and breakfast the newly married pair started for a trip to southern California. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Bexler, Judge Williams, of Placerville, Mr. and Mrs. Locke, Miss Maggie Brooks, Mr. and Miss Wallace, Thomas Prather, Miss Eva Bascom, Miss Effie Hogan, and others.

Reception at the Navy Yard.

The officers and ladies of the Navy Yard gave a reception on Thursday evening last to the officers of the Wachusett, which proved to be a very agreeable affair, although there were but few people from San Francisco present. Dancing took place in the court-room, and was kept up until nearly two o'clock yesterday morning. A large number of the officers of the Wachusett and all of the officers and ladies of the yard were present, and Misses Kitty Wood and Georgie Richards, of San Francisco.

Notes and Gossip.

Governor and Mrs. Stanford went East on Thursday last. An engagement exists between Miss Libbie Irish, of this city, and an army officer who is now on duty in Arizona; Miss Irish is at present visiting a former schoolmate, Mrs. Colonel Dunkelberger, at Los Angeles. The next Literary at the Navy Yard will take place at the residence of Commander and Mrs. Boyd. Miss Birmingham, who has been visiting Mrs. Wolcott, wife of Chief-Engineer Wolcott, at Mare Island, has returned. Miss Allie Hawes, who has been visiting Mrs. Lieutenant Richmond, at Mare Island, has also returned. Mrs. James Carolan and her daughter, Miss Eva Carolan, returned from the East on Monday last. Miss Sprague, who has been visiting at the Navy Yard for several weeks, has returned to Angel Island. Paymaster C. A. McDaniel and Lieutenant A. C. Dillingham, U. S. N., and Mrs. Dillingham, left here for the East during the week. An engagement exists between Mr. Harry W. Brown and Miss Minnie Glassell, both of Los Angeles. Miss Glassell is a granddaughter of the late Doctor Toland, and Mr. Brown is a brother of the Brown who was married to Miss Emma Cole a few months ago; another brother, Tom Brown, District-Attorney of Los Angeles County, some time ago married Miss Nellie Patten, whose father, a brigadier-general in the Confederate army, was killed at Gettysburg; Miss Lulu Cole, a sister of Mrs. Brown, (nee Cole), is engaged to Master H. S. Waring, U. S. N.; a sister of Miss Minnie Glassell, Miss Lulu, was married to Major H. M. Mitchell, an ex-Confederate, a short time ago; Mrs. Patten, widow of the ex-Confederate General mentioned above, was married some years ago to George H. Smith, an ex-Confederate colonel, and now reporter of the Supreme Court; all of the above-named parties reside in Los Angeles at present, except Master Waring, who is willing to—for a while. Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Holmes and Mrs. R. M. McKenzie have been at Monterey for a few days. The Ranger sailed on Saturday last for the southern coast, Captain Philip being accompanied by his wife; Lieutenant C. T. Force is executive officer, and his mess consists of thirteen. Twice before the officers' mess on the Ranger has consisted of thirteen, and upon each occasion the vessel lost one of the thirteen—Surgeon Ware in 1878, and Paymaster Clarke in 1879; it is to be hoped, however, that all of the present thirteen may successfully dare the demon of that superstitious number, not only for their own sakes, but for the sakes of the girls they left behind them. Captain Augustus H. Corliss, U. S. A., has returned to Nevada. Mrs. Lieutenant Seth M. Ackley and Miss Cash, who lately arrived here on their return home from the Asiatic squadron, will leave for Massachusetts to-day. Rev. and Mrs. John Heniphill will leave San Francisco for Philadelphia on or about the first of January; in the meantime they have taken apartments at the Grand. Mrs. General W. H. L. Barnes returned from Cambridge, Massachusetts, during the week. Mr. and Mrs. Loomis and their pretty niece, Miss Katie Felton, who have been summering at Menlo, have returned to their winter quarters at the Palace. I. W. Taber and family, of Oakland, have also taken up their residence at the Palace for the winter. Evan J. Coleman and Eugene Dewey are at the Hoffman House, New York. Miss Kyland, of San José, is again visiting friends in this city. Chief Engineer James Butterworth, U. S. N., was at the Grand on Saturday and Sunday last, and Midshipman Harry Kimmel, Lieutenant-Commander George E. Ide, and Midshipman George H. Stafford, U. S. N., were at the Occidental. Mrs. Amarat and family have gone to Los Angeles to spend the winter. Mrs. T. D. Mott and daughter, Miss George Mott, of Los Angeles, are visiting the family of Mr. and Mrs. W. W. Stow. Charles F. MacDermott and family will leave their lovely home in Oakland on the first Monday in December, and take up their residence at the Palace for the winter. Assistant-Surgeon Clement Biddle, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Thursday last. Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Pool returned from Monterey on Saturday last. Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittle and Miss Bessie Kittle have been passing a portion of the week at Monterey. Lieutenant John T. Young, U. S. Marine Corps, arrived here from the East yesterday. General and Mrs. Kautz were in the city on Monday and Tuesday last. Captain George H. Burton, Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., and Mrs. Burton and children, have been at the Occidental during the week; Mrs. Burton was formerly Miss Minnie Larabee, of Los Angeles. E. Hubert and P. L. Bonnest, U. S. A., and Mrs. Bonnest are at the Occidental. Lieutenant George R. Bensen, of the Marine Corps, is at the Grand. Mrs. Cozzens, Mrs. Alston, and Mrs. Burdell and daughter, of San Rafael, have been passing the week at Monterey. Most readers of the Argonaut will remember the two Misses Hutchinson, of Washington, who participated in the first carnival as priestesses in the Temple of Flora, and quite a number of our society people are aware of the marriage of one of the sisters a little more than a year ago; the other sister will be married to Mr. John F. Olmstead in Washington during the latter part of November, and Senator Miller and family will leave for that city to-day to be present at the wedding. During the latter part of this month Mr. W. C. Price and Miss Hattie Smoot, daughter of Colonel D. L. Smoot, will be married. An engagement is said to exist between Mr. John R. Hamilton and Miss Lulu Prescott, Samuel Bowles Jr. is visiting San Francisco; his father visited California about seventeen years ago in company with Richardson, Bross, and Colfax, and on his return to Massachusetts wrote a very agreeable book about California and the overland trip by stage-coach. Messrs. Langhorne, Coleman, and others are planning for a number of Germans at Saratoga Hall, which will be very select, so it is claimed, and be given between the fifteenth instant and the twenty-fourth ultimo. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, and their son and daughter, have arrived in New York. Lady Waterlow, accompanied by her husband, Sir Sidney, and his brother, passed most of October in Paris. Mr. and Mrs. G. E. Raum, who have been sight-seeing in Switzerland, have left Geneva for Paris. Mrs. Colonel Edly and her daughter, who have been in Madrid and Seville for some three or four weeks, will soon leave for Rome. The next social of the Olympic Club will take place on Friday evening, the seventeenth instant. On the following day, Saturday next, the eighteenth instant, the Pacific Yacht Club will give their closing of the season reception, dancing to take place at the club-house Saucillo between the hours of two and five o'clock. Mrs. E. S.

Pillsbury, Mrs. Judge Sanderson, and Mrs. J. H. Maynard, of San Francisco, and Mrs. J. M. Page, of Oakland, were in Paris during the latter part of October. Commodore Robert W. Shufeldt, whose health was greatly improved during his sojourn at Santa Barbara, has arrived in Washington and been placed on duty there. Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Crocker, after an extended Eastern trip, returned home on Saturday last. Miss Carrie Williams, of Sacramento, is visiting in this city. Mrs. Thomas Selby and her two daughters left here for Cambridge, Mass., on Monday last, and may remain away for a year or more. Lieutenant Thomas N. Wood, U. S. N., and bride, who were lately married in Washington, have arrived in this city. Mrs. William M. Stewart is visiting her sister at Alexandria, Va., and daily goes to Washington to look after the work of restoration, which is now progressing upon her handsome house, which sustained great injury from fire about four years ago. On the evening of the first instant, at the house of Charles H. Currier, Esq., his daughter, Miss Nettie, was united in marriage to Mr. Edward E. Eitel. The young pair immediately after started on a bridal trip to the country. Miss Jeannette Reynolds gave a dinner-party to twenty of her young lady and gentlemen friends last Thursday afternoon. It was modeled after the Persian custom of having a string band in an adjoining apartment discourse strains of music during the dinner. At the close of the repast dancing ensued and was continued till a late hour. General Schofield was the recipient of a serenade at the Palace Hotel on Thursday evening last. Mrs. James W. Simonton leaves here for the East to-day. Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Baker, who are now at the Palace, hope to get into their new home in a short time. Mr. Isaac Newton Kaye, and Mrs. Jennie Harrison, of Alameda, were married at the residence of Mr. Hughes, in Alameda, on the evening of the seventh instant.

CORRESPONDENCE.

EDITOR ARGONAUT: Mrs. Leland Stanford has just sent a check for five hundred dollars to Mrs. Sarah B. Cooper, the Superintendent of the Jackson-street Kindergarten Association. This, with former donations, makes the handsome sum of nine hundred and forty dollars given to this work since its organization. Mrs. Stanford has visited these schools and personally observed their workings, distributing with her own hands gifts to the little children, and speaking kind words of cheer to the hard-worked teachers. This is practical benevolence. This is benevolence in the right direction. To train little children to self-dependence and self-support is the best mode of applying charity. The kindergarten is the nursery of industry, and persistent industry is the ordained foe of pauperism and crime. It is the business of Christianity to train up little children into ways of virtue and right action. When the "lights" of the church seek to tear down such efforts it makes one feel like exclaiming, in the language of an excited philanthropist: "We have had 'lights' enough in the church; for Heaven's sake, let us have a few 'livers'." One such act as this of the generous-hearted lady, who gives her thousand dollars to train little children in good manners and right living, is worth all the whining prayers of a lifetime, put up by those who would pull down every good work that has not a sectarian seal upon it. A KINDERGARTEN TEACHER.

A Small Vineyard.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: While passing through Merced County in the month of October, in company with a friend, we called at the ranch of Mr. Worthington, on the line of the San Joaquin and King's River Canal, between Los Baños and Firebaugh's Ferry, and near the "Canal Farm" of Messrs. Miller & Lux, where we saw a small vineyard which produced such an enormous quantity of grapes that I deem it worthy of mention, as showing the wonderful productiveness of the San Joaquin Valley land when irrigated. Mr. Worthington informed me that on the seventeenth day of March, 1879, he put out six hundred and eighty grape cuttings, on about three-fourths of an acre of land, by simply making holes with an iron bar and inserting the cuttings, filling the spaces around them with dry earth, using no water at the time. This year, being the fourth from the putting out of the cuttings, he said the six hundred and eighty vines produced fifteen tons of grapes, which he sold at the vineyard at from thirty to sixty dollars per ton; five hundred pounds of raisins, using seven pounds of grapes for one pound of raisins; two barrels of vinegar, and about five hundred gallons of wine, contained in nine large casks, which he showed me; in addition to which there were grapes enough on the vines when I saw them for probably another barrel of wine—making a total product of not far from twenty tons of grapes from six hundred and eighty vines. Mr. Worthington also said that he picked one hundred and ninety-seven pounds from one of these vines. Yours truly, GEORGE A. HILL.

The new material called "terra-cotta lumber," says the New York World, was invented and patented by Mr. C. C. Gilman, of Eldora, Iowa, president of the company, and is made by mixing the kaolinite or "top" clay, which is found in immense quantities throughout Middlesex County, with sawdust until the consistency of dough is obtained, when it is cast in large square blocks and burned in kilns in a manner similar to that of ordinary brick. The result is a peculiar terra-cotta ware, possessing singular properties. It has no fibrous texture like wood, the strength of the material arising from incipient vitrification obtained in firing, and half-inch boards made of it, smoothly planed and joined, show greater strength and tenacity than dry oak of equal thickness. Every shape which can be given to wood by edged tools can be given to terra-cotta lumber. It is as easily worked as pine or spruce, is half the weight of building brick, and tightly retains plastering without the aid of lathing. To display the resisting qualities of terra-cotta lumber to fire and water, the furnace-tender, with a long pair of steel tongs, took from the centre of the furnace a small block of the ware which had attained a white heat, and plunged it into a pail of water. After cooling, it was placed on a forge and the water with which it was saturated expelled in the form of steam; petroleum was next poured over it and afterward ignited, the block continuing to burn with a steady flame for several minutes. Subsequent examination of the block by sawing it in two showed no difference in appearance from other material which had not been submitted to so severe a test.

THE SECRETS OF SELENE.

Some Curious Things Recently Noted on the Surface of the Moon.

The telescope, says the New York Sun, has lately revealed some very curious and startling appearances in the moon. Astronomers have been slow to accept the conclusions which these observations suggest, because they have so long believed that the moon is a dead planet, and incapable of supporting any life upon its surface. This belief is based principally upon the assumed absence of a lunar atmosphere. But these recent observations indicate that the moon has an atmosphere; and if it has an atmosphere, it may have various forms of life upon its surface, differing as much from those upon the earth as the moon itself differs from the earth in its geological and climatological features. It would be very curious if the telescope, (the instrument which has banished from the moon the host of strange creatures with which the imagination of some of the ancients peopled it, and shown how unfitted it is for the habitation of beings like ourselves and those we see around us,) should now make us believe that the moon is the home of beings more grotesque in our eyes, perhaps, than any the imagination has pictured. We do not say this is probable, but only that it is suggested by the very interesting observations which have lately been made, and which we shall briefly describe. On the 27th of March last Mr. Stanley Williams, an English observer, was looking at the moon in the early evening, with a telescope of considerable power, and giving considerable attention to that very singular oval valley known to astronomers by the name of Plato. The valley is about sixty miles broad, remarkably level, and surrounded by a ring of mountains averaging something less than four thousand feet high, but shooting up here and there into peaks nearly as high as Ætna. When the sunlight strikes across the summits of the mountains on one side, it throws the shining peaks into splendid relief, but all the valley within remains shrouded in darkness. The sun was just rising upon this mountain ring when Mr. Williams made his observation of Plato, and his eye at once detected a very strange appearance. The interior of the valley, which usually appears totally dark at such times, was illuminated with a faint phosphorescent light, making its level floor dimly visible. It was not the effect of reflection from the illuminated mountains, because the interior of the valley was protected from such reflection. Some passing clouds in our atmosphere shut out this interesting scene from the sight of the observer for about an hour. When the sky cleared again, Mr. Williams looked once more, and saw that the strange light had disappeared. Mr. Williams had made a similar observation, in the same spot, about five years ago. About seven weeks after Mr. Williams's observations which we have described, there was a total eclipse of the sun, and a party of French and English astronomers went to Egypt to observe it, as the line of totality ran across that country. When these astronomers turned their spectroscopic upon the edge of the moon as it hid the sun upon the 17th of May, they perceived indications, in the strengthening of certain lines of the spectrum, of the existence of an atmosphere on the moon. This observation, though not unprecedented, was hailed with satisfaction by those who had always contended that the moon was not as dead as it seemed. The existence of an atmosphere would explain the phenomenon which Mr. Williams witnessed in the valley of Plato, as well as various other equally singular observations which have been made by students of the moon from time to time. But this was not all. On the 19th of May, two days after the eclipse, John G. Jackson, of Delaware, while studying the moon, as he has been accustomed to do for years, with a reflecting telescope, was surprised to see near the western edge of the disk, and over a portion of the flat region known as the Sea of Crises, something which he described as a feathery looking cloud. Just two months later he saw a similar appearance in the same place. And now Mr. L. E. Trouvelot, a well-known astronomer, commenting upon Stanley Williams's observation, says that he has more than once witnessed similar appearances upon the moon's disk. He has seen lunar landscapes lose their distinctness as if thin clouds were floating over them, and once around the crater of Kant he saw what may have been a rare vapor slightly tinged with purple. He has also seen another larger crater illuminated with a faint purple light. Mr. Trouvelot thinks these various appearances are manifestations of a lunar atmosphere of a nature yet unknown. Curious observations of a similar nature can be found scattered here and there in astronomical records, reaching back more than a century; but they have generally been looked upon with distrust, or totally disregarded. These recent observations give them renewed interest, and tend to vindicate their correctness. If it can be shown that the moon has an atmosphere, Sir William Herschel's idea that our satellite is inhabitable will not be deemed so ridiculous as it has seemed to some modern astronomers. We should not expect to obtain any confirmations of the observations of the German telescopicist, who believed he had discovered a big city and great military works in the moon; but reasons might be shown for thinking that the moon supports life peculiar to itself. The mere possibility of such a thing is somewhat startling, for the moon is really a very near neighbor to the earth. Few, perhaps, realize how close we are to another world besides the earth, but it is a very narrow span of space that separates us from the moon. The mean distance is only two hundred and forty thousand miles, or less than ten times the circuit of the earth, and only about eighty times as far as from San Francisco to New York. Not a few sea captains have probably sailed as far as the distance from the earth to the moon. And yet so close at hand as this there is a world differing so widely from the one we dwell upon that we can only admit the possibility of its being inhabited by assuming that its inhabitants are as unlike ourselves as their world is unlike ours.

ENGLISH AND AMERICAN SPEECH.

A British Historian's Opinions.

Mr. Edward A. Freeman is the author of an interesting paper in the first number of the new Longman's Magazine. He first discusses the great similarity which exists between English and America, and then goes on to give instances of the many characteristics of American speech which are really good old English. He then discusses the tendencies of America in the matter of language, and observes:

In the matter of language, as in most other matters, the United States have followed the usual law of colonies. A colony is always exposed to two opposite tendencies, which, though opposite, are found not uncommonly to work busily side by side. There is a greater tendency to stand still, and there is also a greater tendency to go ahead, than there is in the mother country. A colony which has no chance of going ahead is likely to stand very still indeed, much stiller than an old country. A small, isolated colony—say a small island—is likely to become one of the most old-world places to be found. It will in many things keep on the state of things which existed in the mother country at the time of the settlement long after that state of things has, in the mother country itself, become a thing of the past. It has become a proverb that if you wish to see old France, you must go to French Canada. And, for many things, if you wish to see old England, you must go to New England. In the United States the tendency to go ahead has certainly reached as great a development as in any part of the world; but it has by no means driven out the opposite tendency to stand still. I need not say that I noticed many things in which our kinsfolk beyond the ocean had—sometimes I thought for good, sometimes I thought for evil—left us behind. But I also noticed some things in which they had—sometimes I thought for good, sometimes for evil—lagged behind us. There is a vast deal of conservative feeling, or at least of conservative habit, at work in the United States, at any rate in the older States. There is much about them in speech, in manners, in institutions, which has a thoroughly old-world character, much that has lived on from the England of the seventeenth century, much in which the circumstances of the settlers called back into being things far older than the England of the seventeenth century. When anything that seems strange to a British visitor in American speech or American manners is not quite modern on the face of it, it is pretty certain to be something which was once common to the older and the newer England, but which the newer England has kept, while the older England has cast it aside. And it is not very hard to distinguish between usages which have this venerable sanction and usages which have come in only yesterday. It does not need any very great effort to discern between words, phrases, ways of looking at things, which have been handed on from the days of John Smith of Virginia, or Roger Williams of Rhode Island, and words, phrases, ways of looking at things, which have come in under the reign of the stump-orator, the interviewer, and that deadliest of all foes to the English tongue, and to every other tongue, the schoolmaster. Some Americans, especially curious in such matters, profess to mark some difference of speech in almost every State, and to be able in most cases to say from what State a man comes. To this amount of discernment I naturally can make no claim; but I can see some marked points of difference between the speech of the Northern and Southern States, taken as wholes. And I can further see that the speech of Virginia agrees in some points with the speech of Wessex—points in which it differs from the speech of either Boston. Thus, for instance, the surname "Carter," which to us does not sound specially patrician, but which in Virginia is reckoned to be at least as noble as Berkeley, if not as Montmorency, is locally sounded "Kyarth." Now, if the utterance of the latter half of the word may seem to be that of a London lounge, the utterance of the former part is genuine West Saxon, whether of the days of Alfred or the days of Victoria. But if we come to compare the English of the United States, as a whole, with the English of Britain, as a whole, there is no difference of dialect, strictly so called, between them. There is not the same kind of difference which there is between the English of the northern and southern parts of Britain itself.

Between the two countries he can see no marked difference in dialect, but considerable variance as regards local usage:

What we may call the language of railways is largely different in England and in America. But this is no difference of dialect, only difference of local usage. In each case a particular word has been chosen rather than another. In each case the word which has been chosen sounds odd to those who are used to the other. In each case we can sometimes see the reason for the difference of usage, and sometimes not. No obvious reason can be given why in England we speak of the "railway," while in America they commonly speak of the "railroad." But no one on either side can have the least difficulty in understanding the word which is used on the other side. And, indeed, the American might say that in this, as in some greater and older matters, he has stuck to the older usage. Though "railroad" is now seldom used in England, my own memory tells me that it was the more usual name when the thing itself first came in. "Railway," for what reason I know not, has displaced "railroad" in England, and it is worth remarking that it is doing the same in some parts of America. Here one can see no reason for one usage rather than the other, and no advantage in one usage rather than the other. But when the American goes on to speak, as he often does, of the railroad simply as "the road," his language may sometimes be a little misleading, but it is easy to see the reason for it. In England we had everywhere roads before we had railroads; the railroad needed a qualifying syllable to distinguish it from the older and better known kind of road. But in a large part of America the railroad is actually the oldest road; there is therefore no such need to distinguish it from any other. In Britain they say a "carriage;" in America a "car." This at least is by no means a distinction without a reason. The different forms of English railway-carriage might afford some curious matters for observation to a philosopher of the school of Mr. Tylor. Nowhere can the doctrine of survivals be better studied. The original railway-carriage was the old-fashioned carriage put to a new use; the innovation lay in putting several such carriages together. The American "car" was, on the contrary, strictly a "car;" at any rate, it is quite unlike the special meaning attached to the word "carriage." For "car," then there is a good reason; but it is hard to see why a railway station should be called a "depot." The word "station" is not etymologically English; it is therefore not so good a name as the German bahnhof; but it is quite naturalized and familiar, while "depot" is still foreign, and hardly becomes less so by being sounded as if it were Italian and written dipo. But on several American railroads the name is beginning to give way to the more reasonable word "station."

He might also have noted the fact that the new fashion of putting the word "station" on the station-sheds has in many localities had a marked influence toward reform. This is particularly the case in California, on the line of the Central and Southern Pacific railroads.

Mr. Freeman, after attacking the use of the word "store" for "shop," remarks:

New York, by the way, calls itself a "metropolis;" in what sense of the word it is not easy to guess, as it can hardly be because it is the seat of a Roman Catholic archbishopric. And I have even known a New York paper speak of the rest of the United States as "the provinces." That insulting name is bad enough when it is applied to an English shire; it is surely worse still when it is applied to a sovereign commonwealth. The words "metropolis" and "provinces," used in this way, I venture to call slang, whether the city which is set up above its fellow is London or New York. Anyhow, this use of them is in no way distinctively American; indeed, the misuse of the word "provinces" is, I fancy, excessively rare in America, and it is certainly borrowed from England.

The writer then speaks of the mutual distrust concerning the so-called "slang" that is prevalent between the two countries.

Some favorite American forms of speech seem to us in this way to savor of slang, and I believe that some favorite British forms of speech in the like sort savor of slang to an American. To take a very small example, perhaps the better because it is so very small, the word "certainly" is a very natural form of granting any request; but in England we should hardly use it except in granting a request of some little importance, or one about the granting of which there might be some little doubt; American use extends it to the very smallest civilities of the table. "I guess" I have always stood up for, as a perfectly good form, if only it is not always used to the exclusion of other forms. "I reckon" is as good English as English can be; it is only at "I calculate" that one would begin to kick, but I do not think that "I calculate" is often heard in the kind of American society to which I was used.

In the word "kick" Mr. Freeman has rather encroached on slang himself. He next speaks of pronunciation:

In pronunciation strictly so called—I mean the utterance of particular words as distinguished from any general tone, accent, intonation, and the like—I remarked less difference between America and England than there is in the use of the words themselves. But there are cases in which the American usage, though it sounds odd to a British ear, is strictly according to the analogy of the English tongue. I heard in America "opponent" and "inquiry," and very odd they sounded. But they simply follow the English rule of throwing the accent as far back as we can, without regard to the Latin or Greek quantity. If we say "theatre"—which, by the way, is accidentally right, according to the Greek accent—"auditor," "ablative," and a crowd of other words of the same kind, we may as well say "opponent" and "inquiry." The only reason against so doing is, I suppose, that they are a little hard to say, which is doubtless the reason why, while everybody says "auditor" and "senator," nobody says "spectator." But there is one word on which I wish to speak a little more at large, as a clear instance in which the schoolmaster, or the printed text, or some other artificial influence, has brought about a distinct change in pronunciation. The word "clerk" is in England usually sounded "clark," while in America it is usually sounded "clerk." I say "usually," because I did once hear "clark" in England—from a London shopman—and because I was told at Philadelphia that some old people there still said "clark," and—a most important fact—that those who said "clark" always said "merchant." Now, it is quite certain that "clark" is the older pronunciation, the pronunciation which the first settlers must have taken with them. This is proved by the fact that the word as a surname—and it is one of the commonest of surnames—is always sounded, and most commonly written, "Clark" or "Clarke." I suspect that "Clerk" as a surname, so spelled, is distinctively "Scotch," in the modern sense of that word. Also in writers of the sixteenth and early seventeenth century, the word itself is very often written "clark" or "clerke." But of course "clerk" was at all times the more clerically spelling, as showing the French and Latin origin of the word.

While I was in a barber's chair the other day, the knight of the strop handed me a Police Gazette. I regret to say that my knowledge of that chaste family journal is confined entirely to hoot-black stands and barber-shops. My eye ran wearily over the usual collection of improbable women with impossible legs; of murderers, murderesses, murderers, plug-uglies, variety actresses, and thieves. But my eye was suddenly arrested by a picture which was evidently from a photograph on the block. It represented the limp and lifeless body of a man hanging from a tree—a man who had been lynched in Kentucky for some hideous crime. But this was not what fixed my attention. Around the tree were grouped a number of people, in the stiff pose peasants affect when before a camera. I was struck by their faces. There was not a face in the whole gathering—probably some twenty or thirty—which was not either sordid, cruel, de-hased, vulgar, imbecile, scowling, or brutish. It made one sigh to look at them. And I had to admit, with a twinge, that they were all American faces, too.

The picture made such an impression on me that I was not surprised, some days after, to see the statement made by a Kentuckian, in print, that while Kentucky is at the head in cock-fighting, horse-racing, and whisky-drinking, it is behind other States in intelligence, in agriculture, in manufactures, and in the construction of railways. With half the population of Illinois, it has twice as many white citizens who can neither read nor write. With half the population of Ohio, it has twice as many white citizens who can neither read nor write. And the proud old commonwealth has a larger percentage of persons who can neither read nor write than has Japan.

The New York Sun calls attention, in its edition of the second instant, to the ridiculously low prices which a collection of eighty-one pictures in oil and water-colors brought at a recent sale in that city. Many of the best-known pictures sold for less than the cost of their frames. Three pictures by Inness brought thirty-five, thirty-five, and sixteen dollars; Moran's "Staten Island" brought eighteen dollars; while a "View on the Yellowstone," by the same artist, went at six dollars; Tiffany's "Café at Cairo" reached fifty-five dollars; "The Miser," by Beard; outstripped it at seventy dollars. If New York artists can do no better than this, surely their brethren in this city have no cause to complain of San Francisco in comparison.

The article on the Carnival in last week's Argonaut, signed "Cato," has created such an excitement among the members of the executive committee, the participants, and their friends, that embassies have been sent to this office requesting its "retraction." We could not retract it if we would, for the views therein expressed were those of the writer, and not of this journal. This is a good occasion to state what every one should know, but which many do not—the appearance of matter as "communicated," over signatures or pseudonyms, by no means implies that the editors endorse it. Such communications represent the personal opinions of the writers, and that is all.

Penenden Heath, in Kent, England, where for some fifty years malefactors were hanged in chains, and left hanging for months, has been given over as a public pleasure ground. The last famous criminal hanged there was Nicholson, servant to a great Russian merchant, Thomson Bonar, of a firm yet extant. He killed both Mr. and Mrs. Bonar, who lived at Camden Place, where Louis Napoleon died. When Sir Astley Cooper saw the wounds he said: "Done by a left-handed man." This directed suspicion to the right quarter.

A hall-room car is the latest novelty introduced on the Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul road, and recently a merry party of St. Louis helles and beaux made an excursion over the road, and danced the raquet with the train moving at forty miles an hour. The ball-room was in a large baggage-car, sixty feet long by fifteen feet wide.

DOM PEDRO'S KINGDOM.

A Glance at the Brazilian Empire through the Spectacles of a Cynic.

In front of the Hotel Bragança, at Petropolis, the summer court of Brazil, an elderly man, with a soured and cynical face, was occupying one of the seats. He had lived long in Brazil, and it was whispered of him that he had a grievance against the country in the shape of a broken contract, an unpaid claim, or something of that sort. Near by him sat a young compatriot—they were both Americans—whose expression, though haggard, was not unkind.

"Live here as long I have," the old man was saying, "and you yourself will be a confirmed malcontent. I was as light-hearted a hoy as ever you saw when I first came to this country to make my fortune. Look at me now. I've lost contentment, health, ambition, and character."

"You don't seem to like Brazil," said the young man.

"I never attempt to disguise my dislikes," was the reply.

"But it's a rich and beautiful land," continued the young man, leading his companion adroitly on.

"Yes," the cynic said; "as Florida and Louisiana are rich and beautiful; but is not rich in men, and never can be."

The upper classes of Brazil are shiftless, proud, and poor. All of these yarns which you read at home about immense Brazilian wealth, diamond kings, barons living in palaces, and planters rolling in luxury, are the work of enterprising novelists and journalists. This is a poverty-stricken country, if ever there was one. They tax both imports and exports, and yet they can't pay their debts, or even the interest on them. The aristocracy are too proud to go into business, and so they scheme for employment under the government. The fathers persuade the government to buy up the railroads and take control of the telegraphs, in order that they may make easy and respectable positions for their idle sons. First, the young men are educated under the auspices of the empire, and then, when they are graduated, they immediately clamor for official positions of honor and emolument. If they secure the coveted places, and are requested to do some work, they shrug their shoulders, and are indignant at the very idea of such a degradation.

The young man mentioned the case of the French physician who had come over from Paris to attend the emperor's daughter through the perils of childbirth. "He got a twenty-five-thousand-dollar fee and expenses paid," added he.

"But," said his companion, cynical as ever, "see how he was received by his professional fraternity in this country. The jealous native physicians descended to scurrilous abuse, and even published doggerel poetry against him in their medical journals. And in those discussions of theirs even the person of their sovereign princess was not treated with that sacred respect which is due from all gentlemen to the woman in affliction, for whom we, in our litany, especially pray—the innermost secrets of her sick-room being handed from one column to another of the daily papers."

"I say, Mr. —," exclaimed the young man, abruptly changing the subject, "I want to ask you a question."

"Fire away."

"At the ball which we had in the skating-rink, the other night, I was introduced to the pretty Donna Tagarella, and had a dance with her. What do you think she said to me?"

"She probably remarked that the weather was warm, or inquired if you had heard Fricci sing, or if you liked fei-toada."

"No; she asked me at what hotel I was staying."

"Not a surprising question."

"Then she asked me if I had brought my amiga with me. Now, I want to know just what amiga means."

"What does amiga mean?" repeated the cynic. "What does the French amante mean? Or, in plain words, what does 'mistress' mean? That's what amiga means."

"I thought and feared as much, and I blushed and stammered when I attempted a reply. She laughed quietly, seemed to enjoy my confusion, and turned the conversation by asking me if I was a married man. Now, I may be just from the country, and a little green, but it does seem to me that that question was a very outspoken one. Either the young American gentlemen who have been here before me have not led the most blameless of lives, or else there is a remarkable freedom of action and speech in the best Brazilian society, for Madame Tagarella is assuredly in the first rank."

"It does sound rather free," said the ungallant cynic; "but then, as far as I can learn, these young Brazilian matrons are not over-prudish when their husbands are out of sight—a position in which the discreet spouse rarely places himself when there are handsome young men around. Nothing personal intended."

"Sure enough," said the young man, thoughtfully. "Now I understand and appreciate at its true value the distinguished courtesy extended to me yesterday afternoon by the husband in question. I met him on the street, and casually remarked to him that I was on the way to call on his wife, and he kindly volunteered to accompany me."

"More cautious than kind," observed the cynic. "Still, social morals in Brazil are no worse than business morals or political morals. The fact is that no morality that has ever yet been discovered can stand the crucial test of a hot climate. As the Brazilians are light in love, so they are tricky in business and faithless in politics. The Brazilian court is considered a convenient place in which to shelve the diplomatic ruff-raff. It is not long since the people here saw the strange spectacle of a foreign minister unable to attend on a certain State occasion because a notorious prostitute had retained his official dress as forfeited collateral. At another time, a hardened member of the demi-monde persuaded a young European secretary of legation that he had done her the greatest wrong that the libertine can do to a young and innocent girl. He, simple, credulous fellow, heing a good Catholic, went and did a week's penance for his sin, much to the amusement of the jade and her companions. I have also seen members of foreign legations walking up to the palace on some ceremonial visit, and I have noticed them laugh, and wink, and poke each other's ribs, as they criticised the private linen of the emperor's household spread out, in rural fashion, to dry upon the grass of the front yard, through which their path lay."—L.

ECHOES FROM EVERYWHERE.

I am glad the election is over. Long before it came I grew weary of the election. Aside from the personal friends in whose success I took an interest, I was less concerned in the result of this election than in any I can remember since I cast a vote. I grew tired of receiving circulars imploring or bidding me—as the case may be—to vote for Boggs, the friend of the people, or not to vote for Scroggs, because he once murdered his aunt and concealed the body.

Talking of circulars, I know of one case which struck me as being somewhat humorous. A friend who had the misfortune to be running for school director—a misfortune which was only equaled by his election—received the day before election a circular accompanied by a ticket. It had him vote the enclosed ticket if he would save the city from ruin. The ticket enclosed was a straight Democratic with one exception—his own name was excised, and the Republican candidate's inserted.

Perhaps he would have voted it any way, but it was droll, all the same.

On election day a friend of mine wanted some fifty men to distribute election tickets. He was willing to give five dollars for the service—not a bad sum for light work. He told me that he had determined to intrust the task to a better class of men than one usually sees engaged in it.

"I intend," said he, "to see if I can not get some young clerks, helpers in mercantile houses, etc., to take the job. Most of them get small salaries—say from fifty to seventy-five dollars a month—and I fancy that five dollars would be an object to them. What do you think?"

I shook my head dubiously. It seemed absurd to say that youths on such stipends would be too "proud" to do it, yet I thought so.

And so it proved. My friend gave up his benevolent intentions in disgust. Not one of those whom he asked was willing to undertake the task, and in fact they all seemed rather insulted at being asked.

My friend was obliged to secure some mechanics to do the work for him—men who probably get all the way from ninety to a hundred and twenty dollars a month.

But then they were not proud.

The clerk, look you, is a haughty and untrammelled being. When dealing with others than his employer.

Some weeks ago there appeared in the Saturday Review an article on the difficulty of compiling a list of English names analogous to those forming the French Academy—in other words, a list of English Academicians. The writer compiled such a list, but with some difficulty. It struck me that if it was difficult to compile such a list in England it would be infinitely more so in America. I discussed the matter with a friend, and we found it was by no means an easy matter—partly by reason of the paucity of names sufficiently weighty for such a list, and partly because of our personal preferences. At last we finished it, however, and I took the liberty of revising it to suit my own taste, which I very naturally thought much better than his. I have made my list rather more catholic than is that of the French Academy, for I have selected names from among the poets, novelists, critics, historians, theologians, artists, lawyers, famous editors, physicians, and scientists. I have purposely excluded "statesmen," because I do not think we have any. When such men had claims entitling them to that distinction, I have put them down as "publicists."

At any rate, whatever may be the merits or demerits of my list, I submit it just as it is. Were it infinitely better it would challenge criticism, so my mind is easy:

There are probably many people who will say that I have forgotten three famous names—those of Mark Twain, Bret Harte, and Joaquin Miller. I have not forgotten them—I have simply omitted them.

There are others who may object to Edison's name figuring on the list. He has written nothing much that I know of, unless it be an article in Scribner. He is entitled to admission as a scientist, however.

If there are any who object to his admission, even on that ground, there is a name which I might suggest, but that sweet and gentle modesty which has ever characterized me would prevent my doing so.

I have not been to the theatre for seven weeks—that is, I had not been for seven weeks, when the "White Slave" was put on. I may remark that after I had seen the "White Slave" I was rather sorry I had emerged from my congenial obscurity.

The "White Slave" is doubtless a very good play, but it did not interest me. It was rather too reminiscent.

Mr. Levick, the leading man, I consider unpleasant. I am aware I am running counter to the New York critics when I say this. But then I do not care very much for the New York critics. Nor for any others, for the matter of that.

If it is any satisfaction to Mr. Levick, I may add that I think he would make an excellent masquerader. He has one of those dear little mustaches, turned up at the ends, on which many feminine hearts are hooked.

Miss Georgie Cayvan is not unpleasant. Of her it may be said, as Wordsworth said of somebody, "she is not fair to outward view, as many maidens be." But then she has a good heart. I believe that is the correct thing to say of young ladies who are not fair to outward view.

I have noticed, however, that very few young ladies are pleased by this subtle distinction.

On the whole, I was rather sorry that I had gone to the theatre, after all. It served only to dissipate my pleasant recollections of the Union Square Company at the same theatre.

Talking of the Union Square Company, reminds me of an anecdote I heard Sara Jewett tell one day. She said that when she was in England a young man once asked her whether it was true, as reported, that young girls were allowed in America to go out walking, riding, etc., with young men, unattended by chaperones.

"Yes," replied Miss Jewett, "it is the case in many parts of the United States—perhaps in most."

"What an egotistical country," replied the ingenuous Briton. "And have you ever been out that way?"

"Frequently."

"And did the men never try to—to—kiss you, you know?"

"Never."

"What a lot of muffs!"

I wonder if it ever occurs to army and navy men what important factors they are in social life? Why, they might almost be called the pillars on which society rests.

For instance, they are men of leisure, which is not the rule in America. Even in older and richer communities than this, it is the rule that men are occupied. Probably in another generation there will be large numbers of idle men, whose sole occupation will be the spending of the old man's money, and to whose expansive cheeks the only thing that will bring a blush will be the reflection that "pa used to sell things."

Now, however, the army and navy men have it pretty much their own way. Far be it from me to wish they hadn't. They are good fellows all—or nearly all.

One of the advantages of their leisure is that they can make their calls during afternoons. It is sometimes a relief to a woman to see a man around in the day-time.

Then, again, sometimes it isn't—particularly the old man. Army and navy men, too, are artists in the use and application of small talk, which makes one wonder sometimes why it doesn't cause softening of the brain. Still they seem to bear up under the strain.

Yet I often wonder, as I said, if it ever occurs to them to be dissatisfied with their social sphere. They are, as a rule, poor; they know that the girls are not after them, but after young Bonanza and Croesus Jr.; that these same girls would not marry them—that is, of course, unless they fell in love with them, something society girls rarely do.

Yes, they are social conveniences. They are invited because they can be counted on to come, because they are dancing men, and because—well, because they are convenient. They are even invited sometimes to grand dinners—formal and semi-state affairs—because their uniforms look well, and form an inexpensive addition to the flowers and other ornaments of the table. Here, for example, I will give you a plan of a dinner given to a Distinguished Personage visiting the city:

MR. KLOWNNE, Professional Wit.	MR. BRIEFLESS, Pallid young lawyer, inserted to fill up.	MISS SANGAZUL, F. F. V., but mature—forty.	MISS MONEYBAGS, Daughter of old Moneybags, amiable, but dull.	GENERAL LEO, Minister from Kamtshaka.	HOSTESS—MRS. PURSEPROUD, Blind velvet and diamonds.	MR. BILLY BONANZA, Racholop capitalist, with scurvy finger-nails.	MRS. V. DE GRACE, Dashing young widow.	YELLOW—LIEUT. LIGHTFOOT, Of the Artillery.	MISS CHEVALET, Poor artist patronized by Purseproud.	RED—CAPT. CHAUVIE, Of the Infantry.
MR. TOMASINA JEFFERSON SMITH, Descendant of the great T. J.	YELLOW—CAPT. SHRAPNEL, Of the Artillery.	MISS APOGGIATURA, Invited to sing after dinner.	RED—LIEUT. PIPECLAY, Narine Corps.	MISS GRAZIELLA LEO, Hostess—MR. PURSEPROUD.	MRS. GENERAL LEO, Diamonds and black velvet.	THE REV. MR. CREAMCHIESE, High Church and fine eyes.	MISS ARTLESS, In muslin. Bewitching, but poor.	BLUE—J. T. COM. TARPULIN, Bald, but still a giddy thing.	MISS MAMIE SYCOPHANT, Who makes protracted visits on her friends.

THE HUNGRY DOG.

DRAMA IN FIVE ACTS.

DRAMATIS PERSONÆ: Wehmeier. Holzappel. A Dog.
The action takes place in a country inn. The personages are picturesquely grouped around a table.
An interval of fifteen minutes takes place between each act.

ACT I.
Wehmeier—Say, who does that dog there belong to?
Holzappel—Hey?
W.—Whose dog is that?
H.—What dog?

ACT II.
W.—Say, what makes that dog there so lean?
H.—Hey?
W.—That dog there—what makes him lean, I say?
H.—What dog?

ACT III.
W.—Say, why don't that dog get fat?
H.—Hey?
W.—That dog there—why don't he get fat, I say?
H.—What dog?

ACT IV.
W.—Say, why don't that dog eat?
H.—Hey?
W.—That dog, I say—why don't he eat?
H.—What dog?

ACT V.
W.—Say, why don't you give that dog nothin'?
H.—Hey?
W.—That dog, I say—why don't you give that dog nothin'?
H.—What dog?

Once upon a time I knew a lady of wealth who had traveled extensively. She differed from most travelers in this respect—she was very much averse to talking over the lands in which she had traveled. When it was absolutely necessary, she overcame the difficulty by humorously referring to the continent in general as "Gold Hill."

She had lived in Virginia City. This peculiar phraseology, while a little puzzling to strangers, at least saved her from being classed in that awful category, the traveled bore.

You have met him? Of course you have—we all have, some of us to our sorrow.

I once had the misfortune of passing an evening with a man who had spent a number of months in Japan, and who wanted every one to know it. He generally succeeded in doing so. He would bring the conversation back from Jupiter's moons to Japan with the utmost skill. He was so skillful at it that he was cordially hated.

If there are palliating circumstances in the case of him who has been somewhere, what shall be said of him who has only been up the creek or into the next county? What should be done to him, ye gods? Let him be anathema.

It is my misfortune to know a scribe who recently went to the Sandwich Islands. Let us call him Boutville. Well, Boutville is doubtless a well-meaning person, but he is a frightful bore. The world to him has come to be a sort of frame, in which is inclosed the events which took place "when I was down to the Islands."

Does any one speak of the latest book? It reminds him of the fact that three months ago the latest book was So-and-So, and that he was reading it "when he was down to the Islands." This serves as a peg on which he proceeds to hang innumerable and infinitesimal reminiscences.

Are politics mentioned? Boutville plunges in medias res: "You have no idea how amusing the petty politics of Hawaii are. Now, when I was down to the Islands."

Does the conversation turn upon business, trade matters, etc.? Thus Boutville: "Talking of business, this Reciprocity Treaty is a great thing. Now, when I was down to the Islands."

Mrs. Langtry, professional beauties, etc.? "I tell you, speaking of pretty women, the girls at Honolulu, when I was down to the Islands."

And so on. Boutville, too, is gradually becoming transformed into an information volcano. You have doubtless seen the kind—upon the slightest provocation, and without even the premonitory rumble of the more merciful mud volcano, they proceed to throw up large gobs of information: Scraps of history, bits of philology, carefully conned chunks of encyclopedic lore—all these they belch forth from their craters, while the alarmed by-standers make haste to flee from the outpouring flood. Boutville, of course, having dallied with Mauna Loa, is become an Hawaiian information volcano. The gobs he emits are all predicated upon "when I was down to the Islands."

I have often thought that the most awful fate in life would be this—to be cast away upon an uninhabited island with an information volcano. Were it to happen to you, at the expiration of a few weeks you would be dead.

Or else he would.

As I was on the street car one evening this week, I heard the following dialogue between two women, one middle-aged and an Irishwoman, the other young and evidently an American. They both seemed to be working women:

"So Miss Casey she said she would do it for any of the girls, and so most of 'em said all right, and so she done it." "An' all of thim girruls has their hair like that! Well, I never haird anything like it in all me born days."

"Why, it looks puffedly splendid," replied the younger. "I don't care," said the other. "For all the girruls in wan shop to have their hair cut in wan way—I never haird the like. An' what is it ye call it now?"

"Miss Casey she says it's the Langtry bang. Missus Langtry is a purfeshunal beauty, and she's goin' to travel with a circus. People says she's the most beautiful woman in the world, but I seen her pictures—Cholly and me seen 'em—and they ain't much."

In a recent number of the Fliegende Blätter, the German Punch, there was a dialogue which, while I think it is the most elaborately idiotic thing I ever saw in my life, is none the less interesting as showing a peculiar type of German humor. The dreadful opacity of understanding which makes country people so prone to senseless repetition is by no means confined to Germany. Our peasants possess it as well. I have groaned in spirit as I have listened to dialogues

The younger woman bridled as she spoke, and looked conscious. It was evident that "Cholly" had disapproved of Mrs. Langtry. "Cholly" was fly.

At this point I got out, and the rest of the dialogue was lost to me.

When I entered my house I recoiled in horror. Zulana stood before me, and yet it was not she. For, behold—an exposition of Strozynsky had come o'er her. The comparatively plain arrangement of her hair had given way to a most extraordinary make-up. It was lop-sided. It was curled. And it was hanged.

This triple horror almost overcame me. I sank into a seat, and gasped:

"What is it?"

"This?" replied Zulana, twirling around coquettishly, "this?—why, it's the Langtry hang. How do you like it?"

"My dear," said I, gravely, "waiving any question of liking or disliking on my part, and waiving also the point that it might look well on a younger and—ahem—prettier woman, I will content myself with remarking that a whole shop full of Market Street milliner girls have had their confounded hair hanged, cropped, and curled like that, and"

"Well, what of it, said she, bristlingly, "do you think people will take me for a milliner girl?"

"No, my dear," I replied gently, "for reasons which I have touched upon, and which will doubtless occur to you, I don't think they will."

I had been at dinner. There were a lot of good fellows there. They were dining another good fellow, who was going away. We dined him, we wined him. The sitting was protracted. It was a very damp night. It was a humid night. It was a demitison moist night.

And then, as the night was luscious, and the star-dials binted of morn, I hethought me of home. Ah, home. It is a great thing to have a home. They say that in the French language there is no word for home. Home, sweet home. 'Tis sweet to hear the watch-dog's honest hark. And all that sort of thing.

But then sometimes you don't want to go home. I didn't want to go home. But I was afraid to stay away. So I took a cah and my homeward route together.

When I reached my stately mansion I dismissed the cah, and reflected. Was I in fit condition to appear at the domestic bar—that awful tribunal? I determined to think it over. En réfléchant, I took a walk around the block.

I thought I might pass off my hiccoughs for heart-disease, or something like that. Something sudden—something dangerous. Apoplexy might do.

But no. I smiled sadly as I reflected that Zulana knew me pretty well. She was too familiar with the symptoms of my projected heart-disease.

I cautiously unlatched the door, with some little trouble. When within, I paused again. I think I see the cynical smile upon the face of some heedless hachelor. Ah, little reck ye, ye mateless ones, of—but no matter.

When I entered the hall-way I recoiled. A man stood before me. He was a tall and ugly looking customer in the dim light. But I soon saw that I had been mistaken. It was only a most hideous suit of Japanese armor, which is the very apple of Zulana's eye.

A bright idea struck me. Why wouldn't it do for me to don the war toggery of the defunct daimio? Thus accoutred I would enter the chamber of Zulana. I would surprise her. I would then explain. In the midst of the laughter, the slight yet pleasant glow created by my little joke, my late arrival and my hiccough would perhaps pass unnoticed.

Happy thought.

I began the task of endossing the armor. It was longer and more difficult than I had anticipated. How in the name of all that is inflammable those Japs ever got their armor on without bursting a blood-vessel is more than I can guess.

However, at last I got into the thing and started up-stairs. I trod as gently as I could, but when I entered the chamber where Zulana lay enshrined, my helmet prevented me from seeing distinctly. I tumbled over an ottoman, and came to the floor with an awful crash.

I rose with much difficulty. But I had scarcely got upon my feet when I was startled by the most awful, the most ear-piercing, the most blood-curdling shrieks I ever beard in my life.

It was Zulana.

Apparently the wife of my bosom had failed to see the joke. I advanced toward her, and endeavored to explain. But she fled from before me—even in her garments of night fled she, like a ghost, through the hallway.

I followed, entreating her to be calm. But she only shrieked the louder.

When I reached the foot of the stairs, she had evidently fallen back for reinforcements. She appeared presently, flanked by the cook and the housemaid. But my arrival threw them into disorder, and they fell back.

I made a short and impressive speech from my post at the foot of the stairway. I did it with as much dignity as was compatible with my raiment. I implored them to be calm. Already a policeman was knocking at our portal. Finally I succeeded in quieting these insane creatures.

But I had a very long and elaborate series of explanations to make. First to the policeman. He was firmly convinced that a murder had been committed, and that the body was secreted on the premises. It took much time to remove this impression from his mind, and to convince him that my wife was a sleep-walker, and that I had been to a masquerade ball. Next the servants. My ordinarily dignified intercourse with them was much impaired by reason of my attire.

Last came Zulana. I will not dwell upon this painful scene. Suffice it to say that what I endured that night would have made the early Christian martyrs think their tortures were as naught in comparison. When I thought of those whom Nero had dipped in oil, kindled, and used as a torch-light procession, I laughed bitterly.

I am still of the opinion that my little scheme was an excellent one, and that it had in it all the elements of a side-splitting joke. With almost any other woman it would have succeeded perfectly.

But I am free to confess that I shall never again try it with her who is the present yoke-mate of ZULANO.

Endymion.

The rising moon has hid the stars;
Her level rays, like golden bars,
Lie on the landscape green,
With shadows brown between.
And silver white the river gleams,
As if Diana, in her dreams,
Had dropped her silver bow
Upon the meadows low.
On such a tranquil night as this,
Sbe woke Endymion with a kiss,
When, sleeping in the grove,
He dreamed not of her love.
Like Dian's kiss, unasked, unsought,
Love gives itself, but is not bought;
Nor voice, nor sound betrays
Its deep, impassioned gaze.
It comes—the beautiful, the free,
The crown of all humanity—
In silence and alone
To seek the elected one.
It lifts the boughs, whose shadows deep
Are Life's oblivion, the soul's sleep,
And kisses the closed eyes
Of him, who slumbering lies.
O weary hearts! O slumbering eyes!
O drooping souls, whose destinies
Are fraught with fear and pain,
Ye shall be loved again!
No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own.
Responds—as if with unseen wings,
An angel touched its quivering strings;
And whispers, in its song:
"Where bast thou stayed so long?"

—H. W. Longfellow.

Endymion.

"And then I fell asleep. Ah, can I tell
The enchantment that afterward befell?
Yet it was but a dream; yet such a dream
That never tongue, although it overteem
With mellow utterance, like a cavern spring,
Could figure out and to conception bring
All I beheld and felt. Methought I lay
Watching the zenith, where the milky way
Among the stars in virgin splendor pours;
And traveling my eye, until the doors
Of heaven appeared to open for my flight.

When, presently, the stars began to glide,
And faint away, before my eager view:
At which I sighed that I could not pursue,
And dropped my vision to the horizon's verge;
And lo! from opening clouds, I saw emerge
The loveliest moon that ever silvered o'er
A shell for Neptune's goblet; she did soar
So passionately bright, my dazzled soul
Commingle with her argent spheres did roll
Through clear and cloudy, even when she went
At last into a dark and vapory tent—
Whereat, methought, the lidless-eyed train
Of planets all were in the blue again.
To commune with those orbs, once more I raised
My sight right upward; but it was quite dazed
By a bright something, sailing down apace,
Making me quickly veil my eyes and face.
Again I looked, and, O ye deities,
Who from Olympus watch our destinies!
Whence that completed form of all completeness?
Whence came that high perfection of all sweetness?
Speak, stuhhorn earth, and tell me where, O where Hast thou a symbol of her golden bair?
Not oat-sheaves drooping in the western sun;
Not—thy soft band, fair sister! let me shun
Such folly before thee—yet she had,
Indeed, locks bright enough to make me mad;
And they were simply girdle and braided,
Leaving, in naked comeliness, unshaded,
Her pearl-round ears, white neck, and orb'd brow;
The which were blended in, I know not bow,
With such a paradise of lips and eyes,
Blush-tinted cheeks, half smiles, and faintest sighs,
That, when I think thereon, my spirit clings
And plays about its fancy, till the stings
Of human neighborhood evenenom all.
Unto what awful power shall I call?
To what high fane—ah! see her bovering feet,
More bluely veined, more soft, more whitely sweet
Than those of sea-born Venus when she rose
From out her cradle shell. The wind outblows
Her scarf into a fluttering pavilion;
'Tis blue, and over-spangled with a million
Of little eyes, as though thou wert to shed
Over the darkest, lushest blue-hell hed
Handfuls of daisies."—"Endymion, bow strange!
Dream within dream!"—"Sbe took an airy range,
And then toward me, like a very maid,
Came blushing, waning, willing, and afraid,
And pressed me by the band. Ah! 'twas too much;
Methought I fainted at the charmed touch,
Yet held my recollection, even as one
Who dives three fathoms where the waters run
Gurgling in beds of coral; for anon,
I felt unpounded in that region
Where falling stars dart their artillery forth,
And eagles struggle with the buffeting north
That balances the heavy meteor-stone—
Felt, too, I was not fearful, nor alone,
But lapped and lulled along the dangerous sky.
Soon, as it seemed, we left our journeying high,
And straightway into frightful eddies swooped,
Such as aye muster where gray time has scooped
Huge dens and caverns in a mountain's side;
There hollow sounds aroused me, and I sighed
To faint once more by looking on my bliss—
I was distracted; madly did I kiss
The wooing arms which held me, and did give
My eyes at once to death; but 'twas to live,
To take in draughts of life from the gold fount
Of kind and passionate looks; to count, and count
The moments, by some greedy help that seemed
A second self that each might be redeemed
And plundered of its load of blessedness.
Ah, desperate mortal! I even dared to press
Her very cheek against my crowned lip,
And, at that moment, felt my body dip
Into a warmer air; a moment more,
Our feet were soft in flowers. There was store
Of newest joys upon that alp. Sometimes
A scent of violets, and blossoming limes,
Loitered around us; then of honey cells,
Made delicate from all white-flower bells;
And once, above the edges of our nest,
An arch face peeped—an Oread as I guessed."

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

He Believed It.

"I have been told," said Mr. Dubious, watching the great steam-hammer in the rolling-mill, "that a good hammer-man can break the crystal of a watch with that thirty-ton hammer." "Yes, sir," said the hammerman, "it can be done." "I should like to see it," said Mr. Dubious, eagerly, feeling in his watch-pocket. "I can do it, sir," replied the man. "And will you?" replied Mr. Dubious, drawing out his watch; "come, I am anxious to see it tried." He laid his watch on the great anvil-plate. The hammer rose up to its full height, and the next instant all its ponderous weight, with a crushing force that shook the ground for an acre round, came down on that watch. "There," said the hammerman, quietly, "if you don't believe that crystal is broken, just stoop down, and you can see it sticking to the hammer." Mr. Dubious swallowed a whole procession of lumps and gasps before he could speak. "But I forgot to say," he exclaimed, "that it was to break the crystal without injuring the watch." "Oh, yes," said the hammerman, "yes, I know; I have heard that rubbish myself; but it's all gammon. I don't believe it can be done. But you can break the crystal every time."—Burdette.

Why Lucy Cried.

One evening Lucy's Young Man did not keep his engagement to come and help her Hold Down the Sofa, and she was very angry, because the Young Man generally brought along a box of Candy, and Lucy could make it Look Tired about as easily as any Girl in town. So she sat down at the Piano and began to sing. After she had given the folks a Sample of "When the Roses Bloom Again," "Only a Pansy Flower," "Empty is the Cradle," and a few other Gems of Melody that would make a man feel like committing Murder, her Father said that perhaps she had better Quit, as he didn't care about having the Patrol Wagon making useless trips on such a cold night. Lucy made no reply to this remark of her Father, but only slammed the music down pretty Hard, probably to show what she could do in case she should ever Get Real Hot. Then she began to play the Piano, starting in with "The Battle of Prague." When she had finished the piece, her Papa went across the Room to where his oldest son was sitting, and handed him Fifty Dollars. "Why, Papa," said Lucy, "What are you giving James all that money for?" "Your brother het me Fifty Dollars," he replied, "that you would Knock Out the Piano in the First Round, and I am giving you the Bundle." Then Lucy began to Cry, and said that her Father and Brother were Nasty, Horrid Things. But they only laughed at her, and when she had gone up stairs her Papa said to James: "Let us open a Small Bottle." Men are very Curious Creatures, children. They will frequently open a Small Bottle, and then go home and tell their Wives that times are too hard to buy a new Bonnet. But sometimes these men Lose Their Grip, and turn up about Thirteen or Fourteen o'clock at night, having had to hire a Hack to get home in, and then somebody gets a Sealskin Sacque. I think it serves them right. Don't you agree with me, children?—From "Tales for the Toddlers," by Joseph Medill in the Chicago Tribune.

INTO THE AMONGSTNESS—A TALE OF NEW ENGLAND LIFE.

They were real honey people, the Cracklehaynes, and they came into what Ruth called "the amongstness" as readily and easily as if they had always belonged there. As for Ruth and Dakie Cracklehayne, it was a settled affair from the first, and it all came about from a talk they had one evening on the piazza, just as the sun was sinking out of sight beyond the western hills. "Oh! those clouds," said Ruth, in an awe-struck voice; "they make one think of the far-off gates."—"Yes, and the crystal shore, and—the sweetsome tide," chimed in Dakie, who had been ransacking his skull for an appropriate scriptural verse. Just then old Uncle Squaretoes hobbled into view, and said, as he placed a hand on each young head: "The heyond and the betweens shall meet, and the gates shall be opened, and they that hunger shall be athirst."

[This is an excellent introduction for a story of the pie and piety school. No plot is necessary for a novel of this class. Introduce no characters but maudlin fools, and, in the last chapter, marry the most atrocious feminine idiot.]

OUR LADY FRIENDS—A TALE OF NEW YORK SOCIETY.

"Are you thinking of going to the F. C. D. C.?" inquired Maud Van Rensselaer of Herbert Patroon Suydam, as she leaned back in an ermine-cushioned fauteuil and let her pansy eyes drop on a Boldini of inestimable value. "No," returned the young patrician, with haughty languor; "but I was thinking of taking in the G. B. 4, 11, 44. You know, it's scarcely toney form to do the F. C. D. C. now, you know." Any one would have taken Herbert Patroon Suydam for an Englishman. No one, hearing his rich, aristocratic drawl, would ever have dreamed that he had never even been on the other side. His tailor, a genuine Londoner, and the preceptor of Poole in the art, often said to him: "Sir 'Erbert—I ax yer parding—Mr. Suydam—it comes so natural—blest if I wouldn't 'ave thought you was born and bred in dear old St. Giles's—the reg'lar swell quarter, Sir 'Erbert!"

[Do the heavy celluloid English and the pure old Knickerhocker blood, sprinkle in Delmonico, Newport, ride-in-the-park, Our Set, and any other touches of paper-collar aristocracy that may occur to you, and you will have a society novel that will be the delight of Mount Desert next summer.]

WILLY, THE WAIF—A TALE OF MISERY IN A METROPOLIS.

The bitter wind of winter whistled through the streets and alleys of the great city. It moaned among the house-tops, and heaved huge drifts of snow along the icy streets. The ways were dark in the December midnight. Belated foot-passengers hurried shivering to their homes. Even the industrious chiffonier turned despairingly from ash-barrels frozen solid as a California millionaire. Alone in a vacant door-way, otherwise unprotected from the cruel blasts, crouched a shuddering child of perhaps a dozen. [Shudder the child through several chapters about the son of an earl.]

It is Tuesday, in the afternoon of election day. The writer's labors are ended, his vote is cast; and—while in thirty-three States of the Union party passions and personal ambitions are expending themselves at the ballot-box—with gown and slippers, with pad and pencil, with cigar in his mouth blowing circles of airy, fragrant smoke-wreaths, he is reading the moral, economical, and political essays by Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam, Viscount St. Albans, Lord High Chancellor of England. He is philosophizing as to what all this is worth—all this fret and worry over the elections, all this denunciation of the machine and the Pope's Irish, the League of Freedom, Temperance and the Sunday law, Stoneman and Estee, bolters, Dolly Vardens and sore-heads, the Cameronian revolt in Pennsylvania, the rebellion against Folger in New York, the recent triumph of rum and stalwartism in Ohio, and fares and freights and water rates in San Francisco. What great difference does it make whether New Jersey will give us the senator who will determine the party character of the United States Senate? What harm is like to happen if Mahone carries Virginia?—or what calamity impends over the republic if the Congress of the United States is Democratic? It is to the writer, in his present frame of mind, in gown, and slippers, and easy-chair, with the essays of Lord Bacon and a Havana, but the agitation of an ant-hill—a temporary and unimportant insect war. It is, after all, but the struggle of politicians for places. It is a fight for spoils. There is not difference enough in partisans to make it very important which set gets in. If it turns out to be a cold day for Alex. Badlam, it is sunshine for Holtz. It will be all the same in a hundred years, and if it is not all the same it will make no difference to us. These things have been going on ever since the waters first flooded the valley of the Nile. Pyramids, tombs, and obelisks, whose origin is unknown, whose builders have passed away, mark doubtless the struggles of empires and dynasties whose names are lost in the gloom of a forgotten past. Lord Bacon is dead, and the cigar burns slowly to inevitable ashes, and the ashes of the cigar, tipped off with the little finger to be swept out and blown away, are as precious as imperial dust in golden urn, guarded in mausoleum of richest carving in bronze or marble.

The Argonaut has enjoyed this fight. It is a pleasant thing to lie upon one's stomach, in the shadow of an apple-tree of a sunny afternoon, and watch the teeming ant-hill—to see the little, busy, toiling, ambitious emmetts struggling with their precious food. It is a wicked pleasure to stir them up with the end of one's meddlesome boot to note their agitation and alarmed concern. It has been our pleasure to watch the campaign in this State, and note the small efforts of the small minds of small men to ride small hobbies to small places, where they might enjoy the opportunity of picking up the small things that lie loose upon the deck of our State craft. It has been a pleasure to dip our pen into their counsels, and stir up and expose their small conspiracies, and help to defeat their small ambitions. It is a pleasure to hear, as one passes along the street, the compliment of a muttered curse, or note the eulogy of an unexpressed imprecation that sits upon the scowling countenance of some party villain thwarted in some mean conspiracy. The poet of an age older than that of Bacon has said: "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle and to see a battle, and the adventures thereof below; but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage-ground of truth, where the air is always clear and serene, and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests in the vale below—so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling pride." This has been our pleasure. We have stood upon the shore, and seen the parties tempest-tossed in a struggle in which there was no principle. We have seen the ships captained by adventurers who had no knowledge of statecraft. In our grand old Republican ship—whose keel we helped to lay, and which we aided to build and launch, and which with the best efforts of a lifetime we helped to man—we saw struggling in the tempest, with a deserter at the helm, one who had crawled through the lubber-hole with a pirate crew, and, if it has not gone down, it has been wrenched and strained, and must go into dock for repairs. From our castle windows we have seen the adventures of the battle below. It has been a battle of stink-pots and foul blows, of strategies unworthy the art of honorable war. W. W. Foote flung a Know-Nothing boomerang at our castle turret. It recoiled, and fell upon his father's grave. And just a time or two, when we saw our Prohibition friends assaulted by the hired Hessians of the League of Freedom, we sallied forth to strike a blow for the little band of brave adventurers who dared to write upon their banner, "Americanism," "Temperance," "Sabbath observance," and "Equal protection of law to all property." We, who never pray, offered ourselves as allies to those who do—not to those who pray and do no work, but to those who pray and work; and we did not offer ourselves as allies to the temperance cause till forty praying parsons had marched away from the temperance standard. These perfidious parsons, in their cowardly desertion of the temperance cause at the moment it assumed shape to accomplish results, had better open whisky saloons on Sunday. They will do the cause of temperance less hurt than by their hypocritical prayers. Cosmas, Duke of Florence, had a saying against perfidious and neglectful friends. "We are commanded," said he, "to forgive our enemies; but we are not commanded to forgive our friends." These fat and oily men of God come within the definition of the Italian proverb: "Tanto buon che val niente"—so good that he is good for nothing. The most utterly good-for-nothing creature of this live, working age is the good-for-nothing parson. From this our vantage-ground of indifference to party struggles, where the air is clear and serene, we think we see the good time coming, when statesmen, and thinkers, and party leaders will dare to consider the question of alcoholic traffic as one of political economy. When the parsons—we mean the kind of parsons who do not vote as they pray—let the question of temperance alone, stop praying about it altogether, and turn it over to the men who pay taxes, there will very shortly be found some way, if not to prohibit, at least to regulate and control, the infernal traffic.

The writer is getting serious. He did not intend it. He started to philosophize, and here he finds himself scolding. It is so easy to scold. The cigar has burned down to his mustache, and that accounts for it. He resumes, with a new one, the good-natured reflections upon politics. We are glad the election is over. We look forward to two good long years of indulgence in quiet, in political repose; for the Argonaut, literature, poetry, and amiable disquisitions upon such topics as climate, the grape-culture, foreign affairs, the crowning of King Kalakaua, the reciprocity treaty, slickens, the new charter, the park improvements, society, music, and the drama. We are resolved to look upon the bright side of affairs, and to rest in the belief that whoever is chosen Governor will make an honest administration, and that the Legislature, whether Democratic or Republican, will give us good laws. The supervisors will, of course, be the worst board we have ever had. The Bulletin will fight the water company; the Chronicle will quarrel with Governor Stanford and Claus Spreckels. The Examiner will make everything Democratic appear rosy, and everything Republican bad. But the Argonaut, using only the privilege of discussing the Pope's Irish and the League of Freedom, will resume its amiable temper and dignified deportment. It will move gracefully along, searching for sermons in stones, music in babbling brooks, and good in everything.

The overwhelming defeat of the Republican party in nearly all of the Northern States is the most unaccountable political event that has occurred since its organization. New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Indiana, Michigan, Kansas, Colorado, Nevada, California, are all swept by a popular cyclone, while all the other Republican States exhibit reduced majorities. The House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States are transferred from Republican to Democratic control. Such an event occurring in any European government would indicate the commission of some fatal mistake, or some inexcusable crime, by the party in power. No such event marks this revolution. The Republican party honestly and honorably administered our national affairs. There is no burning question before the people. There has been no great principle put at issue. It was not a general election, and in no two States have the same causes been operating, and yet the result indicates that some common impulse must have been at work to produce such a result. New York and California may be taken to illustrate the causes which perhaps more than any other have brought about such an unexpected revolution in the popular mind. New York has been well governed. Its Governor was popular and honest, and well and faithfully performed his executive duties. He was entitled by every rule of honorable political consideration to be renominated. Had he been renominated, he would have been triumphantly reflected. But in New York there existed a party machine. The President of the United States was a member of it. Mr. Roscoe Conkling was a member. Its lesser men reached down to the very dregs of the criminal classes and reached up to the millionaires and the highest political offices of the nation. It was an organized effort to give a place or a job to all who composed it. Politics became a mercenary industry. Its convention was manipulated by party rogues. Its processes were through trickery, forgery, and crime. Its result was a conspiracy, in the interest of wealth dishonorably acquired, to promote the ambition of dishonest men, and to satisfy the greed and cupidity of political adventurers. The successful control of the New York Convention shocked the moral sentiment of all honorable men, and alarmed all honest minds when they contemplated the possible consequences of turning the great commonwealth over to the direction of a corrupt party machine. All reputable journals, all respectable men rebelled. The Tribune, the Times, the Herald, and indeed nearly all the leading organs, revolted from doing the work assigned them; and, with a seeming common consent, the better class of society determined to sink the ship in order to drown the rats. The same sentiment was abroad in Pennsylvania to overthrow the shameful and corrupt dictation of the Cameron machine. The same motives impelled the party in New Jersey to retire Robeson from a position as party leader which he had acquired by dishonest practices. The same influences are at work against Logan in Illinois. We had an honorable administration in California. Our Governor has faithfully, and honestly, and successfully performed his executive duties. There was no complaint against him or his administration. Had he been renominated, he would have been reflected. Any reputable Republican gentleman, who possesses intelligence, integrity, and moral courage, with political cleanliness and party consistency, fairly and honorably nominated by delegates decently chosen, who would have made a platform of principles, and courageously advocated them, would have been elected. But San Francisco had a party machine. It chose the delegates to a State Convention in the interest of the mercenary adventurers who composed it. It found in the person of Morris M. Estee a ready and willing tool to do its bidding. It made a shameful and cowardly platform, in which no moral principle was recognized. It assaulted the rights of private property, and refused to recognize the legal rights of individuals in protecting themselves and their possessions from robbery and spoliation. It contemplated in San Francisco a city government of thieves, a Board of Supervisors to blackmail one corporation, and members of Assembly to levy tribute upon another. Every honorable Republican who wanted no office, and asked no favor, was thrust aside by the insolent base-born miscreants, who, hiding in bar-rooms and consorting in gin-mills, undertook to turn the State and city over to thieves and ambitious knaves who would steal and let them steal. The result is a Democratic victory. The result of that result is to drive all these rascals over to that party. It segregates the decent men of the Republican party from the pimps, "lovers," blacklegs, and bullies, who, controlling party primaries, control party conventions. It drives the dishonorably ambitious back to private life. It gives the party an opportunity to rally its forces for a Presidential election in 1884, and to send delegates to a national convention which will not be under the arrogant dictation of Roscoe Conkling, Don Cameron, and John A. Logan. It gives honorable Republicans emancipation from the machine. And the strange fact is, there is not an honorable, disinterested, sincere, or unselfish Republican—who has held no office and wants none—who does not rejoice at the result. Honest Republicans meet and shake hands, their faces wreathed in smiles, and congratulate each other on the most welcome result. The railroads will not be compelled longer to maintain political bureaus to be managed by scheming and subtle knaves, whose duty is to run both conventions, and whose insolent privilege is to defeat every honest man's ambition. This is less a Democratic victory than a Republican stampede. In New York the tremendous majority for Cleveland indicates what the French would call a fraternization. Every intelligent person will concede that the contest has been but a feint—there has been no real conflict. When the better class of Republicans realized the fact that the machine had become national, that Arthur was working it, and that Cameron, Conkling, Logan, and hosts of lesser men operating for the spoils of office, the loot and plunder of rings, and the profit of government jobs, they were alarmed, and, if not alarmed, disgusted. This sentiment displayed itself when the insolence of the Grant programme presented itself at Chicago, and a triumvirate of senators undertook to violate the usages of party and the traditions of the Government in the nomination and election of Ulysses for a third term. The sentiment was intensified when the death of Garfield gave the Presidency to one who, however honorable, was ranked among the politicians and not among the statesmen, who was recognized as one of the New York machine. This feeling culminated when President Arthur and his friends at Washington drove Blaine and all the friends of Garfield from power; gave the higher offices, and all of them, to the enemies and opponents of the dead President; allowed Don Cameron, and Conkling, and Robeson to become not only party hureldens but party tyrants; raised the standard of Stalwartism, and offered to the other wing of the party the privilege of allegiance to it or private life. Then came the revolt in Pennsylvania. Then came the Presidential interference in New York. Then came the revolt of journals and decent Republicans all over the country. Then came the deluge, the tidal-wave, the cyclone, cataclysm. And yet there are no Republicans who have become Democrats. There has been no change of party sentiment. There are none killed, none wounded, none missing, and none scared. The Democracy has now the opportunity of demonstrating its professions of patriotism. We shall now realize in this city, in this State, and in the General Government, whether it is as honest and economical as it pretends to be. It will be closely watched with open-eyed jealousy by intelligent Republicans on the qui vive to overturn and defeat it as soon as found tripping. We hail and welcome the result as good for the country. There is no party discipline like the chastisement of a thorough and complete political defeat. The national Republican party of the United States has met its Waterloo.

It was claimed by the Chronicle that both Humphreys and Charles Clayton were friends of the railroad, and that John T. Doyle represented the anti-railroad sentiment of the city of San Francisco. He had been allowed to ventilate his anti-railroad opinions at extreme length in the Examiner. He was the embodiment of the anti-railroad sentiment of this community, and upon him was to have been concentrated the opposition to this iron-heeled, tyrannical, and altogether unprincipled monopoly. Note the result: Out of 38,000 votes cast, Mr. John T. Doyle received 6,000. Parturient montes, nascetur ridiculus mus. It was also claimed by the Chronicle that Mr. Estee was the representative of the real anti-monopoly policy of the State; that General Stoneman had made terms with the railroad; that he had an amicable and prearranged meeting with Governor Stanford at the Palace Hotel; that he had said at the Bohemian Club that "he had made his peace with the railroad." Mr. Estee made it the burden of his harangues throughout the State that he was the only original anti-railroad Jacobs. He bid for his nomination at the convention by a gross and personal assault upon the railroad-owners and managers. He followed it up everywhere by denouncing railroads and railroad management, and he received less votes by some thousands than those candidates on the same ticket who were charged with being the friends of the railroad. This proves that the railroad issue was a sham or a fraud, gotten up by political demagogues to deceive and mislead the people. The result takes this question out of politics. A square presentation of the whole railroad question would demonstrate that there is no such prejudice against them as the political freebooters would have us believe.

In looking around for the causes that have produced this remarkable result, the Chinese question must not be underrated. The labor force is a powerful one in our government. It is powerful in numbers, and it is active in politics. It is sensitive in reference to unpaid or underpaid labor. The abolition of black slavery was due to this working element. Brown slavery carried a menace to working-men in all the free States of the North. When, at the National Republican Convention, it was found that Eastern sentimentality was powerful enough to make it difficult to secure the passage of an anti-Chinese resolution, it struck a chill to the hearts of the working Republicans, from which they did not recover. The influence of the forged Morey letter was conclusive of the wide distrust that pervaded the minds of Republican working-men. The first veto of President Arthur emphasized this distrust, which the passage and approval of the second bill did not remove. The repudiation by the Republican leaders, Republican senators, and Republican journals, of the party resolution, made a deep impression upon working-men throughout the nation, and was undoubtedly one of the causes that contributed to the Republican defeat. When the party comes together again in national convention, it will be well to deal honestly with this question, and nominate a Presidential candidate who is in earnest sympathy with white workers, and honestly opposed to the introduction of brown slavery. This is one of the lessons of this political adversity that must not be overlooked.

We extract from the League of Freedom circular the following: "The hour of battle is just at hand." On November "the seventh the question will be settled whether we shall 'continue to enjoy the freedom our forefathers gave us, or 'fall under the domination of Puritan rule.'" This is signed by Julius Buhler and W. A. Asmussen, two lager-beer Dutchmen. This reminds us of an incident at a Fourth of July celebration. The orator, after portraying the gallant achievements of the soldiers of the revolutionary struggle, asked if there were present any of the heroes of the war, and begged them to rise. Up from the crowd a seedy individual lifted himself. "And in what regiment did you serve, my worthy friend?" asked the speaker. "I fought mit ter Hessians," was his reply. If Buhler and Asmussen's forefathers did not fight "mit ter Hessians," we are much mistaken.

The influence of McDonald's candidacy is not to be measured by the number of votes received by him. It was believed by many that the contest between Stoneman and Estee would have been much closer than it has turned out to be. Hundreds of Republicans who would have voted for him changed their minds at the last moment and voted for General Stoneman, in order to make the defeat of Mr. Estee more certain. The prohibition party is now a live factor in the politics of this State, and, since rum and the Democracy have struck hands, the Republican party will be compelled to recognize the fact; and we prophesy that at the next convention the temperance and Sabbath element will not be disregarded. When Americans shall have the courage to unite and assert American principles, the Republican party will find room for them in its ranks.

In the death of James W. Simonton our State met with the loss of a most valued and excellent citizen. He had worn himself out in active service, and had not unharnessed himself from the exhaustive toil of his labors in time to enjoy their well-earned fruits. He was an honorable man, kind, just, and generous. The writer speaks from experience when he says that he was a staunch and true friend. He was never so over-occupied that he had not time to champion the right, and he was ever brave enough to dare to do it in the face of popular prejudice. He was a bold and resolute thinker, with the courage of his own earnest convictions. He was a good citizen, and his loss will be deeply deplored.

If it is true, as the Examiner and Chronicle both declared, that Stoneman was nominated over Hearst by the influence of the railroad, then Stoneman's election is a railroad triumph. If it is true that William P. Humphreys and Carpenter, of El Dorado, are both railroad men, then the railroad has a majority of the commission, and this is a railroad triumph. If it is true, as all the enemies of the railroad assert, that Senator Farley is the railroad's friend, then his reelection to the United States Senate will be a railroad triumph. If, as he himself asserts, the railroad company has purchased all the scrub politicians, then the election of W. W. Foote is a railroad triumph.

"Portrait of Morris M. Estee: Our fine lithographic plate likeness of Hon. Morris M. Estee, Republican candidate for Governor, is now ready for delivery at this office. It is a beautiful picture, and reflects great credit upon the artistic skill of the house of E. Bosqui & Co., from which it comes. Single copies, ten cents. Mailed to any address. News agents supplied at half-price."—S. F. Evening Post. The foregoing paragraph stood at the head of the Post editorial columns during the campaign. We are authorized to say that this "beautiful picture" can now be obtained from the Post in large quantities; price, "one cent."

There are four men in America who will look upon this sweeping Democratic cyclone as an ill wind that has blown them no good—Chester A. Arthur, President; Don Cameron, Senator; Roscoe Conkling, ex-Senator; and Secor Robeson, of New Jersey. It will not prove an altogether ill wind if it should waft James G. Blaine into the Presidential office.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad" is illustrated by Mr. Estee, in his speech in the Republican State Convention, attacking Governor Stanford and his railroad associates. "Whom the gods would make mad they first destroy" is illustrated in the defeat of the remainder of the Republican ticket.

The Examiner is the only daily newspaper in San Francisco which has been large and generous enough to recognize the Argonaut and treat it as an equal. Of all the commercial dailies it is the only one which so rises above the small and spiteful jealousies of their business as to quote from us and reply to us, and to mention us by name, and to treat us as though we had a rightful and legitimate presence in the field of journalism. We have differed from the Examiner in the past, shall probably differ in the future, but we hope with the exchange of none other than fair arguments in courteous language—a kind of attitude hard to maintain toward the ordinary blackguards of the press. Hence, we congratulate the Examiner on its great triumph. It has fought a great battle, and has won a great victory. It has done battle within the accepted rules of honorable warfare. In this accepted code there is room for improvement. The Examiner steps to the front and takes rank from this time among the leading journals of California, with the opportunity to attain the first place on the Pacific Coast. It becomes the organ of the State and municipal governments, with the influence and patronage belonging to that position. It becomes a property of large value. It has attained that position where it may exercise great influence and do great good to the State.

If the election had occurred ten days sooner than it did Doctor McDonald would have received a largely increased vote. Thousands of Republicans were so impressed with the danger of Estee's election that they determined to make his defeat certain by voting for General Stoneman. The Protestant clergy almost as a rule deserted the prohibition party and voted the Republican ticket. The Catholic clergy, almost as a unit, voted for the Democracy. All of which convinces us that the future of temperance reform must be worked out independent of the priests and preachers, (as a class,) and that as practical reformers they are a failure.

Considering the sweeping nature of the Democratic victory, it is surprising that Greathouse should have contented himself with such a little, plain, simple, and somewhat bedraggled rooster as has decorated the Examiner these past few days. A waiting world naturally looked for a perfect eruption of roosters, such as adorn the exotic columns of our esteemed Democratic contemporaries in the Mississippi Valley. Or better still—the Democratic Warwick should have sent for the gigantic, the colossal rooster which stalked solemnly across the Cincinnati Enquirer's front page the day after Sammy Tilden met Hayes in the presidential prize-ring. This fowl is two feet two inches high, by actual measurement. Really, the Examiner seems lacking in enterprise.

The vote given by the county of Alameda to Frank Page for Congress is one of the strongest evidences of political ingratitude that we have ever witnessed. Page has done more for the harbor of Oakland, more for the interests of Alameda County, than any member of Congress for any constituency in the nation. To contrast his vote with that of the talking jackdaws, who promised in event of being elected to destroy the railroad—without which there would be no Oakland—indicates a want of political sense, of which the highly cultured of the classic shades ought to be ashamed.

And now that General Stoneman is elected Governor of California—honorably nominated and fairly chosen—let us admit that he is a gentleman of character, that he is a man of education, that he was loyal, that he is not an inebriate, and that all the scandalous lies told against him during the campaign were the scandalous efforts of mean minds to traduce him.

"Mr. Estee seems to be the candidate of the farming interest and of the commercial and city elements, and will 'get an almost united vote from the agricultural districts.'"—Oakland Tribune's Biography of the Republican Candidate for Governor.

It was an arctic day for Alex. Badlam. He was snowed under fearfully. Like the polar bear, he will hibernate by sucking his paws for a time; but he will thaw out to new life under the sunshine of the Republican reaction that is sure to come.

It sometimes becomes necessary to sink the ship in order to drown the rats. This time the clearance is complete, for the whole fleet has gone down. We shall be in luck if we get it up in time for the next presidential election.

The election of the Honorable Benjamin F. Butler, as Governor of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, is a great moral triumph over the Hoars of that State.

The logical outcome of this popular political revulsion is the nomination of James G. Blaine for the Presidency in 1884 by the Republican party.

The people of New York, on Tuesday last, accepted the resignation of the Honorable Roscoe Conkling from public life by a large majority.

Would it not be a graceful thing for the Republic to arise, in the person of Mr. Estee, and move to unanimous?

A STORY OF ALGIERS.

By Alphonse Daudet.

One evening, in Algiers, toward the close of a day of hunting, a violent tempest overtook me in the plain of the Shelif, a few leagues from Orleansville. Not the shadow of a town or caravansary in sight; nothing but dwarf palms, patches of lentisks, great plowed fields stretching as far as the horizon. Moreover, the Shelif, swelled by the rain, began to roar in an alarming fashion, and I ran the risk of spending my night in the open moor. Luckily, the civil interpreter of the Bureau of Milianah, who was with me, remembered that there was very near us, concealed in a valley, a tribe whose aga he knew, and we decided to go to him and ask shelter for the night.

These Arah villages of the plain are so buried in the cactuses and Barbary fig trees, their huts of dry earth are built so close to the ground, that we were in the midst of the "donar" before we knew it. Was this perfect silence owing to the time of day?—to the rain? The surroundings seemed to me very melancholy, and as though under the weight of some sorrow which had suspended all life there. In the fields round about the harvest was fast going to destruction. The wheat, the barley, everything else already garnered, were here still lying in the fields rotting. The rusty harrows and plows were out-doors, forgotten, in the rain. The whole tribe had this same air of dilapidated sadness and indifference. The dogs scarcely barked at our approach. From time to time the wailing of infants might be heard in the depths of a "gourbi," and we saw the shaved head of some boy, or the ragged "haick" of some old man passing through the thickets. Here and there were small mules shivering under the bushes. But not a horse, not a young man—as though it were still in the period of the great wars, and all the cavaliers gone months and months.

The mansion of the aga, a kind of long farm-house, with white walls and no windows, seemed to be as lifeless as the others. We found the stables open, the stall and the cribs empty, without a groom to receive our horses.

"Let us look in the Moorish coffee-room," said my companion to me.

What is called the Moorish coffee-room is the reception parlor, as it were, of the Arah chiefs—a house in a house, reserved for transient guests, and in which these good Mussulmans, with all politeness and affability, can practice the virtues of hospitality, and at the same time preserve that family seclusion which the law commands. The Moorish coffee-room of the Aga Si-Sliman was open and silent as like the stables. The high, white-washed walls, the trophies of arms, the ostrich-feathers, the wide, low divan on all sides of the room, all were going to ruin from the drops of rain which were blown through the door by the gusts of wind.

And yet there were people in the coffee-room. In the first place, the keeper, an old Kahyle in rags, with his head bent over between his knees, near an overturned brazier. Then the son of the aga, a promising youth, feverish and pale, who was reposing on the divan, wrapped in a black "hounnose," with two great greyhounds at his feet.

When we entered there was no motion, except that one of the greyhounds raised his head, and the youth deigned to turn toward us his handsome black eyes, feverish and languishing.

"And Si-Sliman?" said the interpreter. The keeper made a vague gesture, pointing to the horizon—far, so far! We perceived that Si-Sliman had gone on some long journey, but as the rain did not allow us to continue our ride, the interpreter, turning to the son of the aga, said to him in Arabic that we were friends of his father, and would like shelter till the next day. Immediately the youth arose, in spite of the fever which was burning in his veins, and gave orders to the keepers; then, directing us to the divans with a courteous gesture, as if to say, "You are my guests," he saluted us in the Arab manner, his head bent, a kiss on the end of his fingers, and, wrapping himself proudly in his hounnose, went out with all the gravity of an aga and householder.

And then the keeper rekindled his brazier, placed thereon two microscopic kettles, and while he was getting the coffee ready we succeeded in learning from him some details of his master's journey, and the strange neglect into which the tribe had fallen. The Arah spoke rapidly, with motions like those of an old woman, using strong guttural tones, sometimes interrupted by long silence, during which we heard the rain falling on the mosaic pavement of the inner court, the singing of the kettles, and the howls of the jackals wandering in thousands over the plain. This is what had happened to the unlucky Si-Sliman: Four months before, on the anniversary of the 15th of August, he had received the famous decoration of the Legion of Honor, for which they had kept him waiting so long. He was the only aga in the province who had failed of it. All the others were chevaliers, officers; two or three even wore around their haicks the broad ribbon of commander, which in all their innocence they used for handkerchiefs, as I have often seen the Bach'aga Bonaleme do. What had prevented Si-Sliman from receiving the decoration was a quarrel about a game of cards which he had had with the chief of the Arah Bureau, and the military coterie is so powerful in Algiers that for six years past the name of the aga had been on the list of those proposed without even an election. So you can imagine the joy of the worthy Si-Sliman when, on the 15th of August, a spahi from Orleansville had come to bring him the little casket with the patent of Knight of the Legion of Honor; and when Baia, the favorite of his four wives, had attached the cross of France to his camel's-hair bournose, he gave the tribe the opportunity of indulging in all sorts of interminable sports. All night long there was the music of flutes and tambourines. They had dancing, and fireworks, and I do not know how many sheep were slaughtered; and in order that the feast should lack nothing, a famous improviser from Djendel composed in honor of Si-Sliman a magnificent cantata, which began thus:

"O wind, harness thy chargers, and carry the good tidings!"

The next day at dawn Si-Sliman summoned to arms the van and the rear-van of his gnom, and hastened to Algiers with his men to thank the governor. At the gate of the city the gnom halted, as the custom was. The aga went alone to the government palace, saw the Duke of Malakoff, and assured him of his devotion to France with a few pompous phrases in that Oriental style which is called imaginative, because for three thousand years all young men have been compared to palms and all women to gazelles. Then, having fulfilled these duties, he mounted, so as to show himself in the city, worshipped at the mosque, scattered money among the poor, visited the harbers and embroiderers, bought scented waters and flowered silks for his wives, blue vests trimmed with gold and red riding-boots for his little aga, paying without haggling in bright coin. He was seen in the bazaars sitting on Smyrna rugs, drinking coffee at the doors of Moorish merchants, who gave him their congratulations. Around him press the throng in curiosity. They said: "There is Si-Sliman." The "emberour" had just sent him the cross, and the young Moorish girls, coming back from their baths, eating sweetmeats, shot from behind their white masks long looks of admiration toward this beautiful new silver cross so proudly worn. Ah, sometimes we enjoy glorious moments in life.

When it was evening Si-Sliman prepared to join his gnom, and he already had his foot in the stirrup, when a servant of the prefecture came to him out of breath.

"I have been looking everywhere for you, Si-Sliman. Come quick; the governor wishes to speak to you." Si-Sliman followed him without suspicion. However, as he crossed the great Moorish court of the palace, he met the Chief of the Arah Bureau, who smiled a wicked smile. This hostile smile frightened him; he entered the governor's reception-room trembling. The marshal, as he received him, was astride a chair.

"Si-Sliman," he said, with his usual brutality, and with that famous nasal tone which made every one around him fear, "Si-Sliman, my man, I am grieved; there has been a mistake. It was not you to whom they meant to give the cross. It is the Kaid of the Zougs-Zougs. You must return it."

The handsome browned face of the aga blushed as though brought near the fire of a great furnace. A convulsive movement shook his great frame. His eyes flashed, but it was a momentary gleam. He lowered them almost immediately, and bowed before the governor.

"Thou art my master, sir," he said, and snatching the cross from his breast, he laid it on the table. His hand trembled; there were tears on his long lashes. Old Pelissier was moved at the sight.

"Come, come, old friend, you shall have it next year." And he stretched out his hand to him in a kindly manner.

The aga assumed not to see it, howed without answering, and went out. He knew how much reliance could be put in the marshal's promises, and saw that he had been dishonored by an intrigue.

The noise of his disgrace had already spread throughout the city. The Jews of Bab Azoun Street watched him go by, and sneered. The Moorish merchants, on the other hand, turned from him with an air of compassion. Yet this compassion hurt him more than the Jewish laughter. He went on and on, far from the walls, seeking the darkest byways, the place from which the cross had been torn burning like an open wound. And all the time he was thinking: "What will my men say? What will my wives say?"

Then there came over him paroxysms of rage. He saw himself preaching a holy war down on the borders of Morocco, which are red with fires and battles, or even dashing through the streets of Algiers at the head of his gnom, robbing the Jews, massacring the Christians, and then himself falling amid the grand ruin in which he should hide his disgrace. Everything, except the return to his tribe, appeared possible to him. All at once, in the midst of his plans for revenge, the thought of the emberour struck him like a flash of light.

The emberour! For Si-Sliman, as for all the Arabs, the idea of justice and of honor is summed up in this word alone. He was the true head for believing Mussulmans in this period of decay. He of Constantinople appeared to them far, far off, a being created by reason, a sort of invisible pope who had kept only his spiritual power, and in these days we know what that is worth.

But the emberour, with his great cannons, his zouaves, his iron-clads. When Si-Sliman had once thought of him he believed himself saved. Surely, the emperor would give him back his cross. The journey was a matter of eight days, and he knew that his gnom would wait for him at the gates of Algiers. The steamboat sailing the next day would take him toward Paris, full of calm and serenity, as though it were a pilgrimage to Mecca.

Poor Si-Sliman! Four months ago the unhappy aga had sailed, and the letters which he sent his wives spoke no more of return. For four months he had been buried in the fog of Paris, spending his days in interviews with ministers, everywhere derided, caught in the terrible mill of the French Administration, sent from bureau to bureau, soiling his hounnose on the dusty benches of ante-chambers, on the alert for an audience never to be; then at evening he would be seen with his long, sad face, absurd from its very majesty, as he waited for his key in the office of his boarding-house, and mounted to his room, weary by reason of his endless errands and rebuffs, yet still proud, clinging to his hope, like a madman fixed in his pursuit after his honor.

Meanwhile, his hand, crouching near the gate Bab Azoun, were waiting for him with Oriental fatalism; his horses, tethered near the sea, neighed for his return. In the tribe all was at loose ends, the harvest perishing in the fields for lack of hands. The women, the children, counted the days, their faces turned toward Paris; and it was pitiful to see how much hope, despair, ruin, were the result of that piece of red ribbon. What will be the end of it all?

"God only knows," said the keeper, sighing, and through the open door, pointing over the melancholy, violet plain, his bare arm showed us the faint crescent of the white moon shining in the evening sky.

Under the heading "High Sport," the Gaulois announces that "le fox hunting" is being acclimatized in the south of France. The Russian, English, and Spanish colonies, together with the Bordeaux aristocracy, have formed themselves into a hunting society called "The Foxhound." They have begun operations by hunting a fox four days in the forest of Arcachon. According to the latest accounts, Reynard has succeeded in evading his pursuers.

LITERARY NOTES.

The third "No Name Series" is commenced by a story entitled "Her Crime." It is rather brightly written, but has a meagre plot. Published by Roberts Brothers, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.

"Diddle Dumps, and Tot," by Louise C. Pyrrnelle, is another of the stories of plantation life in the Southern States that have been recently written for children. It is well and copiously illustrated. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.00.

"Star-Flowers" is another of those weak, semi-sentimental, semi-religious volumes of verse which are issued by publishers at the authors' risk. It will be read only by the author, the proof-reader, and the reviewer. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

"The Hidden Record" is a sentimental story by E. N. Blaisdell. Its plot is laid in New York, on the ocean, and in Cuba. It details the efforts of an American naval officer to uncover a mystery which involved his father. Published by T. B. Peterson & Co., Philadelphia; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price, 75 cents.

"The Wit and Wisdom of Don Quixote" is a neatly arranged and indexed volume of the best thoughts, prose and poetical, which appear in the volume that "laughed Spain's chivalry away." The book is illustrated, and contains a short sketch of Cervantes. Published by Roberts Brothers, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

The fifth number of the "Questions of the Day Series" is entitled "The American Citizen's Manual," of which part first is now issued. It is written by W. C. Ford, and treats of national, State, and local governments, the electorate and civil service. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

The twenty-sixth volume of the "Handy-book Series" is "How to Succeed." It consists of a number of essays by some of the foremost thinkers of the nation. They originally appeared in the Christian Union, but were considered to be deserving of a more permanent form. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 50 cents.

The latest number of the "English Men of Letters Series" is "Sterne," by H. D. Traill. Like the other volumes of this series, it is condensed, but, nevertheless, many facts and anecdotes are related that will be new to the public, and the biography is as thorough as the average reader could desire. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, 75 cents.

"The Nervous System" is the latest addition to the series of "Health Primers." These volumes now number nine, and are useful in serving the best interests of hygiene. They are prepared by twenty-four of the best English physicians, and embody the latest discoveries in medical science. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James White & Co., 23 Dupont Street; price, 40 cents.

Mr. R. M. Daggett, of Nevada, is the author of "Braxton's Bar." It is a story of the pioneer days of California, and is dedicated to Mrs. John W. Mackay. Although prone to become sensational in parts, it is a fair picture of early California life, and many incidents evince the fact that they occurred in the author's experience. Published by Carleton & Co., New York; for sale by F. Boegle, 31 Dupont Street.

"The Wisdom of the Brahmin" is a translation from the German of one of the twenty volumes which Friedrich Rückert, the great Orientalist, composed from his vast mental storehouse of Eastern literature. The translation is made by Charles F. Brooks, who has been in his way a benefactor of the non-German-speaking American. His translations of Goethe and his sympathetic interpretation of Richter have given him a name that will endure through generations. Published by Roberts Brothers, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

Miscellany: No. 3 of the Plymouth Pulpit contains the sermon preached by Rev. H. W. Beecher on October 25, 1882. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; price, $2 per annum. "An esteemed Baltimore contemporary," says the Critic, "credits us with having proved that 'most of Mr. Howells's plots for novels are taken from Shakespeare.' Really, if we have done this, we have done a great deal more than we aimed to do. What we did say (and proved) was that the novelist's times are taken from chance phrases in Shakespeare. His plots, so far as we remember, are wholly original. No charge of plagiarism was involved in the note referred to."—We learn from Messrs. Rees Welsh & Co., of Philadelphia, that "the party who inserted the advertisement" in which Mr. Whitman's "Leaves of Grass" was characterized as "a daisy" "has no longer charge of that department."—The original manuscript of "Maud Müller," as sent to the Washington National Era, contains a note from Whittier, in which he says that he has "tried to make something of the pastoral conditions of New England life after the manner of the German poets."—Mr. S. C. Hall, who is now eighty-two years old, gave a lecture at Plymouth, England, not long ago, discoursing on his feet for two and a half hours, and showing no signs of exhaustion. How about the hearers?—Mrs. Oliphant, a writer of inexhaustible capacity, has written a new novel with the peculiar title of "The Wizard's Son." It is to appear as a serial in Macmillan's Magazine.

Announcements: President Garfield, a short time before he was wounded, sent a pleasant message to William Black, expressing his regret that the novelist had ended "MacLeod of Dare" so tragically. "There is tragedy enough in the world," said the man whose life was so soon to go out in frightful suffering heroically borne. This and much more concerning Mr. Black is related in an article which is to appear in the next number of Harper's Magazine.—Mr. Tennyson's new rural drama, in three acts, is written in prose—and that is nearly all that is known about it as yet.—Dr. Schliemann's next work on the results of his excavations at Hissarlik, last winter, is to be published simultaneously in German and in English. Mr. Karl Blind has contributed a chapter on "Trojan Ethnography."—The Chinese Ambassador in Berlin has just published in a German review a long critical article on Chinese poetry, with many extracts neatly translated.—Miss Braddon's new Christmas novel, "Flower and Weed," marks a new departure in English book-making. It is to be profusely illustrated and handsomely printed, and will be sold for twenty-five cents.—Mr. William Leighton has written, and Lippincott will publish, a volume on the "Subjection of Hamlet." Mr. Leighton argues that Hamlet was in truth insane.—G. P. Putnam's Sons will bring out immediately Mr. Edmond O'Donovan's "Merv," and Mr. Bayard Tuckerman's "History of English Prose Fiction."—Mr. Edwin Arnold's forthcoming poem is entitled "Pearls of the Faith; or Islam's Rosary"—being the "Ninety-nine Beautiful Names of Allah," with comments in verse. This poem, which is a long one, treats metrically of the life and religion of Mohammed from the standpoint of an Indian Mussulman. The tenth English edition of Mr. Arnold's "Light of Asia" is now passing through the press.—James Hogg's "Domestic Manners and Private Life of Sir Walter Scott" has long been out of print, and a new edition is about to be published by William Brown, of Edinburgh.—Mr. E. W. Gosse, the author of the recently published volume on Gray in the "English Men of Letters Series," is engaged in editing for Macmillan a complete edition of Gray's works.—"Rachel's Share of the Road" is the extraordinary title of the new Lord Robin novel. J. R. Osgood & Co. are also just bringing out Charles Gayarre's romance of "Aubert Dubarret," and their new edition of the works of Machiavelli. Mr. Howells's "Modern Instance" is on the crest of the wave, and the publishers are unable to fill all their orders.—The first volume of Trident (Garfield's works) will be published before the holidays by J. L. Osgood & Co. The second will follow in January or February.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Dr. Hawks, an eloquent and popular New York divine, once asked the vestrymen of his church to increase his salary because of his increased family expenses. "Don't trouble yourself," said the vestryman; "the Lord has said, He will care for the young ravens when they cry." "I know that," said the clergymen, "but nothing is said about the young Hawks."

"I hate to see a woman with rings in her ears," exclaimed the good deacon; "they ain't natural; if it was intended for woman to wear them, she would have been born with holes in her ears. The first woman didn't wear ear-rings, I'll be bound." "No," remarked the quiet little man in the corner, "nor nothing else." The discussion was brought to an abrupt close, and the house adjourned without day.

It was at Nice, last winter, that the following charming illustration of the Daisy Miller form of our fair countrywomen occurred: Two English girls were standing at the foot of a hotel staircase roaring with laughter. To them came swiftly the matron of one of them, exclaiming: "For heaven's sake, Mabel, don't! They'll take you for one of those horrid American girls." One of the class thus sweetly designated happened to be standing at the head of the stairs, and gently observed: "I guess not, with those awfully big feet."

Lord Erskine, while going circuit, was asked by the landlord of his hotel how he had slept. He replied, dogmatically: "Union is strength, a fact of which some of your inmates appear to be unaware; for had they been unanimous last night they could easily have pushed me out of bed." "Fleas!" the landlord exclaimed, affecting great astonishment. "I was not aware that I had a single flea in my house." "I don't believe you have," retorted the lordship; "they are all married and have uncommonly large families."

After dining at the table d'hôte of a well-known hotel situated within the shadows of the Alpes Maritimes, I wended my way, says a London correspondent, for a lazy stroll along a well-known wall well washed by the blue Mediterranean, when a specimen of grim humor caught my sight, in the shape of the following notice upon the said wall, legibly written in chalk: "Lost, on August the 20th, the sum of 500,000 francs at the roulette tables at the Monte-Carlo. A reward of 5,000 francs will be paid to any one who will return the same to the original owner."

A young husband, desirous of provoking a chance to pay a compliment to his young wife, and of receiving an assurance of affection, says, with an aspect of surprise: "My dear, I heard a very remarkable thing to-day. What his name told me that he had been looking into the matter very closely, and discovered that there was only one married woman in this street who wasn't a flirt and really loved her dear hubby better than any other man in the world." The wife, after mature reflection: "I wonder, now, who it can be? I thought I knew everybody on the street."

Not long ago a Sun reporter called at President Arthur's house, in Lexington Avenue, New York. Aleck Powell, the president's colored major domo, answered the bell. He recognized the reporter as an old newspaper acquaintance in custom-house times. "Aleck, when does the president go to Washington?" the reporter asked. "To-morrow night," was the reply. "Has Mike Cregan, Johnny O'Brien, or Barney Biglin seen the president to-day?" The question was overheard by General Arthur, who stood in the hall-way taking his leave of Police Commissioner Stephen H. French. "Let that man in, let that man in," he said, in a sharp tone. The reporter entered the hall-way. The president severely rebuked him for speaking so familiarly of Cregan, O'Brien, and Biglin, as to call them Mike, Johnny, and Barney. "Your lack of manners is so great," said he, "that it would not surprise me to hear you speak of my friend, Mr. French, here, as Steve." "Oh, no," was the prompt reply, "I always call him Proxy."

Jules Janin tells a story of the celebrated diamond, the Sancy, a stone of the first water, and worth an enormous amount of money. One night at a ball, at Nice, the Princess M., to whom it belonged, let it fall. Janin picked it up, and the princess requested him to put it in his pocket for safe-keeping. He did so, and thought no more about it. Two days afterward the princess met Janin and asked laughingly for the diamond. "What diamond?" said Janin. "What? That I confided to your keeping the other evening." "Ah, that is true; I had forgotten it. It was a real stone, then?" "Real? Yes. Only the Sancy." "The Sancy!" and he rushed home like a madman. He searched everywhere. Not a sign of it. All at once he remembered the coat he had worn that night. "Where is it?" "At the washerwoman's." The washerwoman had found nothing. Janin was in despair. On the bank of the river a child was throwing stones into the water. Among a pile of pebbles at its side was the Sancy. The world was again bright to Janin. The princess smiled serenely.

The Italians are great jokers, and the humorous instincts run through every class, from the nobles to the lazzaroni. The municipality of Lucca was lately the butt of a laughable conceit on the part of the news-vendors of the city. The conscript fathers sought to add tone and dignity to their surroundings by making some extraordinary regulations as to the dress and demeanor of the cab-drivers and news-vendors. The latter were required to be "decently dressed," and were bidden not to cry the contents of their papers, but to be satisfied with decorously announcing their names. On September 1st, when the new rules went into effect, the newsboys failed to appear, and the public imagined that a strike had been organized, but at a prearranged hour the paper-sellers appeared in a body on the streets in the most correct evening dress, crush hats, swallow-tails, white ties, and gloves, and carrying waiters on which the journals were arranged in the most orderly manner. The effect was immense. The people took up the joke, and the newsboys did the biggest day's business they had ever known.

A CONJUGAL CONVERSAZIONE.

"Now, Betsy," said Jack, the other evening, as, after having inducted himself into his dressing-gown and slippers, he stretched himself out comfortably on the Chinese lounging-chair; "now, Betsy, entertain me."

It is a little dashing at any time to be asked, in cold blood, to make one's self deeply interesting at a moment's notice. Every idea I had in the world fled upon the instant.

"What shall I read to you?" I murmured, somewhat feebly, at last; for we had been through the magazines of the month a week before, and discussed them from cover to cover. Jack had greedily devoured the news of the evening paper an hour ago, and not a new book lay on the table. As for poetry, one must approach it by a gradation of moods to enjoy it properly. There is a metaphysical yearn in all true poetry which harmonizes with physical cravings, and the satisfied human creature never wants poetry immediately after dinner.

"I had not thought of books," says Jack. "It occurred to me that we might while away the evening with conversation."

"Conversation," I rejoined, "is a lost art."

"Then let us revive it," cries Jack, undismayed. "But, my dear," I say, "do you not see the absurdity of a husband and wife launching forth upon a premeditated, deliberate conversation? Husbands and wives talk, and growl, and grumble, and lecture, but they never converse. It is not the custom of the country."

"Then let us originate the custom," says Jack, once more, undismayed.

"My dear Jack," I answer, somewhat dogmatically, "I take it that your idea was the interchange of sentiments, and these small conversational pellets which you are flinging at me are somewhat difficult to classify."

"Then let them go at large in the world of ideas, like that sidereal vagabond, the comet, which you have admired much, as you know, my dear, even while knowing that it belonged nowhere in particular."

"Jack," I say, somewhat irrelevantly, "I should think a Frenchwoman might not find it difficult to carry on a conversation with her own husband. Her very form of address—that naïve funny little 'mon ami'—places him at once upon a different footing from the English or American 'dear.' It seems to do away with the idea of the affection of habit, and suggests an intimate friendship rather than the too-close intimacy of ordinary married life. That delicate wall of reserve which should stand between any two human lives, however closely they are united—"

"Betsy," interrupts Jack here, somewhat violently, "you are always flying off at a tangent. I do not propose to switch off at this late day, and be married on the French plan. I prefer you just as you are, and if you can not talk like a frequenter of the Hotel Rambouillet in its days of glory, why, you may read me to sleep with 'Tupper's Proverbial Philosophy,' if you like, and I will swear that you have the charm of speech, if you will only keep on your own side of the pond."

"I only went across to mention the Frenchwoman's 'mon ami,' Jack, and you will acknowledge that it is something better than the careless 'darling' which falls so freely from the lips of so many. By the way, did you observe how queerly it sounded in the broken English of the French octoon, the other night? It is not a term which seems to belong in the South lands, and the riotous blood flows too swiftly for a cold Saxon 'darling,' in the veins of such a one as Daphne. Miss Sylvester has a capital French accent, but I did not find her half fierce enough for such a woman—did you?"

"She certainly does not belong to an amiable species," spoke Jack, sententiously; "and the race which makes 'honey' its choicest term of endearment is very likely to give gall, or its synonym, for a complimentary term. In point of fact, Daphne does take her displacement rather coolly, considering that she is a potpourri of French, African, and Caucasian. But nothing that Daphne said struck me so strangely as the Captain of the Belle Croix ordering Britton and Lisa down stairs. Does down stairs strike you as having the true nautical ring, Betsy?"

"Ah well, Jack, you know a Mississippi captain is but a half-fledged mariner, at best. Out in mid-ocean, I fancy, he would find himself, both literally and figuratively, wide at sea. And yet I do not doubt the river has a sailing jargon which would confuse the Ancient Mariner himself."

"Talking of the 'White Slave,' Betsy, can you tell me what bearing Jack and the young person who honors him with her affections have upon the plot?"

But we discover her only mission to be the introduction of a series of juvenile monocled costumes. The young person thrown in at haphazard is becoming popular. She fills an empty niche, and does no harm.

"Indeed, Jack, I think plot is going somewhat out of fashion, and filling is all the rage, for the writers nowadays even slight a dramatic situation. For example, the 'Portrait of a Lady' is confessedly only a portrait. But I can imagine nothing more tragic in an ordinary household than the incident of Isabel's discovery that Madame Merle is the mother of Pansy. Yet Henry James gives the effect of having only introduced it to show how Isabel would act under such circumstances. And yet is not this sort of thing the root and base of all emotional drama? Does not everything always depend upon who is whose mother?"

"Now that you mention it, Betsy, unknown mothers do seem to abound in the drama; yet I can not see that the young women are thrown in haphazard. To me they are essentially a component part of the drama, and I like lots of them—in fact, I took considerable pleasure in gazing upon the young soubrette in mauve. I suppose she is a soubrette."

"Indeed, I don't know, Jack. The soubrette seems to have gone out since the ingénue came in. There does not seem to be place made for her in the new plays, and I miss her, for she was always a sparkling little body. Louise Sylvester was once a soubrette, and a clever one, too, but she is an emotional actress now, and quite as good in that line, for that matter; for I think she dies rather well, don't you?"

"Well, yes; but I could not help thinking how much more comfortable it would have been for people to be in their beds down in that country. Daphne is lying around, and the old judge has quite a with the arm-chair before he sinks into his armchair. And then, too, Freeman dies very

"Freeman never does anything easily. He would be a capital actor if he could only subdue himself, for he is quick at conception and always successful at make-up, but his constant high-pressure gives an audience a sense of fatigue, from which there is no rally while he is on the stage."

"How many people there are in the world, Betsy, who keep one constantly on the rack of discomfort simply by being over-wrought. I wish I could go about the world with my head high in air far above the minor unpleasantnesses of life. They are the fretting, galling, wearing, gilding things, which rub the bloom off of pleasure."

"Jack, your head in the air reminds me of a paragraph from an alleged humorist, which I read the other day. After saying all sorts of funny things about the giraffe, he concludes: 'They are neither of them (the hippopotamus and the kangaroo) of the same class as this sky-raking animal that passes all its life, so to speak, looking out of a fourth-story window. It is difficult to believe that the giraffe finds much fun in life; for, after all, most of the fun of the world goes on upon the ground. Of course, if the giraffe thinks itself a bird, it may be contented enough all by itself in the air, but its aspect is one of subdued melancholy, such as appertains to all anomalous positions, whether those of queen dowagers or dodos.' I think, perhaps, Jack, you will find more fun down on the ground, where you may get even upon the annoying multitude by letting your nerves rasp some one else's."

"I thought, my dear," observed Jack at this juncture, and yawning deeply, "that we resolved early in the evening to engage in conversation."

"Why, so we shall, Jack, if you will only advance a subject."

"My dear girl," said Jack, "a good talker can talk well about nothing, a good writer can write well about nothing, a good cook—"

"Stop there, Jack."

"Perhaps I am wandering far afield there, Betsy. But, tell me, women keep up an incessant and most outrageous gabble when they come together. What do they talk about?"

"Sometimes they talk about their cooks, their seamstresses, and their babies; sometimes about their cooks, their seamstresses, and their bric-a-brac; just now about their cooks, their seamstresses, and Mrs. Langtry."

"Betsy," roared Jack, "if you mention that woman's name aloud you shall not see her when she comes to San Francisco. I am ill of Mrs. Langtry. I am nauseated with Mrs. Langtry. My morning paper is so full of her that I can't find out who is elected. My evening paper is so full of her that there is no room for proper editorial abuse of the opposing party. She stares at me from the shop windows, she turns her Greek profile to me from parlor walls, she bends her eyes upon me from parlor tables. The world of sound has become a tuneless jumble of Langtry, Langtry, Langtry. I will have no more of it. In my own house it is a forbidden word. And what do women say of her, Betsy?"

"They say they wonder what it is that makes her beauty, for they pick flaws unceasingly in her mouth, her nose, her size."

"Amiable creatures," quoth Jack, "that can not see the beauty of those mystic following eyes, of that superb Greek head, of those graceful shoulders, and that beautiful neck with its dimpling suggestion of anatomy at the link of the collar-bone, with—"

"Hold, my dear Jack," I cry, "any one to hear you would take you for one of the thirty-two reporters who were the first ones next morning after succumbing to the fascination of her smile. By the way, would you call that last fight of yours conversation?"

"Well, no, Bess," said Jack, shamefacedly, and a trifle sleepily. I think we shall give over conversation for to-night, as we do not seem at any period of the evening to have quite hit upon my idea of it. It requires that we shall both be in a sparkling mood, and some time, when I hit upon that happy coincidence, I shall expound my theory. Till then, my dear, let us contentedly remain mere every-day chatterers."

"But, Jack—"

"What do you want, my dear?"

"Nothing, Jack, but the last word in what has not been a conversation. It is my prerogative. Good-night."

"Companions in Distress."—Declined.

"Annette."—Declined.

"Think of Me."—We think of you altogether too much now, Mr. S. Run your poetry works on half time for a while. We have declined much MS. from you, politely but firmly. We now decline this firmly.

"The New Zealanders."—The article is well written, and contains much information—perhaps too much. The interest taken by people here in colonial matters is so slight, however, as not to warrant its publication. M.S. awaits your disposal.

"P. C. E."—The paragraph to which you refer was copied from London Truth, and was so credited. The statement that Souloque was "Emperor of Otobiti" was doubtless caused by a typographical error—in the manuscript.

"Socorro."—Not in our line. Send it to one of the dailies.

"Pallas Athene" and Others—The Carnival and "Cato" have both been forgotten. Better let them rest.

"E. E. H."—To your profane inquiry, "Who in—is A. L. Hart?" caused by the Marysville Appeal's enthusiastic advocacy of that gentleman, we might reply that it doesn't make very much difference now. He has been attorney-general, and was going to be again. But he has changed his mind. Some unforeseen occurrence on Tuesday, we believe.

—COMELY! ATTRACTIVE! WINNING! These expressive words are often and properly applied to the fair ladies of our favored land, who keep their hair abundant and natural in color and lustre by the timely use of Ayer's Hair Vigor. SOLD FOR A SONG.

Ballads that have Caught the Public Fancy.

"He who writes a popular song may live and die in obscurity," said a dealer in music to a New York Star reporter. Some years ago, when Rollin Howard composed a song and dance, he took his production, of which he felt very proud, to Pond & Co., and offered to sell it to them. They looked it over and returned it with the remark: "We do not publish such stuff as that." Mr. Howard pocketed his discomfiture in silence and sadly wended his way homeward. A short time after this Howard went to Boston, where he was engaged to sing in a minstrel company. One night Mr. C. A. White, the composer and publisher, heard Howard, and offered to publish his discarded song. This is how "Shoo, Fly, Don't Bother Me" came to see the light. It soon became popular all over the land. The publisher sold over two hundred thousand copies, and with the profit established the well-known Boston firm of White, Smith & Co. A song is popular when it catches the public fancy, and the best songs seldom become popular. The ballad, or comic ditty, is about the extent of popular appreciation. In these you will find a simple melodic period, such as "Wait till the Clouds Roll by, Jenny," and "Tommy Dodd." There is no effort of the mind to glide, as it were, through these. "Wait till the Clouds Roll by, Jenny," by H. J. Fulmer, has captured the popular fancy, and will continue to sell for some time. Close on the heels of this piece comes an answer to it—"The Clouds are Rolling by, Jenny," by Maylath, a much superior song in every way, and likely to be as popular. Then we have "In the Morning by the Bright Light," by James A. Bland, the colored song-writer, and the best of his kind. All his pieces have become popular, and include "Keep dem Gates Wide Open," "Won't We Have a Jolly Time?" "Oh, dem Golden Slippers," and "De Angels am Coming."

Another piece that is likely to become popular is "Peek-a-boo." In the list is "When the Leaves Begin to Turn," by C. A. White, of Boston. It is a beautiful waltz song. There is a fund of the popular songs sung by Harrigan and Hart. I need only mention "Babies on Our Block," "The Skids are Out To-day," "Whist, the Bogie Man," "Little Widow Dunn," "Never Take the Horseshoe from the Door." In trade we call a song popular when it reaches a sale of ten thousand copies. Many editions only reach five thousand, and some do not run beyond five hundred copies. There may not appear to be any value to a song until it goes before the public. If they catch on, then the value of the song is assured. Many good pieces—real gems of song—have been published by Pond which do not go beyond the artist's studio. Among this class is a sweet thing called, "Say not my Love will Change with Time," written by Albert Rowse. When Harrigan and Hart sold the "Mulligan Guards" for fifty dollars they did not expect that it would march to the tune of one hundred thousand copies. "The Hildebrandt Montrose" song they sold for twenty-five dollars, and the publishers worked off two hundred thousand copies. Many of our most popular songs have been written by authors on the other side of the water. Our home names are Harrison Millard, Will S. Hays, S. C. Foster, J. R. Thomas, H. P. Danks, Henry Tucker, W. H. Brockway, C. A. White, J. T. Ordway, E. Root, J. A. Bland, G. Operti, Harry Birch, B. F. Baker, and others. These men do not all write their own words, most of them buy the poems. There are few good song-poets—the best, perhaps, being Mr. George Cooper. His remuneration is poor, ranging from five to ten dollars for a song outright. Many of them possess genuine merit. When the composers sell a song they receive from fifty to one hundred dollars, and sometimes two hundred dollars. Some will only take a commission on the sales, and secure a handsome profit should the piece reach public favor. When Danks wrote "Silver Threads among the Gold" he sold it for forty dollars. After it was published the purchaser sold four hundred thousand copies, and the piece is still sought for. Harrison Millard made money by writing music. While holding a comfortable position in the Custom House, he managed to secure a small fortune by his muse. His "Viva l'America" brought him twenty-five hundred dollars, and his song, "When the Tide Comes In," has been worth one thousand dollars a year. The song "Waiting" is now looked upon as a stock-selling piece, the publishers disposing of six thousand copies a year, while his "Under the Daisies" sells at the rate of seven thousand copies.

"Mollie Darling" has had a sale of something like half a million copies. J. A. Barry composed "Little Footsteps," and sold it for five dollars. The publishers made money, disposing of seventy-five thousand copies. Hays's songs, "Little Old Cabin in the Lane" and "We Parted by the Riverside," each had a sale of one hundred thousand. Ordway's song, "Dreaming of Home, Mother," reached a sale of fifty to sixty thousand. "How the Gates Came Ajar," by Eastburn, reached a sale of one hundred thousand. Brockway sold his "Little Sweetheart, Come and Kiss Me" for twenty-five dollars, and the publishers ran out an edition of twenty-five thousand copies. "The Old Folks at Home," by Foster, reached a sale of four hundred thousand copies, and still continues to be bought. "The Sword of Bunker Hill" reached a sale of one hundred thousand copies, and the famous temperance song, "Father, Come Home," written by Work, has had a sale of three hundred thousand copies. English songs are very readily sold in this country. The famous London popular song, "Pull Down the Blind," had not been introduced here a couple of months when fifty thousand copies were sold. "Let me Dream Again," by Arthur Sullivan, has reached to one hundred thousand copies and is still a favorite. "What are the Wild Waves Saying" has been sold to the number of three hundred thousand copies, while "Champagne Charley," "Good bye, Charlie," "Won't You Tell Me Why, Robin?" "Five O'clock in the Morning," and some few others, have had very large sales. Among the other English composers who have been popular in this country are Gooch, Leybourne, Claribel, and Raphaelson. There is just now a growing demand for English songs by Cowen, Dolby, Gatty, and J. L. Molloy, author of "The Little Tin Soldier," "The Clang of the Wooden Shoon," "Thady O'Flynn," "King's Highway," "Kerry Dance." The better class in the community buy these songs—those who have received first-class musical educations and have even been abroad and studied the piano. It is really pitiful sometimes to go into a fine drawing-room, and see a lady sit down to the piano and rattle off for hours the simple melodies heard at every street corner, when works by such great composers as Schumann, Mendelssohn, Liszt, Chopin, Beethoven, and Mozart are neglected.

CREAM FRITTERS.—Break in a saucepan three whole eggs and the yolks of two eggs; add two ounces of fine sugar, and mix well; add a quarter of a pound of flour, and mix again; dilute with a pint of milk, and put in the rind of half a lemon; boil slowly for ten minutes, stirring all the time with a wooden spoon; add one ounce and a half of butter; mix again. Spread this preparation in a flat dish, so that it will make about one-half inch in thickness; the dish must be buttered; let it cool; then turn the pan over on a floured board, and cut the preparation in oblong pieces, two and a half inches by four; dip these in beaten eggs and white bread crumbs; fry a nice color; drain, and sprinkle fine sugar over them, and dish them up on a folded napkin.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

AN OLD PHYSICIAN, retired from practice, having had placed in his hands by an East India missionary the formula of a simple vegetable remedy for the speedy and permanent cure for Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Affections, also a positive and radical cure for Nervous Debility and all Nervous Complaints, after having tested its wonderful curative powers in thousands of cases, has felt it his duty to make it known to his suffering fellows. Actuated by this motive and a desire to relieve human suffering, I will send free of charge, to all who desire it, this recipe, in German, French, or English, with full directions for preparing and using. Sent by mail by addressing with stamp, naming this paper, W. A. NOYES, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, New York.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

From Snake River to Cœur d'Alene Mountains.

[Our readers will remember the Washington Territory bard who wrote and sent us that remarkable poem, "The Meeting of the Columbia & The Snake." At our suggestion he adopted a pen-name, striking for its beauty, and smacking of the woods of Washington (Ty.)—to wit, "Siniacuateen." He has now sent us another poem, in a number of cantos, with explanatory and exegetical notes. We regret that its length prevents us from printing it, but some of the more beautiful passages we can not pass heedlessly by. There are suggestions of Southey in these lines, turns of expression which remind one of Longfellow and Tennyson; yet the most capricious critic can not deny that they are entirely original.—Eds.]

Really this is fine, riding along the line,
By murmuring brooks and swaying pine
Of the N. P. R. in a Pullman Palace car
What matters it if the stock's above or below par
First over the river Snake with a slight jolt an' a shake.

To cross that stream a ferry we take;
Then through a rolling land, of sage-brush, cactus and sand.

By many a horned, bunch grass fattening hand;
Now rushing through a coulee: (a mighty river bed formed duly);

In hygone ages the waters of the Columbia ran here surely!

"Dead Columbia" this I quote, for some one, those words wrote;

Was it these old river bottoms, set that saying afloat?
Here the gaunt and shaggy coyotes, most of the time denotes.

When the pale light of the silver moon o'er the prairie gloates,

To sending forth horrible howls, betwixt moaning yelps and growling growls,

As over the rolling bunch grass land he prowls,
Through willow brake, and under rocky cliffs we take

For eight miles by the shallow waters of Big Lake;
Thousands of wild ducks and geese, skim the waters here in peace

When not disturbed by the crack of a fowling-piece.
After a hundred and eight mile ride, into Sprague
Station we glide

Where the new shops of the Northern Pacific loom up with pride.

'Twas in the month of May, on, I believe, the ninth day:

In 1831,—at least, so the people say,
"First train came into Sprague; and a railroader lost his leg,"

("Tis a great pity, if he has to wear a peg")

Now we're into Montana; where miners have cried
"Hosana,"

Having struck a bonanza; when it "petered-out"
"twas "dam-er."

In the gloomy hour of midnight, at Rock Island
Landing we alight,

Three hundred miles away from where I started to write.

It now being rather late, nothing more I will relate.
Of the pleasures here to be had I'll write some other date.

SINIAQUEATEEN.

The Fashion Club at Sugar Pine.

I reside at Cable Mansion, and my name is Sarah Jane.

I am not up in grammar, and I talk exceeding plain;
But, as well as I am able, I will try to tell you how
The Fashion Club at Sugar Pine disbanded in a row.

But first I would interpolate that I have never joined,
And the information I submit has chiefly been purloined

From a post of observation close beside the parlor door,

And it's accurate and truthful, if it isn't nothing more.
Now, nothing could be finer or more proper, I opine,
Than the opening proceedings of that Club at Sugar Pine.

Till Miss Potwin of Sonora brought a gaudy fashion-plate,

And submitted it as something very neat and very late;

And she quoted lots of poetry, and warmly urged the Chair

To aid the introduction of a style so debonair.

Then Miss Dugan the elder begged permission of the floor,

Till she could prove that fashion-plate appeared in '34.

Then Miss Potwin made apology, and closed with the remark

That it seemed she had encroached upon some relics of the ark;

And, putting on her sweetest smile, she said that she was sure

She would yield to an experience so varied and mature.

Now, I hold 'twas not expedient, nor soothing to the mind,

To introduce statistics there of this peculiar kind;
Nor did it help the matter for the lady who was meant
To raise her voice an octave and ignore the president.

Then the stately Miss McGowan tried to say a word or so;

But her style was rather heavy, and she didn't have a show;

So she sank upon the sofa with a melancholy air,
And awaited the conclusion of this intricate affair.

For, in less than half a minute, every member took her stand

Upon one side or the other of the topic then in hand;
And they all expressed opinions with a frankness that is rare,

Until five were in hysterics, and the rest were swapping hair.

I do not need to tell you the recital gives me pain,
For I live at Cable Mansion, and my name is Sarah
Jane;

And, as well as I was able, I have tried to tell you how

The Fashion Club at Sugar Pine disbanded in a row.

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR,

For Restoring Gray Hair to its Natural Vitality and Color.

Advancing years, sickness, care, disappointment, and hereditary predisposition, all turn the hair gray, and either of them incline it to shed prematurely.

AYER'S HAIR VIGOR, by long and extensive use, has proven that it stops the falling of the hair immediately; often restores the growth, and always surely restores its color when faded or gray. It stimulates the nutritive organs to healthy activity, and preserves both the hair and its beauty.

Thus brassy, weak, or sticky hair becomes glossy, pliable, and strengthened; lost hair re-grows with lively expression; falling hair is checked and stabilized; thin hair thickens, and faded or gray hairs resume their original color. Its operation is sure and harmless. It cures dandruff, heals all humors, and keeps the scalp cool, clean, and soft—under which conditions, diseases of the scalp are impossible.

As a Dressing for Ladies' Hair, the Vigor is praised for its grateful and agreeable perfume, and valued for the soft lustre and richness of tone it imparts.

A Leading London Physician establishes an Office in New York for the Cure of EPILEPTIC FITS.

From Am. Journal of Medicine.

Dr. Ab. Meserole (late of London), who makes a specialty of Epilepsy, has without doubt treated and cured more cases than any other living physician. His success has simply been astonishing; we have heard of cases of over 20 years' standing successfully cured by him. He has published a work on this disease, which he sends with a large bottle of his wonderful cure free to any sufferer who may send him a written and P. O. Address. We address any one wishing a cure to address Dr. AB. MESEROLE, No. 55 John St., New York.

vs.
JAMES DALY, ET AL.,
Defendants.

Superior Court.

No. 22,921.

(Late 4th District Court.

ALIAS EXECUTION.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN

Alias Execution issued out of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, duly attested on the 11th day of October, A. D. 1882, in the above entitled action, wherein The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above named plaintiff, obtained a judgment against James Daly and Michael Hawkins, defendants, on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1879, for the sum of Six Thousand ($6,000.00) Dollars, lawful money of the United States, which amount is entitled to a credit of $2-783.18 made on two former executions, with interest thereon and costs, etc., I have levied upon all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the sixteenth day of October, 1882, the day upon which the hereinbefore described property was levied upon in the above entitled cause, or which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the hereinafter described property situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, standing of record in the office of the County Recorder of said City and County in the names of James Daly Michael Hawkins, John O. Kane, and A. J. Moon, and bounded and described as follows: Commencing at a point on the northerly line of Broadway Street, 95 3-12 feet easterly from Baker Street; thence running westerly along said line of Broadway Street 65 3-12 feet to the easterly line of Baker Street; thence running northerly along said line of Baker Street 136 feet; thence easterly parallel with Broadway Street 63 5-12 feet; and thence southeasterly to the point of beginning.

Public notice is hereby given that on MONDAY, the 13th day of NOVEMBER, 1882, at 12 o'clock noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall in the City and County of San Francisco, I will sell all the right, title, and interest which the said defendants, James Daly and Michael Hawkins, had on the 16th day of October, 1882, the day on which the above property was levied upon, as aforesaid, or which they may have subsequently acquired in and to the above described property, to the highest and best bidder for lawful money of the United States.

PRIVATE ASYLUM,

For the Care and Treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases.

THE PROPRIETARY INSTITUTION
called THE PACIFIC ASYLUM, where the insane of the State of Nevada have been kept for several years, will be opened as a PRIVATE ASYLUM for the care and treatment of Mental and Nervous Diseases, on the 10th of August, 1882, the Nevada patients having been removed to the new State Asylum at Reno. The buildings are capacious and comfortable, having been constructed for the accommodation of over two hundred patients, and they are pleasantly situated in the suburbs of Stockton, and are surrounded by attractive grounds of forty acres in extent, with cultivated gardens and pleasant walks. Its advantages over public institutions in facility of admission and in procuring extra accommodations if required, are obvious. For terms and other particulars apply to the Proprietor and Superintendent, DR. ASA CLARK, Pacific Asylum, Stockton, Cal.

SAN LEANDRO

VILLAGE CARTS

PIANO BOX, WITH TOP.

The above cut is a very poor representation of a very stylish turn-out, especially for horse-men and livery stables. Nothing more attractive in the whole line of vehicles can be found than one of the above (with top thrown back, as shown) carrying two men and drawn by two fine horses, or even one.

When requested, I give a written guarantee as follows with each vehicle:

First—I warrant it to be wholly free from that jolting and annoying bobbing motion common to other two wheeled vehicles, which tires the occupant and hurts the horse's back, and to ride as smoothly and easily as the best buggy. I think no other responsible maker dare give such a warranty.

Second—My Patent Leveling Device simply perfects two-wheeled vehicles, and makes my Village Carts, in connection with their admirable system of springs and link-hangings, equal in every important respect to a four-wheeled vehicle. The Leveling Device enables the occupant to level the body in a moment, whether a large or small horse is used, and entirely prevents the seat from tipping backward or forward. This advantage is peculiar to this vehicle alone.

Third—The body is independent of the shafts, and can move up and down freely 10 or 12 inches, remaining level while doing so.

Samples of these Carts may be seen at Studebaker Bros., corner Main and Market Streets, San Francisco.

Prices from $90 to $135. Send for illustrated circular and price list. Address

INTO THE SUN.

The Flaming Transit and Fiery Death of the Comet of Eighty-Two.

SCENE—San Francisco. TIME—1883.

"And so you think, doctor, that the comet which has just been reported from South America is the same as last year's comet—the one discovered first by Cruls at Rio Janeiro, I mean, and which was afterward so plainly visible to us here all through the month of October?"

"Judging from the statement in the papers regarding its general appearance, and the course in which it is traveling, I do not see to what other conclusion we can come. It is approaching the sun from the same quarter as last year's comet; it resembles it in appearance; its rate of motion is as great, if not greater; all these things are very strong arguments of identity."

"But, then, how do you account for so speedy a return? This is only the end of August, and last year's comet was computed to have passed its perihelion about the eighteenth of September—scarcely a year ago. Even Encke's and Biela's comets, which are denizens of our solar system, so to speak, have longer periods than that."

"I account for it simply on the hypothesis that this comet passes so close to the sun that its motion is retarded, and its course consequently changed after every such approach. I believe, with Mr. Proctor and Professor Boss, that this is the comet of 1843 and 1880; that it is moving in a succession of eccentric spirals, the curvatures of which have reduced its periods of revolution from perhaps many hundreds of years to—at its last recorded return—thirty-seven years, then to two and a fraction, and now to less than one; and that its ultimate destination is to be precipitated into the sun."

"This is certainly startling, supposing your hypothesis to be correct; and should such a casualty happen, what result would you anticipate?"

"That demands some consideration. Take another cigar, and we shall look into the matter."

The foregoing conversation took place in the rooms of my friend Doctor Arkwright, upon Market Street; the time was about eleven o'clock at night; the date, the twenty-seventh of August; the interrogations had been mine and the answers the doctor's. I may add that the doctor was a chemist of no mean attainments, and took great interest in all scientific discussions and experiments.

"The effect of the collision of a comet with the sun," observed the doctor, as he lit his cigar, "would depend upon a good many conditions. It would depend primarily upon the mass, momentum, and velocity of the comet—something, too, upon its constitution. Let me see that paragraph again. Ah, here it is," and the doctor proceeded to read from the paper:

"RIO JANEIRO, August 18th.—The comet was again visible last evening, before and after sunset, about thirty degrees from the sun. Mr. Cruls pronounces it identical with the comet of last year. It is approaching the sun at the rate of two and a half degrees a day. R. A., at noon, yesterday, 178°, 24'; Dec. 83°, 40', S."

"Now this," he went on, "corresponds exactly with the position and motion of last year's comet. It came from a point nearly due south of the sun, consequently was invisible to the northern hemisphere before perihelion."

"Pardon me," I interrupted, "but you remember the newspaper predictions regarding last year's comet were to the effect that it would speedily become invisible to us here, whereas it continued to adorn the morning skies for weeks, till it faded away in the remote distance."

"That was because the nature of its orbit was not distinctly understood. The plane of the comet's orbit cut the plane of the earth's orbit nearly at right angles, but the major axis, or general direction of this orbit in space, was also inclined some fifty degrees to our plane; and so it came about that while the approach of the comet was from a point somewhat east of south, its return journey into space was along a line some twenty degrees south of west, which threw its course nearly along the line of the celestial equator; consequently, last year's comet was visible in the early morning, not only to us, but to every inhabitant of the earth between the sixtieth parallel north and the south pole, until the vast distance caused it to disappear. But, as I was going to say when you interrupted me, if the distance of the comet from the sun was only thirty degrees when observed at Rio Janeiro, nine days ago, and its speed was then two and a half degrees a day, it can not be far from perihelion now, especially as its speed increases as it approaches the sun."

"Suppose it should strike the sun this time," said I, "what results would you predict?"

"A solid globe," replied the doctor, "of the size of our earth, if falling upon the sun with the momentum resulting from direct attraction from its present position in space, would engender sufficient heat to maintain the solar fires at their existing standard, without further supply, for about ninety years. This calculation does not involve great scientific or mathematical knowledge, but, on the contrary, is as simple as it is reliable, because we have positive data to go upon in the mass and momentum of our planet. But with a comet the case is different. We do not know what elements its nucleus is composed of. It is true we know the value of its momentum; but what does that tell us if we do not know its density or its mass? A momentum of four hundred miles a second—the estimated rate of speed of the present comet at perihelion—would undoubtedly engender fierce combustion were the comet a ponderable body. On the other hand, large bodies composed of fluid matter highly volatilized might collide with the sun without any appreciable effect."

"Have we any data to go upon in this matter?" I inquired.

"With regard to our own sun," replied the doctor, "we have not; but several suggestive circumstances have occurred in the case of other suns which lead us to infer that something similar might happen to our own. Some years ago, a star in the constellation Cygnus was observed to suddenly blaze out with extraordinary brilliancy, its lustre increasing from that of a star of the sixth magnitude—but faintly distinguishable to the unaided eye—to that of a star of the first. This brilliancy was maintained for several days, when it resumed its original condition. Now, it is fair to infer that this great increase of light may have been caused by the precipitation of some large solid body—a planet, a comet, or perhaps another sun—upon the sun in question; and, as light and heat are now understood to be merely different modes or expressions of the same quality of motion, it is fair to infer further that the increment of heat corresponded to that of light."

"What, then, do you suppose would be the natural effect upon ourselves here, on this planet, by some such catastrophe as you have just imagined happening to our own sun?" I asked.

"The light and heat of our luminary might be increased a hundred fold, or a thousand fold, according to the nature of the collision. One can conceive of combustion so fierce as to evaporate all of our oceans in one short minute, or even to volatilize the solid matter of our planet in less than that time, like a globule of mercury in a hot-air chamber. 'Large' and 'small' are not absolute, but relative, terms in Nature's vocabulary; both are equally amenable to her laws," sentimentally observed the doctor.

"A comforting reflection, certainly," I remarked. "Let us hope we shall not be favored with any such experience."

"Who can tell?" rejoined the doctor, as he rose from his seat. "Excuse me for a minute. You know there is a balloon ascension from Woodward's Gardens to-morrow, and there is a new ingredient I am going to introduce at the inflation. The stuff wants a little more mixing. Take another cigar. I won't be a minute."

I sat back and meditated as I listened to the retreating footsteps of the doctor, as he passed into an adjoining room. I looked at the clock. It was half past eleven. It was a warm night for San Francisco in August—remarkably so, in fact. I got up to open the window, and as I did so the doctor entered the room again.

"What is that?" I exclaimed, involuntarily, as I threw up the sash. And the spectacle which met my gaze as I did so, certainly warranted the exclamation.

Doctor Arkwright's rooms were on the north side of Market Street, and the inferior height of the buildings opposite afforded an uninterrupted view of the horizon to the south and east. Over the tops of the houses to the east could be seen a thin, livid line, marking the waters of the bay, and beyond it the serrated outline of the Alameda hills. All this was normal and just as I had seen it a hundred times before, but in the northeast the sky was lit up with a lurid, dull red glow, which extended northward along the horizon in a broadening arc, till the view was shut out by the street line to our left. This light resembled in all respects the aurora borealis, except that of color. Instead of the cold, clear radiance of the northern light, we were confronted with an angry, blood-red glare which ever and anon shot forks, and tongues, and streamers of fire upward toward the zenith. It was as if some vast conflagration were in progress to our north. But what, I asked myself, could produce so extensive, so powerful an illumination? Vast forest fires, or the burning of large cities, make themselves manifest by a sky-reflected glare for great distances, but they do not display the regularity—or the harmony, so to speak—which was apparent in the present instance. The conclusion was inevitable that the phenomenon was not local in its source.

As we looked out at the window we could see that the scene had arrested the attention of others besides ourselves. Little knots of people had collected on the sidewalk; larger knots at the street corners; and the passers-by kept turning their heads to gaze at the strange spectacle. At the same time the air was growing heavier and more sultry every minute. There was not a breath stirring, but an ominous and preternatural calm seemed to brood over the city, like that which in some climates is the precursor of a storm, and which here is frequently known as "earthquake weather."

The doctor broke the silence.

"This is something quite out of the common run of events," he exclaimed. "That light in the north must have a cause. All the Sonoma and Mendocino redwoods, with the pineries of Oregon and Washington Territory thrown in, would not make such a blaze as that. Besides, that is not the sort of sky-reflection a forest fire would cause."

"Just my own idea," I asserted.

"Let us see if we can not connect it with a wider origin. It is now nearly midnight. That light is in the north. The sun's rays are now illuminating the other side of the globe. It is, therefore, sunrise on the Atlantic, noon in eastern Europe, and sunset in western Asia. When you came here, scarcely an hour ago, the heavens were clear, and the temperature normal. Whatever has given rise to this extraordinary phenomenon has done so within the last hour. Even since we began to look I see that the extremity of the illuminated arc has shifted further to the east. That light has its origin in the sun, but it altogether passes the bounds of experience."

"Might we not connect it with the comet we have just been speaking about?" I suggested. "It should now be near its perihelion point."

"That must be it," acquiesced the doctor. "Who knows but that the fiery wanderer has actually come in contact with the sun? Let us go out."

We put on our hats, and left the building. All along the sidewalks we came upon excited groups staring at the strange light, and speculating upon its cause. The general expression of opinion referred it to some vast forest fire, though there were not wanting religious enthusiasts who saw in it a manifestation of divine wrath, or a portent of the predicted consummation of all things; for in the uninformed human mind there is no middle ground between the grossly practical and the purely fanatical. We hurried along Market Street and turned down Kearny, where the crowds were even denser and more anxious-looking. Arrived at the Chronicle office, I noticed that a succession of messengers from the various telegraph offices were encountering each other on the stairs of the building.

"If you will wait a minute," I said to the doctor, "I will run up-stairs and find out what is the matter."

"Strange news from the East," said the telegraphic editor, hurriedly, in answer to my question, at the same time pointing to a little pile of dispatches. "These have been coming in for the last half hour from all points of the Union."

I took up one, and read the contents:

NEW YORK, 3:15 A. M.—Extraordinary light just broke out over the eastern horizon. Very red and threatening. Seems to proceed from a great distance out at sea. People unable to assign cause.

Another ran as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, 4:10 A. M.—Vivid conflagration reflected in the sky, a little north of east. General sentiment that vast fires have sprung up in the cane-brakes. Population abroad and anxious.

"There are a score more," remarked the editor, "from Chicago, Memphis, Canada—everywhere, in fact—all to the same purpose. What do you make of it?"

"The phenomenon is evidently universal," I said. "It must have its origin in the sun. Do you notice how hot and stifling the air is getting? Have you any dispatches from Europe?"

"None yet. Ah, here is a cablegram repeated from New York," said the editor, taking a dispatch from the hand of a messenger who just then entered; "this may tell us something. Listen:

"LONDON, 7:45 A. M.—Five minutes ago sun's heat became overpowering. Business stopped. People falling dead in streets. Thermometer risen from 52° to 113°. Still rising. Message from Greenwich Observatory says—"

"The dispatch stops abruptly there," interpolated the editor, "and the New York operator goes on thus: 'Message cut short. Nothing more through cable. Intense alarm everywhere. Light and heat increasing.'"

"Well," said I, "it must be as Doctor Arkwright suggested. The comet observed again at Rio Janeiro, ten days ago, has fallen into the sun. Heaven only knows what we had better do."

"I shall edit these dispatches and get the paper out, at any rate," said the editor, with determination. "Ah, here comes the ice for the printers," as half a dozen men filed past the door, each with a sack upon his shoulder. "The paper must come out if the earth burns for it. I fancy we can hold out until sunrise, and before then the worst may be over."

I left the office, rejoined the doctor in the street, and told him the news.

"There is no doubt about it," he remarked at once. "The comet of last year has fallen into the sun. All the telegraphic messages were nearly identical in time, as it is now just midnight here, and consequently about four o'clock in New York, and eight o'clock in England."

"What had we better do?" queried I.

"I do not think there is any cause for immediate alarm," replied the doctor. "We shall see whether the heat increases materially between now and sunrise, and take measures accordingly. Meanwhile let us look about us."

The scenes of alarm were intensified in the streets as we passed along. It seemed as if half the population of the city had left their houses, and gathered in the most public places. Thousands of people were pushing and jostling each other in the neighborhood of the various newspaper offices in frantic endeavors to get a glimpse of the bulletin boards, where the substance of the various telegrams was posted up as fast as they came in. Multitudes of hacks and express wagons were driving hither and thither, crowded with family parties seemingly intent upon leaving the city, and probably without any definite aim or accurate comprehension of what they were doing or whither they were going.

As the hours wore on toward morning the angry moved farther along the horizon, its outlines grew and brighter, and its flaming crest towered more and more into the heavens. Nothing could be conceived more ghastly, more calculated to produce feelings of but and to convince the spectator of his utter powerlessness to cope with an inevitable and inexorable event, than this blood-red arch of flame which spread over one-fourth of the apparent horizon. The air, too, was momentarily growing heavier and more stifling. A glance at a thermometer in one of the hotels gave a temperature of 114°.

Between two and three o'clock four successive alarms of fire were sounded from the lower quarters of the city. Two large wholesale houses and a liquor store, in three contiguous blocks, caught fire, evidently the work of incendiaries. Multitudes of the worst rabble collected, as if by concert, in the business quarters. Shops and warehouses were broken into and looted—the police force, though working vigorously, not being strong enough to arrest the work of pillage, backed as it was by the moral terrors of the night, and the general paralysis which unnerved the better class of citizens. Strange scenes were being enacted at every corner and on every street. Groups of women kneeling upon sidewalks, and rending the air with prayers and lamentations, were jostled aside by ruffians wild and furious with liquor. A procession of religious fanatics, chanting shrill and discordant hymns, and bearing lanterns in their hands, passed unheeded through the crowded streets, and we could afterward watch them threading their way up the steep side of Telegraph Hill. In short, the terrible and bizarre effects of that fearful night would overtax the pen of a Dante to describe, or the pencil of a Doré to portray.

"Let us go home," said the doctor, looking at his watch. "It is now half past three. The temperature of the atmosphere is evidently rising. The chances are that it will become unbearable after sunrise. We must consider what is best to do."

We pushed our way back through the crowded streets, past despairing and terror-stricken men and wailing women; but as we passed the bulletin boards at the corner of Bush and Kearny streets, it was encouraging to mark that at least one earthly industry would continue to go on till the mechanism could run no longer, and that the world would, at any rate, get full particulars of its approaching doom, so long as wires could transmit them, compositors set them in type, and pressmen print them. I felt that the power and grandeur of the press had never been more fully exemplified than in the regular and ceaseless pulsations of its machinery as the daily issue was being thrown off, with the news that the other hemisphere was in conflagration, and that a few short hours would in all probability witness the same catastrophe in our own.

The last two wagons which had driven up with ice for the employees had been boarded and sacked by the thirsty mob, and, looking down into the press room, as I entered the building, I could see the pressmen stripped to the waist in that terrible hot-air bath, while up-stairs the telegraphic editor was in similar deshabille, with the additional feature of a wet towel bound round his temples. He motioned to the latest dispatch from New York as I entered. I took it up and read as follows:

NEW YORK, 6 A. M.—Sun just risen. Heat terrible. Air suffocating. People seeking shade. Thousands bathing off the docks. Thousands killed by sunstroke.

"Almost a recapitulation of the London message of three hours ago," I said, as I hurried out. "Three hours hence we may expect the same here."

I rejoined the doctor in the street, and together we proceeded to his apartments.

"Now," said he, as I told him the purport of the last message, "there is only one thing to be done if we wish to save our lives. It is a chance if even this plan will succeed, but at all events there is a chance."

"What is it?" I asked, eagerly.

"I take it," answered he, "that the increase of heat and light which will accrue as soon as the sun rises above the horizon, must prove fatal to all animal life beneath the influence of his beams. The population of Europe, and, by this time, I doubt not, of all this country east of the Mississippi, is next to annihilated. With us it is but a question of time, unless—"

"Unless what?" I exclaimed, excitedly, as he paused meditatively.

"Unless we are willing to run a great risk," he added. "You are philosopher enough to know that heat and light are simply modes of motion—expressions, so to speak, of the same molecular action of the elements they pass through or agitate. They have no intrinsic being in themselves, no entity, no existence, as it were, independent of outside matter. In their case the two forms of outside matter affected by them are the ether pervading space and the atmosphere of our planet. Do you follow?"

"Certainly," I replied, impatiently, for I dreaded one of the doctor's disquisitions at such a critical moment as this. "But, my dear sir, what is the practical application of your theorem? How can we apply it to the case in point?"

"In this wise," he went on: "heat—that is, the heat we have to do with now—is caused by the action of the sun's rays upon our atmosphere. If we get beyond the limits of that atmosphere, what then? Simply, we have no heat. Ascend to a sufficient altitude, even under the cloudless rays of the vertical sun, and you will freeze to death. The limit of perpetual snow is not an extreme one."

"I catch your idea perfectly," I assented. "I concede the accuracy of your premises. But what does it avail us? The Sierra Nevada mountains are practically as far off as the peaks of the Himalayas."

"There are other means," rejoined the doctor, "of attaining the necessary altitude. A balloon ascension, as you are aware, was to have taken place to-day from Woodward's Gardens. I was going to assist at the inflation, to test a new method of generating gas. I now propose that we endeavor to gain possession of the balloon and make the ascension. I do not think we shall be anticipated or thwarted in doing so."

"Agreed," I said. "Any risk is preferable to being roasted to death."

We must remember that the risk of the balloon hursting, the expansion of the gas, is great; for we shall be not only to its normal expansion, should we penetrate upper atmospheric strata, but to its abnormal expansion through heat, should we fail to do so in time. Shaking the dice with Death in any case," I announced, and proceeded to assist the doctor in packing the apparatus and chemicals he had prepared over night; and, having done so, we left the building, and hastened southward along Market Street. The cars were not running, and the carriages we saw paid no heed to our importunities; so the precious time seemed to fly past, while we swiftly covered the mile which separated us from the gardens. The gates were luckily open, and none of the employees visible, so we made for the spot where the balloon, half inflated, lay like some slimy antediluvian monster in its lair. We adjusted the apparatus and arranged the ropes as speedily as possible, and waited anxiously while the great bag slowly swelled and shook, rearing itself and falling back by turns, but gradually assuming more and more spherical proportions.

Meanwhile we had again opportunity to observe the condition of the atmosphere and the heavens. It was already half past four, and in less than an hour the sun would spring up in the east. The pale, bluish tints of daybreak were beginning to assert themselves beside the lurid semi-circle which flamed above them. This latter changed to a hard, coppery hue as daylight became stronger, but preserved its contour unchanged. The heat became more oppressive, the thermometer we had brought with us now registering 133°. Strange sounds were wafted in from the city—meaningless, indeed, but rendered fearfully suggestive by the circumstances of the morning. The animals howled unceasingly from their cages, and we could hear their frantic struggles for liberty. One cat-like form that had made good its escape shot past us in the gloom. Had the whole menagerie been set free at that moment, we should have had nothing to fear from them, so great is the influence elemental crises exert over the brute creation.

We had at last the satisfaction of seeing the great globe swing clear of the ground, though not yet fully inflated, and tug at the ropes which moored it. We had already placed the ballast-bags and other necessary articles in the car, when, perspiring at every pore, we simultaneously cut the last ropes, and rose heavily into the air. There was not a breath of wind stirring, but our course was guided slightly east in the direction of the bay.

It was now broad daylight, and the upper limb of the sun appeared above the horizon as we estimated our altitude, from surrounding objects, at about a thousand feet. As the full orb appeared the heat became more intense, and by the doctor's direction we swathed our heads in flannel, sprinkled sparingly with a preparation of ether and alcohol, the swift evaporation of which imparted coolness for a short time. The sky had now assumed the appearance of a vast brazen dome, and the waters of the ocean to the west and the bay beneath us reflected the dull, dead, pitiless glare with horrible fidelity. We had taken the precaution to hang heavy blankets upon the ropes sustaining the car, and these we kept sparingly moistened with water. Our own thirst was as intense as our perspiration was profuse, and we had divested ourselves of everything but our woollen under-clothing—wool being a non-conductor, and therefore as effective in excluding heat as retaining it. We were provided with a powerful ship telescope, and also a large binocular glass of long range, and so far as the discomforts of the situation would permit us we took observations of the prospect beneath. To the unaided eye the city simply presented a patch of little rectangles at the end of a brown peninsula, but through our glasses the streets and houses became surprisingly plain. Little squat black forms were to be seen moving, falling down, and lying in the streets. Down by the city front the wharves were seen to be lined with nude, or semi-nude bodies, which dived into the water and remained submerged, with the exception of their heads, though these disappeared at short intervals below the surface. Thousands upon thousands of people were thus engaged. The spectacle would have been utterly absurd and ludicrous had it not been tremendous in its awful suggestiveness.

"The mortality will be terrible, I fear," said the doctor, "if things do not change for the better soon, and I see no prospect of that. Our thermometer already marks 147° even at this altitude. We are in the lepidarium of a thrice-heated Turkish bath. And if this is the case at a barometric altitude of eleven thousand feet—nearly two perpendicular miles—what must it be down there? It is too terrible to contemplate!"

"It is only seven o'clock yet," I remarked, looking at my watch. "The sun is scarcely an hour high."

"We must throw out more ballast," said the doctor, "and reach the higher strata at all hazards;" and he threw out a forty-pound bag of sand.

We shot upward with tremendous velocity for several minutes, when our ascent again became regular. We now remarked, with intense relief, that the thermometer did not rise—that, in fact, it had fallen about two degrees; though this relief was counterbalanced by the extreme difficulty of breathing the rarefied air at this immense altitude, which we estimated by the barometer at twenty-five thousand feet, or nearly five perpendicular miles. We therefore opened the valve and discharged a quantity of gas, and presently descended into a stratum of dense fog. This fog reminded me of the steam which rises from tropical vegetation during the rainy season, and I mentioned the fact to the doctor.

"If these fogs," replied he, "would only rest upon the city, they might shield it from destruction, but in a case of this kind we have no meteorological data to go on. No one can estimate either the amount of heat, or the meteorological results it is now producing on the surface of the earth five miles below us."

The stratum of fog in which we now were was dense and impenetrable. We lay in it as in a steam-bath, the balloon not seeming to drift, but swaying sluggishly from side to side, like a sail flapping idly against a mast in a calm.

Hour after hour passed like this, the temperature still ranging between 130° to 140° F. The doctor preserved his wonted equanimity.

"I have grave apprehensions," he remarked, impressively, as if in answer to my thoughts, "that the final fiery cataclysm, a foreboding of which has run through all systems of philosophies and religions through all ages, and which seems to be, as it were, ingrained in the inner consciousness of man, is now upon us. I am determined, however, not to fall a victim to the fiery energy that has been evoked, and shall anticipate such a fate by an easier and less disagreeable one," and as he spoke he motioned significantly toward his right bip.

"Do you think, then," said I, "that an act under such circumstances"—designedly employing a vague periphrasis on such an unpleasant topic—"is morally defensible?"

"What can it matter?" returned the doctor, with a shrug. "Of two alternatives, both leading to the same end, common sense accepts the easier. A refusal to touch the hemlock would not have saved Socrates."

In spite of the terrible forebodings which filled me, the exigencies of the situation seemed to render my brain preternaturally concentrated and abnormally active. The surrounding stillness, the lack of sound of any description, the dreamy warmth of the dense mist in which we lay, exercised a sedative influence, and rendered the mind peculiarly impressionable to action from within.

"We have no means, then, of calculating the probable intensity of the heat at the earth's surface?" I asked.

"None whatever," replied the doctor. "We are now at an indicated elevation, by barometrical pressure, of twenty-two thousand feet. We are probably actually much higher, as the steam in which we lie is acting on the barometer. Atmospheric conditions like the present, at such an altitude, are totally beyond the experience of science. They might be, and probably are, caused by the action of intense heat upon hotter surfaces below us. To the fact of their presence, however, we owe our existence. This atmosphere, though peculiarly favorable to the passage of heat rays through it, is incapable of retaining them."

"Supposing," I went on, in a wildly speculative mood, engendered by the excitement of the occasion, "supposing that the heat of the surface of the earth were sufficiently intense to melt metals—iron, for instance—the most refractory substances, in fact. Take a further flight: supposing that such heat were ten times intensified, what would be its effect upon our planet?"

"The solid portions—the crust with everything upon it—would be the first to experience the effects of such a catastrophe. Then the oceans would boil, and their surface waters, at any rate, be converted into steam."

"What then?" I continued.

"This steam would ascend to the upper regions of the atmosphere till it reached an equilibrium of rarefaction, when its expansion would cool it, upon which rapid condensation would follow, and it would descend to earth in the form of rain. The more sudden and energetic the heat, the sooner would this result be accomplished, and the more copious the precipitation of the succeeding rain. After the first terrible crisis, the grand compensation of natural law would come into play, and the face of the planet would be protected from further harm by the shield of humid vapor—the vis medicatrix nature, so to speak. Equilibrium would be restored, but most organisms would meanwhile have perished."

"Most organisms, you say?" I repeated, inquiringly.

"It is possible," said the doctor, "that ocean infusoria, and even some of the comparatively higher forms of ocean life, might survive. It is also possible that terrestrial animals occupying high altitudes—mountaineers for example, whose homes are deep snows and glaciers, denizens of the frozen zone, and beings similarly situated—might escape. This would altogether depend upon the intensity and duration of the heat. We must remember that size, looked at from a universal point of view, is merely relative. If we consider our planet as a six-inch ball, our oceans, with their insignificant average depth of a few miles, would be aptly represented by a film of the finest writing paper. How long, think you, would a watery film, such as that, last a few feet from a suddenly stirred fire?"

I bowed acquiescence to the conclusion drawn from the simile, and the doctor proceeded:

"There can be no longer any doubt that the present elemental convulsion is due to the collision of the comet with the sun. Knowing what we do of its orbit from last year's computation, its precipitation upon the solar surface has taken place on the side farthest from our own position in space. We do not, therefore, experience so sudden and so fierce atmospheric excitement as would otherwise have followed. It now remains to be seen what the duration of the effect will be."

During the latter portion of our conversation a low moaning sound, which had been heard for the past few minutes, was growing more pronounced and seemingly coming nearer. At the same time the barometer was observed to be falling rapidly.

"That is the sound of wind," I exclaimed. "I have heard it on tropical deserts and on tropical seas. I can not be mistaken. It comes from the east."

"The hot air from the parched continent is approaching," said the doctor. "Scientifically speaking, atmospheric convection is taking place, and we shall bear the brunt of it."

As he spoke the balloon was seized with a violent tremor. It vibrated from apex to car, and the next moment was struck by the most terrific tornado it is possible to imagine. The blast was like the torrid breath of a furnace, and we involuntarily covered our heads with our blankets, and clutched convulsively to the frail bulwarks of the car, which was being dragged on at a tremendous velocity, and at a horribly acute angle, by the distended gas-bag which towered ahead of us. Luckily we had both clutched mechanically at the railing on the side whence the wind came, to let go which hold would have meant instant precipitation over the opposite side of the car into the yawning gulf beneath. For less than a minute, so far as my stricken and scattered senses could compute, we were borne on by this terrific simoom, when, suddenly, we found ourselves as before, in the midst of a preternatural calm. We had evidently drifted into an eddy of the cyclone; for I could hear its sullen and awful roar at some distance to our right. Hardly had we composed ourselves when the blast struck us again; this time on the opposite side of the car. Again we were hurled forward by the resistless elemental fury; but this time in a sensibly downward direction. The blast had struck us from above, and was hurling us before it—down, down, to inevitable destruction. Fortunately the comparative bulk of the balloon offered more resistance than the car to this downward progress. Down, down, we sped, till, of a sudden, we emerged from the cloud-strata and obtained a brief and abrupt glimpse of the scene below. The counterblasts of the past few minutes had apparently compensated each other's action, for we found ourselves just over the city.

The city? There was no city. I recognized, indeed, the contour of the peninsula, and the well-known outlines of the bay and islands, through casual rifts in the dense clouds of steam which rose in volumes from below. Well nigh stupefied and maddened as I was by the intense heat, a horrible curiosity seized me to peer into the dread mystery beneath, and while with one scorched and writhing hand I held the blankets, which had not yet parted with the moisture gathered from the clouds above, to my aching head and temples, with the other I raised the powerful binocular to my eyes. Through drifting rifts of the steam-clouds that obscured the scene, I caught glimpses which filled me with unutterable and nameless horror. Neither streets nor buildings were decipherable where the city once had been. The eye rested upon nothing but irregular and misshapen piles of vitrified slag and calcined ashes. Everything was as scarred in a ruinous silence as the ruined surface of the moon. There was neither flame nor fire to be seen. Things seemed to have long passed the stage of active combustion, as though all the elements necessary to sustain flame had already been abstracted from them. Here and there an ominous dark red glow showed, however, that the lava into which the fair city had been transformed was still incandescent. The sand dunes to the west shone like glaciers or dull mirrors through the steam fissures, and long shapeless masses of what resembled charred wood were strewn here and there over the surface of the bay. Less than five seconds served to reveal all that I have taken so long to describe. The binocular, too hot to hold, dropped from my hand. At the same moment the balloon was again struck by the cyclone, and dashed eastward with the same fury as before. The doctor caught convulsively at the railing of the car, missed his hold, and with a wild, despairing shriek, outstretched arms, and starting eyes fixed upon mine, disappeared headlong in the abyss.

I am alone in the balloon—perhaps alone in the world. My companion has been hurled to a fiery death below. His awful shriek still rings in my ears. It sounds over the sullen roar of the cyclone. I am whirled resistlessly onward.

The blast shifts. Again the balloon pauses in one of the strange eddies formed by this strange simoon. The wind flies away to a moan. It rises again. It writhes around the car like the convulsive struggles of some gigantic reptile in the throes of death. It seizes me again in its resistless clutch. The balloon is being whirled toward the earth.

I am falling. But no—it seems to me that the earth—the plutonic, igneous earth—is rising toward me. With lightning-like rapidity it seems to hurl itself up through the air to meet me. I hear the roar of flames mingling with the roar of the blast. I see the seething, bubbling waste of waters through rifts in the clouds of steam.

I am nearing the molten surface. My feeling has changed. I am conscious that it has ceased to seem to rise. I feel that I am falling now—falling into the fiery depths below. Nearer—nearer yet; scorched and blackened by the awful heat as I approach—I fall—down—down—down—

Nowadays, writes a French correspondent, with that craze for showing off and posing for better than one is—which is the curse of French republican society—Paris is no longer the gastronomic paradise that it was of old. The Parisians line on the architecture of set dishes, on damask linen, on the brilliancy of the glassware, on the flowers that are on the table, on the white cravats of the waiters, but on butter at thirty cents a pound, and on ordinary wine from the wine shops round the corner, on fish with the bones painted in red on the fillets by one of those mysterious and ingenious artists whose specialty is to do "kitchen painting." The inventor of this industry was one named Chapellier, who invented the trade of "painter of turkeys' feet." He had noticed that the poulterers lost largely on stale stock. The sign by which the staleness of a turkey, for instance, is betrayed, is the increasing paleness of the legs and feet. Chapellier invented a varnish to tone up the color. His successors have invented many other tricks which are the providence of second-class game and fish dealers. Oh, the meanness of some apparently brilliant Parisian households is awful to think of! Perhaps the painter Ziem's table is the most phenomenal. Ziem hires half the dishes by the hour, and the guests are, of course, not allowed to touch them. The dessert is generally in wax, except one plate of cheap apples and dish of nuts.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Sun says of the late A. T. Stewart: He gave a commission to a celebrated artist in Paris to paint a little Parisienne, and offered to pay treble the ordinary price if the painter would put a cap of head-work on the little lady's costume. "That is a strange fancy," said the painter. "It is not a fancy at all," replied Mr. Stewart; "that picture will be exhibited at New York. All the elegant women will look at it, and if they see that the Parisiennes wear bead ornaments they will buy beads. Now, my house—A. T. Stewart & Co.—has a big stock of these articles, and by that means, you understand"—and the artist understood enough to refuse the commission.

Nine girls of Wheeling took some pictures of actresses in age costumes to a photographer, and posed as nearly as possible in the same attitudes and raiment. The portraits somehow got into circulation in society, and the earnest efforts of the girls' parents have failed to gather the cards for destruction.

Edward Lytton Bulwer once declared that an Englishman as proud of his country, not because of its public buildings, its laws, its public men, and its writers. "He is vain of his country for an excellent reason—it produced him."

The latest novelty in Paris clubs is a Club des Chauves—club of bald-heads. The vaudevilleist Siraudin will be elected by acclamation, and the long-haired Alphonse auctet will be politely black-haired.

Theodore Child asserts that Octave Feuillet, in his reception speech at the Academy, wrote an essay on the modern novel and forgot Balzac. This is as if, in the history of the war, one forgot Napoleon.

OLD FAVORITES.

Where shall the lover rest?
Where shall the lover rest
Whom the fates sever
From his true maiden's breast—
Parted forever?
Where, through groves deep and high
Sounds the far billow,
Where early violets die
Under the willow.
Eleu lora
Soft shall be his pillow.
There, through the summer day,
Cool streams are laving;
There, where the tempests sway,
Scarce are houghs waving;
There thy rest shalt thou take,
Parted forever,
Never again to wake
Never, O never!
Eleu lora
Never, O never.
Where shall the traitor rest,
He, the deceiver,
Who could win maiden's breast,
Ruin, and leave her?
In the lost battle,
Borne down by the flying,
Where mingles war's rattle
With groans of the dying:
Eleu lora
There shall he be lying.
Her wing shall the eagle flap
O'er the false-hearted;
His warm blood the wolf shall lap
Ere life he parted;
Shame and dishonor sit
By his grave ever;
Blessing shall hallow it
Never, O never!

Eveleen's Bower.
O weep for the hour
When to Eveleen's bower
The Lord of the Valley with false vows came!
The moon hid her light
From the heavens that night,
And wept behind her clouds o'er the maiden's shame.
The clouds passed soon
From the chaste, cold moon,
And heaven smiled again with her vestal flame;
But none will see the day
When the clouds shall pass away
Which, that dark hour left upon Eveleen's lame.
The white snow lay
On the narrow pathway,
When the Lord of the Valley crossed over the moor;
And many a deep print
On the white snow's tint
Showed the track of his footsteps to Eveleen's door.
The next sun's ray
Soon melted away
Every trace on the path where the false lord came;
But there's a light above
Which alone can remove
That stain upon the snow of fair Eveleen's fame. —Thomas Moore.

The Sisters.
We were two daughters of one race:
She was the fairest in the face:
The wind is blowing in turret and tree.
They were together, and she fell;
Therefore revenge became me well.
O the Earl was fair to see!
She died; she went to burning flame:
She mixed her ancient blood with shame.
The wind is howling in turret and tree.
Whole weeks and months, and early and late,
To win his love I lay in wait:
O the Earl was fair to see!
I made a feast; I had him come;
I won his love, I brought him home.
The wind is roaring in turret and tree.
And after supper, on a bed,
Upon my lap he laid his head:
O the Earl was fair to see!
I kissed his eyelids into rest:
His rudely cheek upon my breast.
The wind is raging in turret and tree.
I hated him with the hate of hell,
But I loved his beauty passing well.
O the Earl was fair to see!
I rose up in the silent night:
I made my dagger sharp and bright.
The wind is raging in turret and tree.
As half-asleep his breath he drew,
Three times I stabbed him through and through.
O the Earl was fair to see!
I curled and combed his comely head,
He looked so grand when he was dead.
The wind is blowing in turret and tree.
I wrapt his body in the sheet,
And laid him at his mother's feet.
O the Earl was fair to see! —Alfred Tennyson.

The Mother's Last Song.
Sleep! The ghostly winds are howling,
No moon abroad, no star is glowing;
The river is deep, and the tide is flowing
To the land where you and I are going!
We are going afar,
Beyond moon or star,
To the land where the sinless angels are!
I lost my heart to your heartless sire,
'Twas melted away by his looks of fire,
Forgot my God, and my father's ire,
All for the sake of a man's desire;
But now we'll go
Where the waters flow,
And make us a bed where none shall know.
The world is cruel, the world is untrue;
Our foes are many, our friends are few;
No work, no bread, however we sue!
What is there left for me to do,
But fly—fly
From the cruel sky,
And hide in the deepest deeps—and die? —Barry Cornwall.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

The Ideal Mule.

Along the tramway the patient, much-enduring, long-suffering mule holds his steady way, hauling a few tons of coal—as much as the car can stand at a load. The mule is never overloaded. Oh, no. Nobody ever worries about putting on more coal than the mule can haul. But the capacity of the car is limited, and it must not be loaded beyond a certain strain. No wonder the mule is a kicker. Were I a mule, love, I, too, would kick. Every time I got a chance I would lift somebody higher than a kite. I know just exactly what kind of a mule I would be. A bay mule. One of those sad-eyed old fellows that lean back in the breeching and think. With striped legs like a zebra. And a dark brown streak down my back, and a paint brush tail. And my mane cut short, and my foretop banded, and a head as long as a flour-barrel, and I'd be worth two hundred and a half in any market, and I'd wear a flat harness and no blinders, and some day when some man hitched me up to a dray, and piled on a ton and a half of pig iron, a cord of wood, six barrels of flour, a good load of household goods and a steamboat boiler, I would start off with it patiently and haul it steadily until I got to the top of the grade, and right about there and then a falling maple leaf, fluttering down in a spark of gold and crimson, would scare me all but to death, and the authorities would have to drag the Mississippi River six weeks to find all of that load and some of that driver, while in three minutes after the minute, I would be tranquilly browsing on the grassy heights that smile above the silver flowing river. That is the kind of a mule I would be.—Burdette.

Chapter XXXI.

"Give me another doughnut."
Reine McCloskey's voice is husky with grief as she speaks these words, and over the dimpled cheek that looks so fair and white in the moonlight, the blushes are chasing each other in rapid succession. Standing directly in front of the girl, and lending to the tout ensemble a soft warmth of coloring not otherwise obtainable, is a large jar. Immediately behind it stands Hercules Perkins.

"I am going away," he says.
The girl does not reply. The shadow of the doughnut-jar conceals the look of haunting fear that passes across her face, and the white lines around the drooping mouth are not seen by the one whose words have caused their presence.

"Shall you miss me?" he asks.
The little white hand that rests upon the back of a chair is trembling now, and in the deep brown eyes there are hot tears of sorrow and pain. Suddenly Reine speaks:
"Go away," she says, in agonized tones; "go away before I tell you that which had best remain unsaid," and sohs choke her utterance.

A great light breaks upon Hercules. Stepping quickly to the girl's side he places his arm around her. "Tell me, truly, sweetheart," he says, "do you love me?"

For answer she places a soft white arm around his neck, and as he bends over to kiss her the other hand reaches forward, feels cautiously around for an instant, and then, with a wild cry of agony, Reine McCloskey falls forward in a swoon. The doughnut-jar is empty.—From "Life's Mockery," by Joseph Medill, the Chicago Tribune Novelist.

Bill Nye on the Elections.

We have met the enemy, and we are his'n. We have made our remarks, and we are now ready to listen to the gentleman from New York. We could have dug out, perhaps, and explained about New York; but when almost every State in the Union rose up and made certain statements yesterday, we found that the job of explaining this matter thoroughly would be wearisome, and require a great deal of time. We do not blame the Democracy for this. We are a little surprised, however, and grieved. It will interfere with our wardrobe this winter. With an overcoat on Wyoming, a plug-hat on Iowa, a pair of pantaloons on Pennsylvania, and boots on the general result, it looks now as though we would probably go through the winter wrapped in a bed-quilt and profound meditation. We intended to publish an extra this morning, but the news was of such a character that we thought we would get along without it. The cause of this great Democratic freshet in New York yesterday—but why go into details?—we all have an idea why it was so. The number of votes would seem to indicate that there was a tendency toward Democracy throughout the country. Now, in Pennsylvania, if you will look over the returns carefully—but why should we take up your valuable time offering an explanation of a political matter of the past? Under the circumstances some would go and yield to the soothing influences of the maddening bowl, but we do not advise that. It would only furnish temporary relief, and the recoil would be unpleasant. We resume our duties with a feeling of extreme ennui, and with that sense of surprise and astonishment that a man does who has had a large brick block fall on him when he was not expecting it. Although we feel a little lonely to-day—having met but a few Republicans on the street, who were obliged to come out and do their marketing—we still hope for the future. The grand old Republican party—but that's what we said last week. It sounds hollow now and meaningless, somehow, because our voice is a little hoarse, and we are snowed under so deep that it is difficult for us to enunciate. Now, about those bets. If the parties to whom we owe bets—and we owe 'most everybody—will just agree to take the stakes, and not go into details—not stop to ask us the state of our mind, and talk about how it was done—we don't care. We don't wish to have this thing explained at all. We are not of an inquiring turn of mind. Just plain facts are good enough for us, without any harrowing details. In the meantime we are going to work to earn some more money, to bet on the next election. Judge Folger and others, come over and see us when you have time, and we will talk this matter over. Mr. B. D. we wish we had your longevity. With a robust constitution we find that 'most any man can wear out cruel fate, and there at last. We do not feel so angry as we do grieve, surprised. We are pained to see the American people betray our confidence, and throw a large wardrobe into the hands of the relentless foe.—Boomerang, November 8.

SOCIETY.

DEAR BESS: The weather is as chilly as the cold water which has lately been thrown on our political aspirations, and, while it has a tendency of driving one in doors, it probably will act as an effective agency in opening the salons of those hospitably disposed. As a preface to a round of merry-making, there seems a disposition to congregate at entertainments—and we have had a series of them.

The Carnival seems only to have added zest to the diversions which have followed in such rapid succession. To the music-lovers, the Philharmonic concert is supplying a want that is as wide-spread as it is sincere. Music has become more than an affection with our community. It has become a necessity. To those who have been reared in a musical atmosphere the absence of music is literal starvation. That the taste for a higher order of music is becoming universal is owing much to the efforts of some of our musical leaders, who have battled against adverse circumstances, and carried their point at serious inconvenience and loss to themselves. Though there have been many to appreciate and assist, still the community is small, and the proportion of true art lovers consequently smaller. We still remember the efforts of Herold, who, laboring under physical difficulties, encountered all the tortures which experiments are liable to. Toepke's industrious perseverance is developing a first-class orchestra out of amateur and crude material. The Schmitts, by their readiness and musical intelligence, have done much to elevate the general tone. Hinrichs is now to the front, and we all remember the impressions made by his admirably trained orchestra in their artistic accompaniment of Joseffy, which then suggested the idea of inaugurating a series of Philharmonic concerts. The same tortuous road to success has been the lot of greater geniuses does not seem to have fallen to Hinrichs. Immediate recognition and patronage have crowned his efforts, as was evinced by the attendance last Friday evening.

The Lorings propose entertaining us at B'nai Brith Hall next Tuesday evening. Enough can not be said of Mr. David Loring, who, as much from true love of his art as from public spirit, so successfully inaugurated so excellent a voice orchestra. True, it is not made up altogether of amateur element, and contains many gentlemen of well-trained artistic merit; but, as an artist tones his colors, so Loring has blended the artist and amateur in one harmonious whole. These concerts, too, our society people see fit to number among "one of the things."

An art reception was another occasion for bringing society together. Nahl, who has been many years with us, and whom we number as one of our local artists, had a request from over the sea, thanks to the uncle whose timely demise gave us remote ones an opportunity to enjoy his hoarded collection. Regardless of the expense of transportation, which the receipts of the exhibition here will not by any means cover, Nahl must have been actuated by a spirit of philanthropy to entrust to the treacherous mercies of the sea his treasures, that we might enjoy them with him.

Those of dancing proclivities will be pleased to hear of the proposed Pacific Yacht Club reception next Saturday, and also of the inauguration of a series of Germans by a number of young society men, who are desirous of reciprocating the hospitalities extended to them by their lady friends. They will take place at Red Men's Hall, December 6th, January 3d, and February 7th. The subscription list is already filled, and the lady patronesses are recognized society leaders—Mrs. William M. Gwin, Mrs. J. B. Haggins, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. W. T. Coleman, Mrs. F. F. Low, Mrs. William Lane Booker, Mrs. E. E. Eyre, Mrs. C. L. Ashe, Mrs. Lieutenant Buford, and Mrs. J. C. Flood.

It is to be hoped the efforts of the Amateur Dramatic Company, who for sweet charity's sake have volunteered to increase the funds of the British Benevolent Society, met with the pecuniary and artistic success they strove for. The disappointment is to be deplored at the non-arrival of the Princess, whose expected presence would, no doubt, have added to the coffers of the society, as well as the clat of the occasion. The Scotch element is on the alert, while the Caledonians have anticipated the arrival of the royal pair by a ball last Friday. The St. Andrews hope to banquet the Marquis on the 30th instant.

I must not omit mentioning a very commendable effort some of our ladies of æsthetic taste are engaged in at present—the Decorative Art Society, which, we all remember, gave a very creditable as well as interesting loan exhibition in May, 1881. The competitive prize exhibition is at present attracting great numbers. Each visitor is entitled to a vote regarding the best executed design, which will no doubt influence the committee's decision. The privilege of entering competitive work is extended beyond this State, although my inclination would be to encourage the home-workers, desirable though it is to gather all that is new and meritorious from everywhere. Among the most noticeable articles on exhibition is a portière on terra-cotta turcoman cloth. The design at the bottom is a mass of rocks and natural grasses, above which spring hollyhocks, shaded in harmonizing tones, and extending to the centre. This portière is from New York, and will most likely take the prize, as it excites the most admiration. Very unique is a drawn design in colors of a portière, the lower portion of which is in dark blue plush surmounted by a band of kaleidoscopic pattern. The centre is of light blue satin, upon which a spider's web is designed in tracery stitch, topped with a cornice of cream in designs of wasps and butterflies, edged with variegated fringe. Another portière is of Pompeian red with yellow bands. The centre is done in tracery of flowers and birds-of-paradise. Two pretty designs for mantel lambrequins are cardinal plush embroidered with pink clematis, and black satin embroidered in wild roses, swallows, and butterflies. Among the several piano scarfs was one noticeable on terra-cotta plush, edged with a band of old gold, on which is appropriately designed the treble clef entwined with convolvulus. Then there are two pretty designs in baby quilts, one on white satin with white plush hand embroidered in yellow, then one on blue satin in daisies. It is to be regretted that the tracing was not more in relief, as the motto was pretty and appropriate:

"The stars are tiny daisies high,
Opening and shutting in the sky;
While daisies are the stars below,
Twinkling and sparkling as they grow."

There is a cream-colored baby-blanket, traced in pink wild roses and cherubs with appropriate motto; also, various varieties of fire screens, the newest designed in golden sumach and thistle. One attractive design is a pretty pattern for table-cover in pansies; also, a letter-case in brown worked in yellow pansies. A very prettily finished photographic case is of cardinal plush lined with blue satin, painted in various designs.

While the Nob Hill mansions remain so persistently closed, it does not promise much for the festivities which were to have been accorded royalty on their return here. The Stanfords have gone East by the southern route. The Hopkins are still at the Windsor, New York, where there is quite a colony of San Franciscans registered. The Crockers are yet in Paris, where, according to late accounts, Miss Hattie entertained Miss Sibyl Sanderson (a prospective debutante of Washington society this winter) at dinner. Miss Flora Low dined Miss Dora Miller previous to her departure. The floral decorations were elaborate, the menu cards unique, and the dinner a culinary triumph.

Were I to gossip about everybody and everything, I should not be done till night, and have nothing to tell you in my next. So, reserving something for the future, I remain your friend, DORA.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 15, 1882.

Notes and Gossip.

General Alexander McDowell McCook, accompanied by his niece and daughter, arrived here last week, and will spend some time in San Francisco. Senator Miller and family departed for Washington on Saturday last. The Mrs. Mark Hopkins who arrived here a few weeks ago, is the wife of a brother of E. V. Hopkins; Mrs. Mark Hopkins, the rich widow, will not return until just before the holidays; she is at present in New York, accompanied by her niece, Miss May Crittenden. Mr. and Mrs. S. D. Hovey, of the Police, are visiting at the Sierra Madre Villa. Mrs. General Stoneman has lately been the guest of Mrs. Elliott, daughter of the late General Meyrick. Miss Belle Nichols has returned from Vermont. Mrs. Charles Sonntag will return from San Rafael in a week or two. Mrs. Cutter and the Misses Cutter have returned to the city for the winter, after a long sojourn in the country. Colonel Weller and family have returned to the Palace for the winter. Mrs. McNeil, of the Grand, is visiting in Sacramento. Mrs. General

Crook has joined her husband at Prescott, Arizona. Colonel and Mrs. Creed Haymond have returned from Sacramento. General and Mrs. Schofield have taken up their permanent residence at Black Point during the present week. Mrs. D. D. Colton has been passing a few days in Los Angeles. Miss Mamie Perry, who has been visiting in this city, has returned to Los Angeles. Lieutenant Strother, of the Third Infantry, U. S. A., was thrown from his horse a few days ago near Tucson and injured. Mrs. Broughton and her two daughters have returned from the country and taken up their residence at the Grand for the winter. Mr. and Mrs. Harlow H. White, who were married in this city last week, and who subsequently went on a short bridal tour, have returned and taken up their residence in this city. The Misses Adams, of Menlo, have come up to the city for the winter. General and Mrs. Cullum of New York, have returned from Monterey, and are at the Palace. Mrs. J. H. Jewett has returned to Monterey. Miss Jennie Brummagen is also at Monterey. Lieutenant-commander Rockwell, of the Coast Survey, and family are at the Lick. Mr. and Mrs. N. H. Foster, of Sacramento, who have been on an extended Eastern trip, have returned. Mr. and Mrs. R. B. Canfield, of Santa Barbara, are in the city. Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Southard, of Tucson, are passing a few days in San Francisco. Mrs. S. E. Smith, of Washington, D. C., is visiting Mrs. W. O. Bowers, at Sacramento. Mrs. Daniel Cook is at the Pico House, Los Angeles. Mrs. J. B. Haggins arrived in New York on Monday last. Hon. Frank Page and Governor Pacheco have left for Washington. Miss Kittie Woods and Miss Georgie Richards have returned from the Navy Yard. Mrs. Hamlin has returned from Alameda County. Mrs. Edgar Mills, who has been visiting Mrs. J. H. Carroll, at Sacramento, has returned to Menlo. Mr. George K. Porter, of San Francisco, and Miss Katie A. Caystle, of Los Angeles, were married in that city on Saturday last, by the Rev. Elias Birdsall. Mr. and Mrs. Albert Gallatin, of Sacramento, arrived from New York a few days ago. Mrs. Fannie B. Edgerton, who has been in Europe for nearly two years, has returned to America, and is visiting in Providence, Rhode Island, at present. Lieutenant M. H. Livingston, of Santa Fé, is at Monterey. Mrs. Judge Sanderson and her daughter Sibyl are expected to return from Europe in a few days, and, after a short sojourn in New York, to proceed to Washington for the winter. Miss Eades has arrived in Washington. Mr. and Mrs. Montague have returned to the city for the winter. Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Ford, of Oakland, and Miss Hutchinson, of this city, are at Monterey. Messrs. C. E. Low and Adolph Low, of New York, arrived in this city on Thursday last. Miss Mamie Hammond, Mrs. Adam Grant's niece, will probably not depart for her home in Chicago until after the holidays. Commodore Charles L. Baldwin, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Thursday last. Mrs. McMullin and her daughters, who have been passing a long time at their place in San Joaquin County, returned to the city for the winter on Tuesday last. Major Montgomery Bryant, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., and Mrs. Bryant are at the Occidental. Hon. Frank Page was given a dinner on Monday evening last at the Maison Dorée, at which Irving M. Scott, Governor Pacheco, Senator Jones, Colonel J. P. Jackson, Hon. Horace Davis, Claus Spreckels, and other representative citizens were present. Lieutenant George W. Goethals, U. S. A., arrived here from the East on Tuesday last. Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Sargent, who have lately returned from their bridal trip, give receptions at the Palace on Tuesday and Thursday evenings next. Mr. and Mrs. James C. Flood and daughter took up their residence at the Palace on Tuesday last for the winter. Alphonz Munson, son of the noted wine manufacturer of that name, is at the Palace.

The Thanksgiving Kettledrum.

A rather novel entertainment, to be styled a Thanksgiving kettledrum, is promised on Monday evening, the 27th instant, from eight to eleven o'clock, in B'nai Brith Hall. It will be given for the benefit of the California State Woman's Hospital, an institution wholly unsectarian in character, and worthy of the pecuniary assistance it requires to provide for the comfort of its present inmates, as well as to extend its future usefulness. This entertainment, coming as it does upon the threshold of Thanksgiving Day, will afford the charitably disposed a fitting preparation for that feast. The affair is in the hands of some of the most benevolent and enterprising of our leading ladies, and will, no doubt, be a great success in all respects. The First United States Artillery Band will discourse music, refreshments will be provided, and something extremely beautiful and unique may be expected in the floral displays and offerings. Tickets may be obtained from either of the following-named lady patronesses: Mrs. Atherton, Mrs. Ashe, Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Andrews, Mrs. Buford, Mrs. William Babcock, Mrs. William Barnes, Mrs. William Blanding, Mrs. James L. Coleman, Mrs. Horace Davis, Mrs. Easton, Mrs. Eyre, Mrs. Freeborn, Mrs. Flood, Mrs. De Guigné, Mrs. Millen Griffith, Mrs. William M. Gwin, Mrs. Louis Gerde, Mrs. S. O. Hunt, Mrs. J. B. Haggins, Mrs. R. C. Hooker, Mrs. Jarboe, Mrs. Charles Keeney, Mrs. John Kittie, Mrs. A. V. Kutz, Mrs. N. G. Kittie, Mrs. Jerome Lincoln, Mrs. F. F. Low, Mrs. McDowell, Mrs. L. Henry Newton, Mrs. Richard Ogden, Mrs. F. M. Picley, Mrs. Jules C. Reis, Mrs. John Scott, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. Alfred Tulish, Mrs. Samuel Wilson, or at the residence of General McDowell, No. 1606 Van Ness Avenue.

Receptions and Dinners of the Past Week.

Excepting the performance at the Baldwin Theatre, on Wednesday evening last, and the response made by a fashionable audience to the efforts of the British Benevolent Society, the past week may be said to have been gay, but not brilliant. There were quite a number of small dinners, and a few dancing parties, conspicuous among which were the Olympics' reception and the Cadets' dancing party last evening, the reception of Company F on Wednesday evening last, a party last evening at Mr. Lohse's, on Tyler Street, and a hop at the Presidio on the same evening. Among the many present at the entertainment of the British Benevolent Society, we saw Mr. and Mrs. William Lane Booker, Mr. Charles Mason and son, and Miss Mason, Senator and Mrs. William M. Gwin, Miss Carrie Gwin, Colonel and Mrs. E. E. Eyre and the Misses Eyre, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Sherwood, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Flood and Miss Jennie Flood, Mrs. General McDowell, Miss McDowell, and Harry McDowell, Mr. and Mrs. William Sillem, Miss Philpott, Doctor and Mrs. Barnett, Miss Steele, Mr. and Mrs. Hager, Mr. and Mrs. De Guigné, the Misses Parrott, Mrs. and Miss Ashe, Miss Atherton, Captain Payson, Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Jarboe, George Page, Miss Nuttall, Mr. and Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, Mr. and Miss Babcock, Mr. and Mrs. W. B. Blanding and the Misses Blanding, Mr. and Mrs. Dickson.

Engagement.

The engagement of Mr. Timothy Hopkins and Miss May Crittenden is announced by authority, and also the statement that the wedding will take place at St. Thomas's Church, New York, on Tuesday week, the twenty-eighth instant. Miss Crittenden is a niece of Mrs. Mark Hopkins, and provoked admiration from acknowledged belles, even while in society here last winter, on account of her superior beauty of face and form. It is no secret that an English gentleman of wealth and title, who visited San Francisco some months ago, became dazzled with Miss Crittenden, and sought her hand in marriage. Nob Hill will be well represented at the wedding, as there are in New York at present, besides those above mentioned, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, Miss Hattie Crocker, William Crocker, and Hon. and Mrs. Leland Stanford. W. E. Brown, Senator Miller and family, Joe Grant, and other prominent Californians, are also in New York.

There will be no lack of gaiety from now on, although nothing stunning may be looked for, while a majority of our very wealthy and most pretentious entertainers are away. Their closing hop of the season will be given this afternoon at Sausalito by the Pacific Yacht Club. On Tuesday evening next, Mrs. James Robinson will give a party to Miss Nina Platt at the Palace Hotel, in the public parlors.

The Finnish newspapers record a striking instance of the extent to which the land on the shores of the Gulf of Bothnia is being gradually upheaved. It appears that on June 25, 1755, a surveyor made a mark in the smooth rock at an elevation of two inches above the level of the sea. On being lately measured, the present height was found, after the lapse of one hundred and twenty-seven years, to be six feet five inches.

CORRESPONDENCE.

San Francisco Statuary.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: Did it ever strike you what an extremely unlovely gang of "statues" and "mashers" have come to infest Kearny Street? The evil is an old one, it is true; succeeding generations of mashers have followed each other, have grown up either into pimps or convicts, and have gone (according to their respective tastes) either to the county jail as vagrants or to the State prison as felons. Yet the crop is a rank one; as fast as their fellows fall, new aspirants take their places.

There are two places on Kearny Street which seem to be headquarters of these fellows. Both purport to be tobacconists' shops, or at their owners would doubtless call them, "stores"; both—judging from the signs hanging over the doors—seem to be kept by foreigners; both—judging from the noses hanging over the counters—seem to be kept by Jews. Both stores are in the same block—Kearny, between Bush and Sutter—and the name of one is like a sneeze and that of the other is like a grunt—to wit, Michalischke and Gunst.

In these two "stores" may be seen daily the same kind of a gang—a gang of grinning, winking, leering, jabbering apes. They resemble the ape in everything, except the use of tobacco; even the ape, I fancy would be loath to bedeck the forest aisles along which the female ape should pass with festoons of slimy saliva. They resemble the ape, too, in the ostentatiousness of their amours; if a painted prostitute or brazen hawd pass with answering smirk and leer, then turns the favored ape to his fellow-apes, and all grin and chatter.

I have carefully noted the composition of the gangs in these places and being one who knows the town thoroughly, I think my analysis is not far out. Here it is: Occasional decent men, 3 per cent; puppy Jews, 40 per cent; sports, 10 per cent; fire-dealers, 5 per cent; capers, 10 per cent; billiard-markers, 2 per cent; nigger-singers, 3 per cent; pimps, 25 per cent.

Perhaps the most offensive and least dangerous portion of the gang is that going to make up the Jewish contingent. What insufferably helps they are! How a man does long to kick them! And their conversation is so extremely foolish that the mere hearing of it gives you a sort of mental sea-sickness.

I suppose that no exception can be taken to the existence of these creatures. Perhaps they serve some useful end in the economy of nature. I have never been able to understand the necessity for fleas and other vermin; correspondingly, the mission of the masher is a mystery to me.

But while they may be endured, they should not be allowed to come too bold. A lady now can scarcely pass these places, lest she should soil her skirts with saliva or her ears with snuff. Let these fellows ogle and wink at the female of their kind, if they choose; but the must not lift their deffling looks to ladies. Let them hum the bawd song and mutter the obscene jest as the trollope mimes by; but let them keep their foul tongues in their teeth when others pass.

DIAGENES.

Gorham and Estee.

I remember the return of George C. Gorham to San Francisco, on the 31st of August, 1867, a few days before the election. He was then a boy's candidate for Governor of California. He had made a splendid tactical campaign. The Fatherhood of God and Brotherhood of Man was his battle-cry. He was received with torchlights and banners waving in the evening breeze, and followed by the party rank and file. A four-horse bouchée bore him from the boat and landed him at Platt's Hall, where an immense assemblage was awaiting the coming of the conquering hero. His speech was full of confidence. He was sure of being the next Governor of California, and there was no flattery to gross, nor praise too fulsome, for the "young Napoleon," from the hundreds of hangers-on, awaiting the distribution of the coming political pap. Election day came—September 4th—and he was defeated by ten thousand majority. I was a friend of Gorham's, and voted for him, not because I thought him entitled to be Governor of California either by ability or long party service, but because he was the regular nominee. A week later, a life insurance agent (Steve King), a very bright, business, and pushing man, conceived the idea of employing Gorham as a solicitor. (About that time we were all insuring our lives in rotten companies.) It would be a splendid advertisement for his company, and he could afford to pay for it. So I was specially deputed to call on George which I did that evening, at his residence on Bryant Street, with an offer of five hundred dollars a month and an engagement for one year. I found him sitting all alone in a little sitting-room, reading Macaulay's essays, and I presume, philosophizing on the vexations and vanities of politics. He received me kindly, but he declined the offer. He was going East, etc., and there sat the "young Napoleon" of only a week ago, deserted by all, and despised by many—particularly by those who had shouted the loudest. Now for the other picture. I happened to be in the Palace Hotel the night (not many weeks since) when Estee arrived from Sacramento, after receiving the machine's (b boys) nomination for Governor of California, and the same crowd that cheered lastly for Gorham were there, even many of the same individuals, playing the farce over again, with huzzahing, drinking, hand-shaking, band playing, and speechifying. Enthusiasm is no word to express the satisfaction of all the would-be office-holders. I asked one individual, who seemed less excited than the rest, whether he thought Estee could be elected. He nearly snapped my head off, and looked at me with hardly suppressed feeling of contempt at such want of political sagacity. I modestly mentioned Gorham, and he replied: "The cises are no the same at all. Estee is a great man, and will make a magnificent campaign." I had grown older and politically wiser, however, and I held my peace. I saw Mr. Estee arrive a few nights before the election and he also went to Platt's Hall. He was cheered, and surrounded by flatterers. We all know the result—beaten by over twenty thousand majority—twice the majority against Gorham. Evidently the regular nominee had lost his hold on the party. On last Thursday evening (two days after the election) I was in the office of the Palace Hotel waiting for a friend, and there sat the Republican candidate for Governor, alone, deserted by all, tired and worn out with his work and anxiety, and politically dead—laid upon the topmost shelf for the rest of his mortal existence. I felt really sorry for him, and wondered whether he had learned the lesson. "Let not the blue-jay try the flight of the eagle." Moral for would-be machine candidates before Republican conventions—Gorham getting seventy dollars a week on a "star route" Washington daily; Estee returning to his little law-office, making a motion before Judge Tooley.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 15, 1882.

OBSERVER.

A California lady in Boston, has just written home a long list of the grievances she has experienced by the "servant galism" (as Punch calls it) of the Hub. She says:

You will doubtless be anxiously awaiting another bulletin from my kitchen, and, as my pen is a great solace in all my woes, I am ready to give it. Intervening has been my principal business of late, with view to obtain two domestic servants. After being told that this is free country, several times, I felt more like a slave than ever! I have a question of going to work to teach somebody, as I did the Chinese man fourteen years ago. I could roll up my sleeves and set about it with some hopes of success; but without the material to work with—a barbarian who can be surprised into a term of faithful service, until civilization unfits him for it—nothing can be done in that direction. Such a state of domestic degradation as American women have brought upon themselves, in this matter, I never dreamed of until now and only until they know enough and have pluck enough to establish this department upon a business basis, will we cease to go from bad to worse. I have seen that a woman (even though she be a Californian crusader) can not expect to undo this mischief single-handed. House-keeping ought to be carried on upon business principles. How long would a man's business survive the panics caused by denoralized clerks, incompetency, and dishonesty? It is because it is not looked upon as a business, but rather as a sentiment, that our homes are on so unstable a basis.

At Schwallbach, in Germany, some Englishmen got up lawn-tennis. After a day or two the mayor requested that the gentlemen would play with their coats on, as the ladies were shocked at their want of decency.

WAS IT AN ANTI-RAILROAD VICTORY?

The Popular Feeling Expressed in the Recent Election.

The New York Sun is authority for an alleged interview with Mr. Beskirroff, a distinguished Russian engineer who had been sent to the United States of America to study our system of transportation. In Russia the canals, highways, and railroads are under government management and control, and yet, he says, "thousands of tons of grain rot annually at our railroad stations, for there are no stores. In the southern part of Russia there is abundance of fish, meat, vegetables, and other provisions, and yet in the northern part of the country the people can not afford to buy those provisions, for the cost of transportation puts it beyond their means. We have plenty of coal and kerosene, but at St. Petersburg, and even at Moscow, the English coal and the American kerosene are cheaper than the Russian. Our canals and railroads don't pay to the government the cost of keeping." It would seem that, if any form of government could withdraw the business of transportation from the hands of private individuals, and conduct it with profit and advantage, it would be the autocratic system. If the Russian Government has found that its system of railroad management is ruining the country, and contemplates the abandonment of the system, and the adoption of the methods of business in vogue here, it is valuable testimony in support of our methods, and ought to have weight with those people who have hastily concluded that Government should either become the owner of our transportation system, or subject it to the direct control of political managers. Between the ownership of railroads by the Government and the assertion of its authority to regulate the fares and freights, there is no substantial difference, except that the latter system is based upon the idea that the political authorities have the right to confiscate private property and take it from its owners without compensation. The right to establish fares and freights without acquiring ownership in property is practical confiscation. It is no privilege to permit the individual to have control of his own property, if the right to "fix" the profits attending its use rests in another. It is but a scant privilege to permit the owner to retain his property at all, if he is not to be permitted to use it his own way—always, of course, within the requirements of law. It has been demonstrated in Belgium and in Germany, as well as in Russia, that a government can not run a railroad or canal with profit to itself or with profit and convenience to its people. We know of no exception to this rule. It has been demonstrated in England, France, and in the United States of America that railroads are run more economically, and to better advantage, and to the best convenience of the people, by private enterprise, and that private ownership and private direction attain results altogether more advantageous to the public at large than by any government interference whatever. In his country no grain is permitted to rot at railroad stations, and there can be no permanent lack of accommodations, simply because it is the interest of the railroad-owner to furnish sufficient means of quick transportation. It can never happen in this country that abundant provisions in one part will not be speedily transferred to another where there is a market demand for them. All such difficulties as these are remedied by the requirements of self-interest. A private road is built and run to make money. A government may allow grain to rot and people to starve, but the private corporation, under the unerring money-making instinct, renders such things impossible. The Russian railroads do not pay the cost of keeping, and hence the people are but poorly and inadequately served. These same roads in the hands of private capitalists would be profitably run, with less cost of freights and with reduced fares. The history of transportation in all countries, and in all times, and under all circumstances, has demonstrated the carrying trade must be in the hands and under the control of private ownership. And yet in California the contrary doctrine has its adherents. The heresy of governmental control has been exploded in all the older States of the Union; yet it lingers in the minds of a few demagogue politicians in this State who had hoped to be able to ride into office under the false cry of opposition to monopolies, and the right to regulate fares and freights by a political commission. These men, by a clamor which is as false as it is loud, have persistently and determinedly asserted that the railroads were conducting their business in a criminal way, were unjustly discriminating in favor of localities and individuals, were overcharging in their fares and freights, and were in the receipt of incomes and earnings extravagantly disproportioned to the capital invested in their enterprise. The truth of these assertions, and those of a kindred character, has been made an issue in this political campaign. For some years the railroads have been drawn into the arena of politics, very much to the disadvantage of the corporations, and very much to the demoralization of the people. We shall assume that no private individual, company, or corporation would willingly allow his or its business to be dragged into the political arena if it could be helped. No individual or corporate director would become the victim of popular discussion, of newspaper vindictiveness, or of obnoxious blackmailing, if he could avoid it. When the Central Pacific company had provided for its right of way, made its contracts, and arranged its government credits, it must naturally have desired to withdraw itself from the field of politics. That it did not, is evidently the result of circumstances it could not control. Every blackmailing editor, every worthless politician, and every aspiring party demagogue has resolved in his own mind how he could make this corporation subservient to his selfish interest or personal advancement. The prevailing sentiment with an individual of this class is: I will become its friend and servant, if it will employ me. I will do its bidding in public life, if it will push me to some place of public trust. I will write for it, and talk for it, and steal for it, if it will divide. I will be its servant, slave, or friend, if my interest shall thereby be subserved. If I can not be its friend, I will be its enemy. If I can not be advanced by it, I will aid to tear it down, and destroy it, but I may climb to position over its ruin. Perhaps in too many cases the company has taken these worthless demagogues at their own valuation, and used them. Perhaps it has feared their malign influence, and endeavored to placate them. It is perhaps true that the railroads have been forced into the field of politics for self-defense. It is not unlikely that, when hostile legislation has menaced their interests, they have been compelled to defend themselves. We more than suspect that criminals and rogues have been employed to prevent criminals and rogues from despoiling the company. It is just within the limits of possibility that political bureaus have been formed, the members of which did not confine themselves to lines of legitimate defense, or keep within the bounds of propriety. If these things are charged, the corporations are ready with the plausible answer that all this was necessary for self-protection, and that it all came within the lines of an imperative demand for self-defense. This class of demagogue politicians, controlling a majority of the press of this State, had worked up this prejudice against railroad corporations, till in California it had been brought to assume the importance of a political issue. First one party and then another had made it available as a hobby to ride to political power. It has been alternately used by the Democratic, the Dolly Varden, and the Republican parties. The Democracy was the first to seize hold of it, because the railroad was a Republican measure—the growth of a war necessity—and because its builders were Republicans. Then the Dolly Vardens leaped to the front, and by a grand coup de main carried off the prize of victory. Then the Democracy seized the banner of anti-monopoly and raised the slogan of anti-railroad tyranny, and elected an administration which claimed that it knew more about railroad management than the railroad-builders themselves, and undertook to regulate fares and freights, and establish the rules of transportation necessary to conduct the transcontinental and inter-State trade. Then came the Sand-lot revolution and the new Constitution frenzy, and an organic law was framed by all sorts of odds and ends of curious, ignorant, nondescript men, who were brought together under the pretext of undisguised communism. The leading idea was to regulate railroads by a political commission. All of this had been so successful, that at the last election all the politicians in the State determined to outbid each other in their efforts to make political capital out of railroad prejudice. Democrats, Republicans, Sand-lotters, and Dolly Vardens, rivaled each other in denunciation of railroads. The Democratic party, having the first rip at the railroad bull, built an anti-railroad platform, and with an earnestness that indicated its entire sincerity, endeavored to place Mr. Lloyd Tevis's partner, Hearst, upon it as the candidate for Governor. So pronounced and determined an anti-railroad man as Mr. Hearst was known to be, was, however, defeated by one of more moderate views, and General Stoneman became the candidate. This was the railroad's first victory. It was achieved in the Democratic nominating convention, and should have admonished the Republican party of the temper of the country, as expressed by the country delegates in that convention. Seventy-five city delegates voted for Hearst, yet against such odds the friends of the railroad triumphed. When the Republican convention was assembled, Mr. Morris M. Estee bid for the championship in the battle against the railroads. He made his primary fight in this city and won it upon that issue. In the Republican State Convention a majority of the country delegates were opposed to Mr. Estee. They were opposed to an ultra anti-railroad platform, and were in favor of keeping the railroad out of politics. They would have preferred as a candidate for Governor one not so pronounced and bitterly hostile to railroads as Mr. Estee was known to be. But bolting Republicans, Dolly Vardens, and the machine struck hands. Seventy-five b'hoys delegates from San Francisco voted for Estee, and Estee was nominated. Booth presided over the Convention. Swift was upon the committee on resolutions, and the result was a most pronounced anti-railroad platform, a most vindictive and hostile anti-railroad candidate, and a most resolute and determined anti-railroad campaign. The railroad was the issue, and the only issue. Examiner and Chronicle, like a Chinese orchestra, sawed together on a single string. Stoneman said little, and made, as we remember, no allusion to the railroad. Estee harped upon it ad nauseam. Sumner, Morrow, Glascock, and Booth all made anti-railroad speeches. All the Railroad Commissioners stood upon the same platform, and held nominally the same attitude of hostility to the railroads. It was charged by the Republican party press, and not successfully denied by the Democratic party press, that the railroad people were friendly to the success of Stoneman, had aided his nomination, and were desirous of his election. Of the truth of this we know nothing. We are simply endeavoring to demonstrate that the only important issue in this campaign was "railroad;" that it was believed by the people that Stoneman was more friendly, or—perhaps a better form of expression—was "less hostile," to Governor Stanford and his railroad management than Estee. Estee burned his bridges from the beginning to fight the corporation. He was aided by Booth, Morrow, Knight, and other stump orators of lesser distinction, to emphasize his irreconcilable hostility to Stanford & Co. So that the only important and direct attack on the Central and Southern Pacific Railroad companies and their management was made in the interest of Estee. He was the embodiment and personification of the anti-railroad fight. Anti-railroad sentiment, passion, and prejudice all centered in Mr. M. M. Estee. It was a distinct issue, testing the opinions of the people of this State upon the broad general fact as to whether the Central and Southern Pacific Railroad companies were so mismanaging their affairs, so oppressing the people by exorbitant fares and freights, so unjustly discriminating as to persons and localities, and so generally misbehaving themselves, as to necessitate an interference in their business by a meddling political commission. Out of thirty-nine thousand votes in this city, Mr. John Doyle, anti-railroad extremist, obtained less than five thousand votes, while William P. Humphreys, charged with being a friend of the railroad company, and charged with being nominated by them, obtained twenty-one thousand out of thirty-six thousand votes. In the State at large Mr. Estee received but sixty thousand votes out of one hundred and fifty thousand. General Stoneman beat him in nearly every city, county, township, and precinct in the State. Mr. Estee ran behind every candidate on his own State ticket, and behind every local candidate that was upon his ticket in the State. He received less votes for Governor than did any other candidate for any other office, and is the worst defeated man who ever ran for office in California. He double discounts the bad record of Black-and-Tan. Is not this conclusive that the people of this State do not look with disfavor upon railroads?—do not desire to embarrass them with the interference of party commissions, or bedevil them with political meddling?—that this railroad issue was a false one, and this clamor of partisans, newspapers, and candidates is a hollow, senseless, campaign whoop-up, started for a sinister purpose by political demagogues? We do not claim that the result of this election has demonstrated that the railroad company is blameless in its transactions, or that it has not done things it should not have done; but we do claim that the people of the State, after an open contest on an issue fairly presented, have determined that it will not be wise, prudent, or politic to wrest from the owners of railroads the management of their own affairs. We claim that this is a declaration by the people of this State that the railroad companies are not blamable for all the offenses charged against them. It is a notice to the Democratic party and the Examiner, to the Republican party and the Chronicle, to the party machines, Democratic and Republican, to call off their dogs, their demagogues, and their blackmailers, and let the Central and Southern Pacific Railroad companies have an opportunity to retire from politics. This is a fair interpretation of the wishes of the people, as expressed at the ballot-box on election day. It is a wise party leader who will heed the meaning of this handwriting upon the wall. If any further evidence were wanting to corroborate the general fact that this recent election is a substantial victory for, and vindication of, the general railroad policy, it is found in such facts as this: Of all the Railroad Commissioners in nomination, the two that were believed to be most moderate in their views and most friendly to the corporations, were elected. Foote was scratched, though he made a direct appeal to the most sordid and selfish motives of the most ignorant of his constituents. He made a pilgrimage through the valley of the San Joaquin, and, inflaming all the vindictive passions of the meaner mob, he excited all the local jealousies that his rude declamation could stir. Nevertheless he ran some four thousand votes behind his ticket. The only defeated candidate on the Democratic ticket is Mr. Crutcher, of Placer. This questionable distinction came to him because of his ambition to be regarded as the most unreasonable opponent that the railroad had in the most unreasonable county of Placer. The beggarly vote of John T. Doyle in this city is an indication and proof that this entire anti-monopoly howl was a hollow sham, the echo of which would never be heard did it not come from party demagogues, disappointed politicians, and an unprincipled and mercenary press.

Lonely Morehouse.

L. C. Morehouse is the only Republican elected on the State ticket. He deeply feels his lonely situation, and speaks sadly of his prospective and lonely life at the State capital. The Democrats at the capital should show kind consideration and deep sympathy for this lone man, and do everything in their power to make his solitary office at least as agreeable as the circumstances will allow.—Morning Paper.

He stalketh through official halls,
Whence all his ilk have flown,
"Alack!" he cries, "here must I rest
Alone.
"Here seemeth it like desert isle,
My lot like Crusoe's own,
Like him, I'm cast up by the wave
Alone.
"Even the girl-child points me out,
The boy-child heaveth stone.
He knows, God wot, 'tis safe, for I'm Alone.
"How desolate a lot is mine!"
It sounded like a groan,
The whistling winds e'en seemed to say:
"Alone!"

The following is the extraordinary heading with which the Cincinnati Enquirer prefaced the election returns: "Doomsday!—The Grand Old Party—Shivered from End to End!—Thirty-three Sovereign States have Spoken,—And from Their Edict There is no Appeal.—The Lakes Speak to the Rivers, the Mountains to the Sea—Ring Out, Wild Bells, to the Wild Sky,—The Old Party is Dying; Let it Die!—Ring out the Old, Ring in the New,—Ring out the False, Ring in the True!—Move Up, Ohio, and Make Room for Your Sisters!—Room for the Empire State, with 150,000 Majority!—Room for the Keystone State, with 25,000 Majority!—Room for the Old Bay State, with 16,000 Majority!—Room for the Hoosier State, with 10,000 Majority!—Room for the Granite State, with 1,000 Majority!—Room for the Wooden Nutmeg State, with 4,000 Majority!—Room for a Good Many Other States Too Numerous to Mention!—Room in the Capitol for a Democratic House of Representatives!—And Room in the White House for a Democratic President in 1884!"

Money will not accomplish everything, it appears, even though one possesses as much of it as does Mr. W. W. Corcoran, of Washington. That well known and philanthropic millionaire wished, a short time ago, so says a Washington paper, to enlarge the Arlington Hotel in that city, and accordingly sent a note to Mrs. Freeman, who owns a fine brown-stone house adjoining it, asking what value she placed on her property, and offering to send her his check for the amount. But great was his chagrin on receiving a reply to the effect that Mrs. Freeman had for a long time wished to have a larger flower garden, and that if Mr. Corcoran would kindly denote the value he placed upon the Arlington Hotel property, it would afford her great pleasure to send him her check for the amount. And now they say Mr. Corcoran has abandoned his ideas of hotel management.

"I wonder," says a writer in a London paper, "if many parents and husbands are aware of the dangerous abominations their daughters and wives are now wearing? I ask, because I have lately been horrified to learn that instead of corsets, ladies in the extreme of fashion now wear either broad bands of steel or else a complete steel cuirass. Now, it requires no great perception to recognize the injurious effects of such implements of torture tightly strapped o-

HE BEING A PHILOSOPHER.

A Story of the Carnival.

She looked as though early in the evening—possibly while dressing—she had laid on her satisfied smile, and that through all the subsequent rush of business she had neglected to let it off duty. The smile remain fixed upon her mouth, while she talked business to Elias, in a manner which reminded him of a sticky rim of molasses candy on an infantile mouth, which remains until it is washed off, whether the infant laughs, cries, or sleeps. I think it was ungentle in Elias to conceive such an idea regarding a lady manager of the Authors' Carnival; but then it was in Elias's way to conceive candy smiles, for he was in the candy business.

Elias was a philosopher, and a candy-maker's apprentice. Like all true philosophers, he was exceedingly simple-minded and unaware of the fact that he was a philosopher, or of the meaning of that monstrously abused word, for that matter. We who know everything, you know, and generally think we are philosophers, really are not, having nothing unknown to philosophize about.

Elias stood in the presence of the Authors' Carnival for the first time. Having been sent there hurriedly by his employer to fill an unexpected order for that sterling stimulant, chocolate creams, he appeared there in his white paper cap, bare arms, and long, blue apron. He delivered his message, and received an order from the party of the forgotten smile, who, wearing silk and satin, oppressed him, and then turned, in relief, to talk with one of the girls, in cap and apron like himself, selling candy in the Bon-bon Booth. That she was capped and aproned like himself gave this simple-minded philosopher prompt courage to speak to her. There is a fraternity in all callings; it makes the sellers of white goods single each other out in the hat-room of a jam, for purposes of confidence; it prompts the horseshoers to toast the blacksmith at the Sunday picnic; the poet and his affinity are part of this grand scheme, and it emboldened Elias Tucker to speak to Arabella Lascombe of the Bon-bon Booth—else this story were not. It was not alone because Elias had never read anything that he understood nothing of the Authors' Carnival. Other people who had read much were like Elias in that respect. He was a candy-maker's simple-minded apprentice, and knew no more about the Carnival than of authors, because all of his working life had been passed in conscientious application to his trade, and to philosophizing about new things that he saw. And surely he had never before seen anything that startled him into such pleasant and active thinking as Arabella selling candy—candy he had made—behind the counter of the Bon-bon Booth. Was she not, like himself, in the candy trade? Could she not understand the trials and tribulations, the hopes and aspirations, the disappointments, and joy, and hardships, and pleasures of his life?

"Whoever owns this candy-stall has better looking apprentices than my master has, and I should like to take service under him, even if he is such a bad tradesman as to run short of caramels, and have to buy, instead of make."

This thought suggested an endless succession of days working at a bench with Arabella, rolling and cutting candy, and ever talking with her about the trifles they made for other people's amusement. "With her to work with," Elias thought, "I'd invent all sorts of new candies. We'd study the public taste, without even seeing the public—which is such fun—and make goods together that would suit them. We'd soon leave our apprenticeship, and then—"

Thus Elias to himself. This to Arabella: "You've a pleasant place here, miss; and if you need any help, I'd like to give it you, for I'm off for the night."

Arabella observed Elias cautiously, then answered: "It would be nice to have a man to help us, for some of our people are gone, (I wonder what booth he is in?) and so, if you are in earnest, come in."

Elias quickly dodged under the pink-and-blue counter, and stood by the side of Arabella, whom he at once asked: "What is your name?"

Arabella, a trifle taken by surprise, laughed and said: "Well, it's all for sweet charity's sake, so I suppose it's all right. Arabella Lascombe. What's yours?"

Elias had not understood much that she said; but as he understood enough to learn all that he wanted to, he was perfectly satisfied—he being a philosopher—and told her his name.

"I suppose you know most of these people here," she next said, motioning to the others in the booth.

"Yes," Elias promptly lied—for that which sharpens the wit of the stupidest fool suggested that he would progress better in his acquaintance with Arabella if he appeared to be familiar with her surroundings.

Then they talked and worked together, and Elias had never known such hours in his life. Arabella, it quickly appeared, was no end interested in candy-making, and Elias could tell her all about it, which pleased them both equally. The best of us love to talk shop. Conversation sails along so evenly when one is permitted to reply to an interested questioner about that which one is especially posted in. It removes the distracting necessity of a constant lookout for snags and shoals. And Arabella was really interested. I would make her romantically engaging, if I could, but the fact is, she was as simple-minded and honest as Elias, and who can tell what aspirations in the candy-making way may have possessed her soul?

Arabella told Elias of some of her own attempts at candy-making, and flattered his pride by asking his advice regarding future ventures, and then he found that she had original notions about novel shapes, and colors, and flavors for candy, that made him open his eyes wide in admiration. She may have wondered how this picture-que participant from some unknown booth happened to know so much about such an interesting subject, but she did not question him, and they prattled playfully about future conquests, and discoveries, and sensations in the candy-making way, when they should work together. Thus the night; and when Elias left Arabella he took her sweet image with him in his simple heart, and all that night, in dreams, he stood by her side, rolling and cutting candy for the public, whose taste it was such good fun to study—with her. And all next day, over his work, his mind was filled with thoughts of Arabella; and because it made him happy to think of her, he did not strive to drive her from his mind—he being a philosopher.

Of course, he contrived to get ordered to deliver some candy at the booth that night, and, of course, he talked, and worked, and laughed, and fell in love with Arabella. At last, just as he was saying good-bye, the lady of the neglected smile hurriedly approached, and spoke:

"Are you not the young man from Grump's?"

"Yes, ma'am; what can I do for you?" answered Elias, with shabby promptness.

What he could do for her he never knew, for what he said made Arabella start, reddened, and turn from him in a manner that drove even the over-taxed smile and its woman out of his mind—as an earthquake might distract the mind of a man in a dentist's chair.

Arabella laughed a little nervously, as she covered her fancy dress with her fur-lined circular, before going home that night. It was all so supremely ridiculous. She had certainly thought Elias a participant, which was an excuse for the acquaintance; but it was not an excuse for the extent of interest she felt in him. It was ridiculous and annoying, but she did have such a preference for the candy trade. Thinking thus (for have I not said she had no soul above confectionary inspiration?) she resolved not to destroy the play, but to leave that unpleasant task to Elias, who, though nothing but a sharp fellow, certainly had relieved the cause of charity of its tediousness. Elias went home that night with his mind in more of a whirl than it had ever been before. By some process of reasoning he could not explain, he had arrived at the conclusion that Arabella by his side, over the work-bench, was something to be confined strictly to dreams. Of course, he set himself learning about the Author's Carnival, and proceeded to the booth the next night with a pretty clear understanding why it would be foolish for him to hope for Arabella's genius in the candy way, and her singularly congenial tastes in connection with his future life.

"I will see as much as I can of her," he thought, poor wretch, "and then it can all go out of my life."

He did not mean to, but the last night of the Carnival he had said:

"The hours are very unhappy when I am away from you, Arabella."

"You must not say such things to me, Elias."

"I know I must not, and that makes all time unhappy."

He went home with his basket on his arm; made just so much more miserable by his love as it had made him more happy than ever before in his life. Went home with a life as lonely, purposeless, and mournful as the ruins of Persepolis, with only its low, leaning desert sky for companionship. Went home with his life chilled with the dull sense that Arabella must be driven from his heart and mind—he being a philosopher. BOUTVILLE.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1882.

A strange accident, arising out of a previous accident, happened recently in the Alps of Upper Savoy. The road between Gietatz and Flumet skirts a deep abyss, known in the neighborhood as the precipice of Bellavardaz. Early in the present year a man named Lansard, while walking along the road, made a false step, fell down the precipice, and was killed. Thereupon, in accordance with local custom, a wooden cross was erected on the wayside, in memory of the defunct and as a warning to passers-by. On October 4th a gentleman named Bibolot, a native of Savoy, but a resident of Turin, was returning by the same road from Flumet to Gietatz, accompanied by two Jesuit school-teachers from Clusaz. When they reached the cross, all stopped to look at the place where poor Lansard lost his life. "I can not understand what Lansard was doing to lose his footing here," said Monsieur Bibolot, "and still less how he should have been killed. Why did he not see this point of rock which juts out at the foot of the cross?" As he spoke these words, Monsieur Bibolot stepped forward, as if to examine the place more closely, and, before his companions could raise a hand to help him, overbalanced himself, and fell headlong down the precipice.

The judge who presided at the recent trial for murder of Fenayrou, his wife, and brother, the phenomenal French criminals, studied his speeches and comments with oratorical gems of "purest rayerene," quite worthy of Jack Bunsby or the grave-digger in "Hamlet." "As a rule," he said to the wife, "a woman does not like to have her husband know that she is unfaithful to him." "It was probably to prevent the cries of your victim from being heard that you gagged him." "There are, as everybody knows, two kinds of tapers—those which are commonly used and the other kind." "The fact that you were in a church should have inspired you with better ideas than those of murder." "At least, if you had killed him single-handed on that former occasion, you would not now have your wife and brother standing here as your accomplices."

M. Elisée Reclus, says the London World, the illustrious author of the Universal Geography, has inaugurated free marriage, and united his two daughters "freely" to two young men of their choice. This adverb "freely" means that M. Reclus has dispensed not only with the religious ceremony of marriage, but also with the civil marriage in presence of the Mayor. He simply invited his friends and relatives to a banquet at the Grand Hotel, over which he presided, and there, and then, literally "across the walnuts and the wine," he declared the union of his two girls with their respective sweethearts. Free marriage is decidedly simple, expeditious, and economical, inasmuch as it involves no fees, either to church or State. In short, it is the last word of progress.

A mob took Andrew Elliott out of jail at Grand Forks, Dakota, and adjusted a rope round his neck; but he argued convincingly that his crime did not merit a death penalty, and suggested that a coat of tar and feathers would be about the right punishment. The lynchers took his view of the matter.

"Here is an excuse from father for absence yesterday," said a school-boy at Paris, Ky., banding a piece of paper to Professor Yerks, "and here is something from me;" and he shot the teacher.

ENGLISH ACTORS IN NEW YORK.

What Three Members of the London Stage are Doing at the Metropolitan.

I was present at the dinner given by the Lotus Club, on recent Saturday night, to Charles Wyndham, the English comedian, and Bronson Howard, the American playwright. The dinner was very exclusive. Only one reporter was allowed to sit in the lower hall, to catch such portions of and brilliancy as floated down stairs, and he was from Tribune. The dinner hour was six o'clock.

The crowd surged into the dining-room, and found the proper places at the tables. There were about a hundred and fifty members present. Among the half-dozen guests were Lester Wallack, John T. Raymond, and Oscar Wilde. Wallack has ceased dyeing his hair, and now appears in natural condition, with a mass of wavy ringlets as white as snow. He looks much older, but is still a very handsome man. Raymond appeared exactly as usual; and Oscar Wilde, who has become so common a sight of late that no longer excites interest, looked like a very disagreeable fanatic. His face has become mottled and swollen, and teeth very much discolored. I have seldom seen a more revolting face than Oscar Wilde's when he laughs.

Bronson Howard sat on Mr. Reid's right hand. He stoutly built man, bald, with a gray mustache and dog chin. He wears glasses and eats hurriedly. His "Young Mrs. Winthrop," is very successful at the Madison Square Theatre. Charles Wyndham sat on the president's left hand. He is, as every one knows, the greatest of English light comedians, as well as the wealthiest actor of day. The most of Wyndham's money was made in that remarkable translation from the French, "Pink Dominoes." The play was presented here after an exhaustive amount of purification, but even then it was so vulgarly broad, glaringly immoral, and palpably suggestive that an outcry was raised against it that spoiled its anticipated run. But in England it went like wildfire. When Wyndham produced it at Criterion Theatre in London, he expected it to take moderate run if its immoralities did not condemn it, and it up in good style. For the first two weeks the crowds surrounded the theatre for blocks, and struggled to get Wyndham saw his chance; he organized companies and sent them out on the road, until he had half a dozen representations of "Pink Dominoes" going at once. The British public seemed absolutely inappetent, and hungered for a new what it fed upon. Wyndham had an odd way of trading about the country, and dropping in on his different combinations at all times and places, and playing the principal role himself for a night and then rushing off again. He kept the standard up and boomed the play. At the end of the first year of the "Pink Dominoes" craze Mr. Wyndham transferred three hundred and fifty thousand dollars to bank account, and went right on with the play. His standpoint is the perfect discipline of his company. In the Criterion comedy company every actor and actress is a star in one sense. The people who play small servants' parts in many instances far better than some of our leading players, and the ensemble of the company is ahead of that of any stock organization in this country. They opened Tuesday at the Union Square Theatre, and scored a big success.

The dinner was eaten in about two hours, and then speech-making began. Mr. Reid rose slowly in his seat and introduced Bronson Howard.

Speeches followed from every one of any prominence, including a gentleman of rotund and happy personality, whose name was A. A. Cohen, who came from San Francisco, who made a bright little speech in honor of his election to membership of the Lotus. At one A. M. the affair broke with every man talking, joking, and laughing.

Rather hard lines on Mrs. Langtry, to have the Park Theatre burn down on the very night of her début. It was somewhat harder on Mr. Abbey, however, as he comes out so thing like one hundred thousand dollars loser. I saw Marcus R. Mayer, who is somewhat eminent here in consequence of the vast quantity of abuse that is heaped upon him, a few days ago. He goes to San Francisco on the 25th instant, to prepare the way for Langtry. He is Mr. Abbey's right-hand man, and would deserve a good word if it were not for the immovable rule that proclaims that must be abused at all times. We are done up brown Langtry. She is everywhere, and takes rank as the most extensively advertised woman in the world, not excepting Bernhardt. She shrinks from notoriety, and is excessively discreet. Most of her time is spent at rehearsals. She appears next Monday at Wallack's.

The exclusive and aristocratic "split" from the F. C. D. is overrun with applications for membership. The break occurred last winter at a ball of the F. C. D. C., in Delmonico's north rooms, when a party of very objectionable people got in through loosely distributed invitations. Mamma's papas made a great ado about it. There are a great many young girls in the F. C. D. C., and "rosebuds" must be tenderly kept. Mr. Ward McAllister, the progenitor, projector, and prime mover in this dancing-class, was berated for allowing objectionable people to enter, and he lost his temper, and said that the tone of the balls was good enough for any one that he knew. This was taken as a mortal personal insult by no less than five extremely exclusive social women, who at once organized an opposition class, to be called the "Small and Early." Here it will be safe for débutante to appear without seeing any one who is not every sense proper. The genial Mr. McAllister has sneered openly at the Small and Early, and announced that the F. C. D. C.'s first ball of the season on December 4th would squelch the bolters, so that they will be glad to return.

Wrong, Mr. McAllister. People worship the exclusive. The success of the Small and Early is already assured. The other mighty social factor—the conglomeration of gentlemen known as "Patriarchs"—is in a flourishing condition. The new members of vast wealth and irreproachable social standing have been elected. They are George Peabody Williams, Henry S. Fearing, and Robert E. Livingston. The Patriarchs propose to give the greatest series of balls in the year that the city has ever seen. The proper thing would be a "split" from the Patriarchs to be called the "and Tardy."

NEW YORK, November 5, 1882.

CRIMINAL OR CRANK?

By J. T. Goodman.

II.

"As we passed from the glare of the lamps that lighted the front of the theatre into the comparative gloom beyond, I raised my arm and carried it at a rest breast high. A man with heavy whiskers pushed atwart me; the movement of my hand was not at all noticeable or unnatural in such a struggling crowd, and he fell upon the pavement like a clod, without uttering a sound or making a gesture. The force of the throng bore me some distance beyond him before it was discovered that some one had fallen, and a space was opened about the spot. They attempted to raise him, but he was lax and insensible. After a little confusion he was borne into a drug-store near by, and medical aid was speedily summoned."

"During the brief interval I had been intent upon two things—to discover if anybody had observed my proximity to the man when he fell or had seen the movement of my hand, and to ascertain if any odor of the prussic acid was discernible. No one had recognized me or noticed the motion. Those who witnessed the result stated solely that the man was walking along with the crowd, when he suddenly fell without any apparent cause. Evidently I had performed the operation so skillfully that no acid had been spilled, as there was not the faintest smell of it to be detected. So far all was well. After a while I pressed my way through the crowd that surrounded the drug-store, and gained admittance. Two doctors, a policeman, the clerks, and a few other persons, were present. All efforts to resuscitate the man had been abandoned; he was dead beyond any doubt, and the coroner had been notified to take charge of the remains. I asked casually what was the trouble, and was told that a man had dropped dead coming out of the theatre."

"I stepped to the spot where the body lay a little apart, and examined it carefully. It was that of a man of about forty years of age, rather large, and powerfully developed by active pursuits; features regular, expression pleasing, and general appearance that of a sea-faring man. It was a little singular that one whose vigorous manhood promised a ripe old age should have drawn the solitary prize in my lottery of death. I turned the head carelessly, in order to see if the operation had left any trace. None was visible; and if there had been any, it would have been concealed by the blood which flowed from a contusion of the temple, matted the hair and whiskers on that side. One of the physicians asked if I had any particular opinion regarding the case. I inquired if there had been any more noticeable symptoms when he was first called. He said: 'None whatever; the man was dead; the only noticeable feature was the extreme relaxation of the muscular system.' 'That was not enough,' I replied, 'to base any definite opinion upon; it might result, as well as death itself, from a number of causes not discoverable by ordinary examination; an autopsy is the only means of arriving at any conclusion.' But the autopsy, as you will have surmised, revealed nothing."

"The man was identified as the first-officer of a British vessel recently arrived in port. There was no derangement of the vital organs, no traces of poison, no marks of violence; in short, there was absolutely nothing to account for the tragedy. The baffled coroner's jury rounded off its verdict with the convenient phrase of, 'Came to his death from causes unknown'; the remains were buried, and there apparently was the end of it. My experiment had been successfully performed. I had committed murder—a premeditated, deliberate, flagrant murder. The deed had passed the authorities unchallenged, unsuspected; and now the only evidences of it were buried in the earth and in my own breast. No human power could ever obtain a clue to it unless I furnished it voluntarily—which was a precluded contingency. Surely, here was a murder that would not out. I might exult over the proverb as it had exulted over me, and bid the stultified falsity, with its cap and bells, and empty rattle, begone from my mind. And it did go, so far as the tiresome reiteration of it was concerned, but not by my volition or its own; it was crowded out by an intruder so incalculably more tormenting than itself that I prayed the old torture to return, if it could banish the new. Until the deed was done and my purpose achieved, I had been too intent upon its accomplishment to think of any consequences to myself, other than those I had forestalled by secrecy. I had regarded it simply as a philosophical experiment, whose only danger was to be overcome by skillful manipulation. No moral, mental, or conscientious view of it ever suggested itself to me. My random selection had been made with as much indifference as impartiality. I had thought that upon whomever the choice might fall the subject would be a matter of no more moment to me than those that came under my knife in the operating-room. The object in view appeared of sufficient magnitude to justify the sacrifice of whole hecatombs of lives. How much of this was peculiar to myself, how much the effect of professional training, are questions that can be submitted to no sure arbiter."

"The old English law excluded butchers from the jury-box in capital cases, because their calling brutalized them, and rendered them careless of life. There would have been more sense in excluding the medical fraternity on that ground. I am not an unfeeling man in other respects, but until this fearful lesson I placed a light estimate upon human life, in common with the whole guild. I learned too late that I was mistaken in my preconceptions. After the affair was over, and properly should have been dismissed from my mind, it began to stalk before me at all hours and in all places, like a vengeful apparition, presenting itself in aspects I had never seen before. My motive dwindled to a pitiable whim, unworthy the serious consideration of a rational being, while the killing expanded itself to a monstrous crime which no inducement could justify. I experienced an unprofessional curiosity concerning the murdered man. Who was he that had thus unexpectedly encountered my fatal spleen? What aims and usefulness had been destroyed by my silly prejudices? What ties had been sundered, what hearts bereaved, by my wanton inhumanity? Such were the thoughts that drove the monotonous adage from my mind, and filled it with an anguish compared with which the former torture was happiness."

"The first reflection of this character was aroused when I examined the body in the drug-store, and saw what a splendid physical development I had overthrown. Thereafter the interest in my victim became intensified day by day. I collected all the accounts from the different journals respecting his death; I secured a transcript of the testimony taken at the inquest; I visited the ship to which he was attached, learned all that his shipmates knew concerning him, and obtained his photograph from one of the officers; I sought out his grave, and made frequent pilgrimages to it; and time after time I found myself at the scene of the murder, rehearsing its incidents in my imagination. The interest grew until the dead man took complete possession of me; the thought of him interfered with my studies, obstructed my professional labors, intruded upon my social life, and entered into my dreams. But the worst was yet to come. So far the consciousness of him had been only subjective; but at length he appeared to me as a visible apparition, and has never since quitted my sight. He always moves or stands just in front of me, presenting his side-face temptingly for the fatal operation, as he did the night I performed it. I know the spectre is unreal; but that knowledge in no wise mitigates the remorse and horror excited by it; my mental suffering could not be greater were I actually chained to his corpse."

"This is what has wrought the change in me that has attracted your attention; this is the weight that has become unendurable. The despised adage has vindicated itself; the murder is out. In asking you to respect my confidence, I have no selfish wish to escape punishment, for anything that the law could inflict would be a relief compared with what I already suffer; but the crime may be properly expiated without entailing upon innocent parties, and upon my profession, the pain and disgrace of a public execution. Any atonement would be incomplete, however, unless, when the end comes, some one should know the cause, and be able to bear witness to this additional proof that no moral law can be transgressed without bringing punishment in one shape or another. That consideration, and the uncontrollable impulse of misery to unburden itself, have induced this confession."

"I thank you for your patient attention; may no painful recollection of what you have heard prove an evil requital of your kindness."

"I am more than ever satisfied that this is only hallucination, Waldegrave," I said, when he had finished speaking. "There is no material point in your statement but is so utterly at variance with your character and disposition, that I can more readily believe the whole thing to be delusion than that you have undergone a change which could render it in the least degree probable."

"No change was necessary to make it actually true," he replied. "You fail to distinguish between what you believe me to be and what I am. I doubt if any one ever had an entirely correct conception of another. From certain observations and experiences we idealize characters which we confer upon different persons, and esteem or dislike them accordingly; whereas it is not likely that in a single instance the real character of the individual is anything like the one we ascribe to him. I infer from your remark that your conception of me was so exalted that it would be as possible for the leopard to change his spots or the Ethiopian his skin as for me to commit a crime, in your estimation. It was simply a misconception. There were no spots or skin to change. The impeccability you imputed to me existed only in your imagination; my nature really is full of turpitude. You have judged me solely from the practices by which I have tried assiduously to overcome my proneness to evil. They were borrowed virtues; the native disposition all the while was the brutal one that now comes forth and confesses to this ghastly deed."

"Your assertions simply confirm me in my theory of hallucination; they are as illusory as your other statements. But it is useless to pursue the argument in that direction, as it would be impossible to bring it to any determinate issue. I will take a shorter course, and declare the alleged facts improbable and absurd in themselves; they never existed, except in your fancy."

"In that phase the question is demonstrable; it no longer depends upon my assertion," he answered, taking from a wallet a number of newspaper clippings and a photograph, and placing them before me. "Here are reports of the death and inquest; this is the likeness of the murdered man; the killing and the spectre I can not show you, but they are as true as the other details."

A glance at the excerpts showed that the obvious circumstances were substantially as Waldegrave had related them, while the picture conformed to his description of the asserted victim.

"I did not mean the facts had never occurred in this sense," I said. "I have no doubt that a man fell dead and was taken into the drug-store, and that this is his likeness. I meant that you never had any association with the tragedy further than being near by, perhaps, at the time of its occurrence, and possibly looking at the remains as you have stated. The rest was the work of a disordered imagination, which wrought out of these simple incidents a mysterious crime in which morbid fancy represented you to be the guilty agent."

"You admit more than you intend to. You do not appear to perceive that the disordered imagination, which you concede, would render me as capable of committing the crime as of simply conceiving to have committed it. No, the murder can not be reasoned away by any theory, however plausible. If it could, my conscience would grasp at the conclusion more eagerly than does your friendship. But the crime must remain a grim, unalterable fact, and while I live there is no escape from the guilt and remorse with which I have blackened my soul."

"Waldegrave," I said, after some reflection, "this is too serious a subject for me to maintain my part of the discussion in the unprepared way I am doing. My inability to overcome your sophistries only confirms you in your error. You have not shaken my belief that your participation in the man's death is pure hallucination; but I must have more tangible arguments to oppose to your assertions. Allow me a day for thought and investigation. I will proceed with every caution you could desire. Will you come here again to-morrow evening, or shall I visit you?"

"If your doubt of my statement did not imply a higher respect than I deserve," he replied, a little bitterly, "I might feel it to be offensive—were I capable of a misapprehension in my overpowering consciousness of guilt. As it is, I feel nothing but an abject sense of having sunk so low that even my word is entitled to no credence. I have no objection to your investigating as fully as you like; but it will result in nothing. The secrecy I observed in executing the deed precludes any possibility of tracing or disproving the crime. At the end of your labors you will find yourself exactly where you now are, with nothing but my word to prove that I was in any way connected with the man's death."

"Leave that to me," I said; "only promise to afford me any reasonable assistance I may ask. Where shall we meet?"

"I can not say, in my unsettled state of mind. Perhaps we may never meet again. Let chance decide that, as it is likely henceforth to decide everything else for me."

"Such a state of feeling is unworthy a man of your intelligence, Waldegrave," I said, somewhat sternly. "You know that it originates in disease. This whole wretched fallacy has sprung from the same source. You require treatment. Give over your labors for a while, and put yourself under the care of some trusted physician."

"It is not worth while discussing the matter further," he replied; "we should never agree. To uproot a favorable impression of one's self is an unpleasant task at best; but little inducement is required to forego it. I am weak enough almost to hope I may continue to live in your memory a better man than I am. Good-bye!"

I extended my hand again, but he refused to take it, and was gone before I could make any instance or qualify the harshness of my last remarks by more sympathetic words.

Reviewing the subject in my mind, I could arrive at no fixed conclusion, and felt myself drifting away from the tentative one to which I had held. When I considered the purity of Waldegrave's nature, and the humane purposes by which he had always been actuated, together with the improbable character of the alleged crime, his statement appeared preposterous to the last degree, and accountable only on the theory of hallucination; but against such a conclusion stood the statement itself—calm, rational, circumstantial—the corroborative facts of the death as reported in the public journals, and the remarkable change that had come over him. My argument that the murder was a fiction which his disordered imagination had wrought out of a simple, sudden death, had been fairly met by his suggestion that such a disordered imagination would be as capable of committing the deed as of conceiving to have done so. Indeed, he had overborne me at every point of the discussion. If there was any mental infirmity in his case, it had not revealed itself during our interview. Nothing could be more coherent than his narrative, or more forcible than his reasoning. These considerations unsettled my original conviction of hallucination, and left me in a state of doubt that was more tantalizing as I saw no means of dissipating it. The quickness with which he discerned the futility of any effort in that direction was an additional proof of the readiness and clearness of his intellect, which helped to dispel the theory of a diseased mind. Whether he was wholly unconnected with the man's death, or whether he had murdered him in the manner asserted, were questions equally indeterminate; the absence of all association in one case, and the profound secrecy observed in the other, would alike baffle investigation.

The result of a night's reflection was the conclusion that my surest course of procedure lay with Waldegrave himself. I would ask him to show me the instrument, the acid, the way in which he had handled them, the route he took upon the streets, the points at which he stopped—in short, every minute circumstance that could have attended the commission of the deed. If he was at a loss upon any of these points, I should feel satisfied that the crime had existed only in his imagination. If, on the other hand, he was ready and positive respecting every particular, I saw no alternative to accepting his statement as true.

With this object in view, I went to his residence early in the day. As I mounted the steps I was startled at seeing crape on the door. My errand was useless; Waldegrave had been found dead in his study that morning. The autopsy revealed no cause for his death. I took occasion when no one was present to examine the remains. There was a slight puncture in the skin concealed by the left whisker, which, with the subsequent discovery of a hypodermic syringe on a table close to where the body was found, left no doubt in my mind as to the manner of his death.

Did the act confirm his guilt, or was it only the culminating proof of his madness? The question was debatable as the other points that had been raised by his purported confession; the deed could be urged with equal force in support of either conclusion. I finally allowed it to weigh in favor of my original conviction. Patient and thorough investigation threw no additional light upon the subject; it was impossible to advance a step beyond the point at which our discussion had ended. In consequence, I naturally clung to my first prepossession, and I still believe that Godfrey Waldegrave died a victim to pure hallucination.

R. L. Stevenson tells a pretty story illustrative of the power of romance. A friend of his, a Welsh blacksmith, was twenty-five years old and could neither read nor write, when he heard a chapter of "Robinson Crusoe" read aloud in a farmhouse. Up to that moment he had sat content, huddled in his ignorance; but he left that farm another man. There were day-dreams, it appeared, divine day-dreams, written, and printed, and bound, and to be bought for money and enjoyed at pleasure. Down he sat that day, painfully learned to read Welsh, and returned to borrow the book. It had been lost, nor could he find another copy but one that was in English. Down he sat once more, learned English, and at length, and with entire delight, read "Robinson."

Berlioz, the composer, when he was in love, said to the adored one: "Ariel, I adore you, I bless you—in a word, I love you more than the weak French tongue can say. Give me an orchestra of one hundred performers, and a chorus of one hundred and fifty voices, and I will tell you."

"Between the ages of twenty and thirty," says a cynical philosopher, "love is an event; between thirty and forty, it is an accident; after forty, it is an incident."

This great political revolution that has swept the continent is a successful uprising against the corrupt methods of the Republican party. There has been no such political revolution in the United States since the Harrison campaign. It is anomalous in all respects. It is without precedent in the history of popular government in any country of the civilized world. It possessed none of the elements of party enthusiasm that characterized the great Whig uprising of 1840, but is the result of the calm, deliberate reflection of the best and most intelligent men of the nation. It is evidence, if evidence were wanting, that the Republican party is the party of moral ideas, the party of patriotism, and the party that has the moral courage to correct abuses within its ranks. No political organization ever existed that had so loyal a following, no party whose history indicated so high a purpose, and whose achievements were so splendid in results. It had successfully accomplished a civil war upon which depended the integrity of the national Union and the preservation of the national life. It had rescued a race from bondage, and emancipated four millions of slaves. It made them citizens of the Republic, and clothed them with equal civil rights under the law. It reconstructed rebellious States and restored to them sovereign authority. It preserved the national credit, and, at the rate of ten millions of dollars per month, was paying the national debt. The country was honored abroad and prosperous at home. Peace and plenty everywhere prevailed. All industries thrived. The ambition of party-leaders had over-leaped itself. The methods of Republican party rule had become corrupt. Aspiring senators had become intriguing politicians. The long use of power had begotten abuses, and there was formed a political conspiracy that had for its end the subjugation of the country, its offices, its honors, and its revenues to an organized class of officials. The first exhibition of this insolent and dangerous conspiracy was made at the National Convention at Chicago, where the triumvirate of senators marshaled their hosts to control the party. There assembled at Chicago Don Cameron of Pennsylvania with his men-at-arms, Conkling in the pride of a strong following, John A. Logan with his cohorts, with General Grant in hiding in Galena ready to be summoned as conquering hero, when in violation of party rules and national traditions he should have been nominated to a third Presidential term. This conspiracy was in defiance of public sentiment, and was to have succeeded by the votes of delegates from those Southern States that had no possible vote in the Electoral College. The defeat of this plot was the first staggering blow at the national bosses. It was the first disarrangement of the party machine. Then the election of Garfield, though all the Stalwart chieftains sulked in their tents, the organization of a cabinet with Blaine, the appointment of other than Stalwarts to a proper share of the offices and dignities of the country, the inauguration for the first time of a foreign policy that should maintain honor upon the American continent, the death of Garfield, the succession of Arthur, the reinstatement of Stalwarts to high places, the removal of Blaine and all of Garfield's friends from office, the repudiation of the American policy, and then for the first time the complete organization of a national machine that had the President of the United States for its boss. After that followed practical politics, and the President, working with objectionable machine methods, goes to New York to secure the defeat of Cornell for Governor, and the nomination of a cabinet officer by means that were as disgraceful as the terms "fraud" and "forgery" can express. In Pennsylvania the better Republicans revolted against the Cameron rule. All over the nation, from this side of Maine—which was rescued by Blaine and which is a significant fact—to the Pacific, came such an uprising and revolution against Republican leaders and the machine, as has never occurred before in the history of the country. It is the declaration of intelligent, disinterested, and patriotic Republicans that the party is not above the country, nor corrupt leaders above the party. It expresses the unmistakable determination of the honest rank and file to destroy party bosses, great and small, to annihilate the machine, and to reform the methods that were used to control the masses. It means purification of the party from within. It means that Conkling, Cameron, Logan, the Hoars of Massachusetts, Tilley of St. Louis, Estee of California, the ring-thieves, the postal thieves, Robeson and the navy thieves, the land-rats and the water-rats, shall no longer be permitted to prey upon the country in the name of Republicans, and under the shadow of the Republican party. To speak of this uprising as a "Democratic victory" is a misuse of terms. It is a Republican victory, second in importance to none that it has achieved, because it is a victory over itself. It is a convincing demonstration that the party has the moral courage to discipline its own criminals, and punish by banishment and exile from influence or leadership its own corrupt members. The vote in New York and in California can, we think, be accounted for on no other hypothesis than the one we have suggested. The party leaders had become corrupt. The bosses had obtained control. The machine and its methods were relied upon to work out infamous results in defiance of the wishes of an honest majority. A well-meaning and unorganized majority had become helpless, as against the practiced chicanery of a vicious and organized minority, and the only real, thorough, and practical remedy that could be found was to permit the Democracy to attain power. This was achieved in different ways. A great many Republicans abstained from voting—about forty-five per cent. in New York, and about twenty-five per cent. in California. Many thousands voted directly for Cleveland and Stoneman. Some voted for prohibition, but all for reform. Some of those, who through force of habit and party discipline voted the ticket, did so as an act of desperation, and perhaps because they had no confidence that any good could come from the Democratic Nazareth; and even these men, or such of them as had no personal and selfish motives, are rejoiced at the result.

And now, is not the logical outcome of all this the nomination of James G. Blaine as the next Republican candidate for the Presidency? He has, it is true, declared that he is no longer ambitious. We can well understand his feelings in view of his past history, for he is the most distinguished victim of this conspiracy. He was the first martyr to the national machine, after it had attained the distinction of being run by a Presidential boss. Six years ago he would have been nominated if Boss Conkling had not intrigued against him. Two years ago he would have been nominated, if bosses Conkling, Cameron, and Logan had not combined for his defeat. He was expelled from the Cabinet by Boss Arthur. These political persecutions have emphasized his popularity. His distinguished ability is not questioned. His distinguished party and national service is confessed. His foreign policy has been vindicated. His patriotism and integrity are challenged by no loyal or honest man. He is beloved and honored by the masses of the Republican party above any man in it, and, in our judgment, he is the only Republican statesman who can unite and enthuse the party as its Presidential candidate in 1884 sufficiently to make an election possible. Arthur, Grant, Conkling, Logan, and Cameron are no longer available. A military man we will not have. Sherman is vain and shallow, and is not a Republican. If E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, could overcome the influence of Logan and beat the local machine, he would be available; would be strong with the Germans, by reason of his splendid service as minister to France during the Franco-Prussian war. Harrison, of Indiana, is perhaps available. He would not be popular upon this coast, by reason of his votes upon the Chinese question, but it is otherwise a fairly representative Republican. Cornell, of New York, is within the category of possible candidates, if the feud in that State can be adjusted. Beyond this list there are dark horses. But the party is not in position to again become enthusiastic over an unknown nobody; nor, in our judgment, will the party again submit to the sacrifice of a prominent statesman, like Blaine, because he is not satisfactory to the ambitious managers, who are themselves unable to attain a nomination.

The Democracy of San Francisco have wisely determined not to celebrate their victory by a procession with bonfires and illumination, and to refrain from any exultant demonstration. The wisdom of this abstinence from any display rests in the fact that the Democracy has obtained no victory. Like a walk-over at a horse-race, when all the entries save one are scratched, the walking winner takes the purse. The Democracy has had no contest, either in State or city. The Republican party did not give battle. Some of the Republican camp-followers threw out a line of skirmishers, threw up dirt entrenchments, mounted them with Quaker guns, and set up the very devil of a yell when the enemy approached; but the guns were not shot, and there was no army behind the entrenchments. It is very kind and very considerate of Judge Pat McGuire not to "exult over a vanquished foe," and if this newly elected member of the judiciary, this most unfortunate judicial accident, would let politics alone and study law, he might make a less stupendous ass of himself on the bench than he is certain to do if he remains a ward politician. This same remark applies to Judge-elect Clough, who has before him the task of convincing even Democrats that he is not an unlearned and altogether unfortunate incident of this party accident. We make no apology for this exhibition of contempt toward these two small, noisy politicians. Our contempt is unbounded for the man who, holding a judicial position, has not the sense and dignity to withdraw from small politics and party manipulation. For Judge-elect Coffey we have great respect. He has the requisite learning to adorn his position. He has integrity and dignity. The writer voted for him, and we are certain we shall not hear of him in ward politics. We shall utter no criticism against Judge-elect Toohy, if he will confine himself to the performance of his judicial functions. Any person elected by the Democracy is entitled, now that he is elected, to a fair opportunity to demonstrate by his conduct his fitness for position. It is not generous to prejudice him, or in advance to criticise him. The Democracy in San Francisco, in California, and throughout the nation, is now in position to win a great and permanent victory. If it can use power without abusing it; if it can administer government with honesty and economy; if it can demonstrate that it possesses the purpose to conduct the national, State, and municipal offices for the benefit of all the people; can preserve order, protect property, and guard personal rights better than the Republican party did—then it will be entitled to maintain its present ascendancy. In order to do this, let it remember that its present position is not owing to its own strength of numbers, or its own virtues, but to the fact that such Republicans as those who edit the Argonaut had the courage to chastise the corruptions and insolence of Republican bosses by destroying the party machine.

There are Republicans in this city by thousands, in the State by tens of thousands, and in the nation by hundreds of thousands, who are in no haste for a political reaction if the Democracy will behave itself, and who will gladly see that party retain power, if, by its acts, it shall demonstrate its worthiness. There is a great, intelligent, tax-paying, and independent middle class which cares but little for politics and nothing for party. It is indifferent as to which party is in power, if it does not abuse its power. Its members would be gladly left to pursue private vocations undisturbed, if they could do so in safety. But they are keenly and intelligently sensitive to the conduct of politicians and parties, and are ever ready to join the minority in punishing the crimes of the majority. If the Democratic party had the courage to correct the immigration and naturalization laws, reduce the extravagant expenditures of the nation, forget the war, and not attempt to pay the Confederate debt; if it would modify the revenue laws in the direction of free trade, firmly resist Chinese immigration, keep free from political bosses and party machines, then it might enjoy an immortality of power, and this recent political revolution would become a great party victory.

The recent Democratization of the Senate and House of Representatives of the nation has stamped the final seal of approval upon the recent anti-Chinese immigration movement. There was a possible danger that a Republican Congress would have attempted some modification of this law. It is undoubtedly true that in New England, in New York, and probably in other sections of the country, there is a feeling that this law, which excluded one class of foreigners and admitted another, was not in harmony with the general sentiment of republican institutions. Had the Republican party been as strong as it was in war times, or should it have again attained the strong position it once held in the nation, there was a probability that it would have encouraged an effort to repeal the anti-Chinese bill. The danger has now passed. The Democratic party is composed of a majority of alien voters and voters of alien parentage, with whom the sentiment of opposition to the Chinese is almost a universal one. The Irish element, almost to a man, is fixed in its hostility in this direction, and is nearly unanimous that the present law shall be neither repealed nor modified. This is in accordance with our own opinions, and is a result which we would not desire to change. Our reasons for limiting the invasion of Chinese laborers have been so often repeated that it is not necessary at this time to reproduce the argument. To limit the immigration of Chinese is, we hope, but the entering wedge of a kind of civilization that shall be extended to Europeans. We have established the precedent that we may prevent undesirable classes from coming to the United States. This is a great and pregnant fact. It blazes out the path for further progress in the same direction, and we hope that the time is not far distant when an American Congress will have the courage to consider how far it may be desirable to change and modify our immigration laws that we may limit the influx of criminals, paupers, and undesirable classes from all other lands; also, whether it will not be well to so change the form of our laws of naturalization that we shall withhold from all foreign-born persons the privilege of the election franchise. We are quite confident that laws of this character will meet the approval of a very large part of the more intelligent, wealthy, and better class of our adopted citizens. Those respectable men of foreign birth who have domiciled themselves among us, acquired property, raised families, and thoroughly and permanently identified themselves with us, have the same interest in these questions as those who may trace a longer ancestral American lineage. Their interests are in common with us, and while the character of laws we suggest would not interfere with them or their acquired rights, we feel confident that the more intelligent of them would be found willing to cooperate with Americans in forming an American party, which shall correct the abuses we are now laboring under, and prevent the disastrous results that are the inevitable outcome of unrestricted immigration and our present loose system of naturalization. Legislation of this character can only be initiated by a minority party and by an American party. The Democracy embraces so many foreigners and the Republican party so few that we are justified in calling the Republican the American party. There is a poetic justice in invoking against the Pope's political Irish a doctrine that they have themselves insisted upon in reference to the Chinese. The political millennium will have begun when the Congress of the United States shall have the courage to declare that the immigration of European ignorance, bigotry, crime, and mendacity is no longer possible, and when an American Congress shall dare to say that no one, not born upon the American soil or under the American flag, shall be entrusted with the privilege of making, interpreting, or executing our laws.

There is all over this broad land an exultant and confident feeling as to the future of Republican institutions. The intelligent and thoughtful persons of all parties recognize the fact that there is such a thing as a national conscience, and that, when it is stirred to think and act, it thinks intelligently and honestly, and acts wisely and well. This election has demonstrated that the people of the whole country can be stirred by a common sentiment, and can act as a unit for the accomplishment of a national reform. The rapid interchange of opinions, through the press and by the telegraphic system, makes it possible for all the people to strike at once, and thus the blow is felt simultaneously in every part. The party wrong that is perpetrated in Maine, Louisiana, or California, touches the public nerve, and stirs the public pulse all through the nation. The Democracy think this is for them a party success. They are mistaken. It is the death-blow to all parties and party organizations that think to live by party discipline and to thrive by plunder. To be able to destroy Republican party machines, to annihilate Republican party bosses, to sweep out of existence Republican party rings, to punish Republican party thieves, and correct Republican party abuses, is but the beginning of a movement that will sweep all political machines, bosses, rings, thieves, and abuses out of existence. It emancipates every honest man from party thralldom. It breaks down and destroys party government, and introduces into national and State politics intelligent deliberation, to be followed by independent patriotic action. The Democracy should be the last to laugh at the prospect of intelligence and independence in the politics of the country.

The evidence continues to accumulate that the Democracy has carried the country "from Siskiyou to San Bernardino, from the Sierra to the sea"—in fact, both seas; bounded "on the north by Canada, on the east by the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by the Gulf of Mexico, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean," with Central and South America to hear from. Estee, McQuiddy, and McDonald are neck and neck. They are on the home-stretch, and will be in some time next week. Stoneman has been weighed and sent to the stable. Estee would have made a brilliant run, if he had not been handicapped and over-weighted. If he had been allowed his own head, he would have bolted the track, jumped the fence, and legged it across lots for Napa. But with Higgins on his back, and Chute hanging to the tail, Peter Cornwall at one stirrup, and Colonel Gannon at the other, loaded down with beer and whisky, and suffering from the gravel, he did very well—very well, indeed, when we consider his pedigree and his training for the race. Of course, we are delighted at the result. There is such a thing as feeling too good. We are experiencing the sensations of one of Moody's converts. The newly-snatched was asked to pray, and did so somewhat as follows: "We thank Thee, O Lord, for the many benefits we have received at Thy hands. Weary not in well doing, O Lord, but from Thine abundance continue to shed Thy blessings upon us. Thou art rich, O Lord, and we are poor. We are rich enough in spiritual graces, but we lack the material things of this world. Send us, O Lord, a barrel of flour, a barrel of potatoes, a barrel of sugar, a barrel of salt, and a barrel of pepper—oh, 'h—! that's too much pepper. Amen." There are too many of the Pope's Irish to afford us real, unqualified satisfaction. We wanted a shower—a good drenching, pouring Democratic wet-down; but we did not want a tidal wave or a deluge. We are cold water in our politics; we are for McDonald; but we do not want to be drowned. We are like the Irish member of the Father Mathew Society found drunk, who was interrogated by his priest, as follows: "Pat, I thought you a teetotaler." "And so I am, your reverence; but I am not a bigoted one." Of the successful candidates in San Francisco, out of some ninety, forty-six are Roman Catholics. To a narrow-minded and prejudiced American this looks like carrying religion into politics. However, we are not disposed to be severe upon the Catholic clergy for carrying their religion into their politics, so long as the preachers of the Methodist Church North carry their politics into their religion. We believe now in the sudden conversion of Saint Paul. We believe that Balaam's ass saw a vision in its path and spoke. We believe that Jonah was swallowed by a whale, and that Nebuchadnezzar went out to grass. We are no longer incredulous of the miracles of the olden time, since the great body of the Methodist clergy on the Sunday preceding the election did, from their pulpits, preach and pray that the male members of their congregations would vote for the president of the Viticultural Society for Governor, in order to secure the more rigid enforcement of the Sunday law. The following incident is told of an Irishman who was preparing his ballot to vote. He was overheard to say, as he scratched his head, that "bedad, there's too many Americans, and domned Jews, and bloody furreigners on the thing to suit me." He read aloud, with great satisfaction, the names of Pat Connolly, Phil. Roach, Tim McCarthy, Johnny Harrigan, Sullivan, Murphy, Moriarty, and McGuire; but when he came to the name of Toohy his Celtic indignation boiled over, and he exclaimed: "Too-Hy! Oh, the devil take the heathen Chinaman; he 'has no business on the Democratic ticket! I'd rather vote 'for an out-and-out Chiv. I'll vote the regular straight ticket, 'anyhow. This comes from having a blind boss. If Mr. 'Buckley could have seen, he'd never let a heathen Chinese 'slip by him on to the court bench."

"There are sermons in stones." Wonder if St. Stephen thought so when he was being pelted to the death by the order of the Sanhedrim of Jerusalem? The elective franchise is the "bulwark of liberty and the palladium of freedom." Wonder if Estee thought so on Tuesday evening, when the ballots were pouring in, and there came over him the agony of doubt whether he would beat Doctor McDonald or lead McQuiddy. We had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Estee during the week. He bears himself with a fortitude worthy of the most heroic of Christian martyrs. At times he smiles. It is but the germ of a sickly public smile that steals silently up from a heart surcharged with painful emotions; and, while it is not probable that it will ever grow to the boisterous hearty laugh of the olden time, it is hoped that it may survive and attain sufficient strength to rejoice over the defeat of those who did not vote for him. Here is a wide margin of joyful possibilities: 25,000 good citizens stayed away from the polls, and he was beaten some 29,000 votes; 22,000 by General Stoneman, 6,000 to be added for Doctor McDonald, and 1,000 for McQuiddy. To these add the matter-of-course Republicans who never scratch, the office-holders, who must vote, the office-seekers, whose bread and butter hangs upon the chances of success for the ticket, the party machine and its multifarious loafers, and how many intelligent, reflecting, honest gentlemen in California voted for Mr. M. M. Estee? That Mr. Estee, making this computation, and reflecting upon it, can smile, without inhaling laughing-gas, is a fact that commands our unqualified admiration. It shows a soul superior to the calamity of annihilation, and tends to prove the doctrine of its immortality.

In event of an equally balanced Senate, Black-and-Tan will, as a matter of course, again become ambitious of being Secretary. It is, however, scarcely probable that the Senate of the United States will desire to reenact its former farce of "dead-lock" in order to give this worthless profligate another opportunity to steal. General Miller will scarcely be willing to sacrifice himself, and be retired to private life—as he will be compelled to do—if his vote is cast as it was before. Very good reasons existed for his attitude at that time which can never occur again, or, if they do occur, will never be accepted by the Republicans of this State as an apology for impeding the public business in the interest of two such men as Gorham and Riddleberger. This Republican crime of Senatorial dead-lock was one of the offenses remembered by the people of California, and punished on the 7th of November. That and the action of Republican leaders on the Chinese question are hard to sponge out of the recollections of such Republicans as regard the national welfare first, the party second, the party leaders last, and the party dogs not at all.

At the presidential election of 1880 there were polled in this State 164,321 votes, of which Garfield received 80,348, and Hancock 80,442. Weaver, the Greenback candidate, got 3,394 and there were 137 scattering. The latest returns from the State election—incomplete as we write—give Stoneman 79,000 votes, and Estee 58,000—a majority for the Democrat of 21,000 votes. Hancock's majority was 94. The vote of Weaver in the election of 1880 plays about the same rôle as that of McDonald in the contest just closed. Weaver, it is true, drew more largely from the Democrats; McDonald, on the other hand, took his following largely from the Republican party. It is probable that McDonald will reach six thousand votes; at any rate, over five thousand. We here have again the peculiar phenomenon of the Republican disappearance—a phenomenon which repeats itself at times with a suddenness most alarming to the bosses, and with a certainty which is calculated to demoralize the best laid plans of the machine. In 1880, the Republican vote was 80,348; deduct say 1,500 votes cast for Weaver—the result is 78,848. In 1882, the Republican vote is 58,000; deduct say 2,500 votes cast for McDonald—the result is 55,500. This deducted from 78,848, the vote of 1880, shows a balance (on the wrong side) of 23,348. It would seem, then, that 23,348 able-bodied Republican voters have either skipped the State, or have climbed trees until the tidal wave subsides. We think they will climb down again, however, before 1884.

The Reverend Frank F. Jewell, of the Methodist Church, is desperately and most piously indignant at the "whisky triumph" and the "awful consequences of the damnable traffic," and believes that, "out of the ashes of lost hope and over the shame of the people, the stream of reform would come and lift suffering humanity in the course of a not distant future." If the waters of reform never run through the ashes of the political ley-tub till the Reverend Frank F. Jewell and those Methodist parsons who, like him, turned their backs upon the Prohibition party, direct them thither, it will be a long time before the soap is manufactured which will wash out the sins of intemperance. These Methodist preachers lost an opportunity to demonstrate their practical usefulness as reformers. Prayers and preachments do not amount to much in the way of "lifting up struggling humanity," unless followed by votes, and some practical common-sense effort to produce results.

In explanation of our statement that Doctor Briggs voted for the issuance of a license for the sale of intoxicating drinks in the Valley of the Yosemite, he writes us, and says: "Rum is now sold in the valley, and has been for years, in a saloon under license granted by the predecessors of the present board, which license has been modified by the insertion of a clause making any case of drunkenness or gambling on the premises work a forfeiture of the lease." The truth is, liquor is sold at three houses in the valley. This statement is made to us personally by one of the Commissioners. It is a matter of the least consequence whether the liquor traffic in the Valley of the Yosemite exists by the consent of Commissioner Briggs, or in spite of him. It exists, and if Doctor Briggs shall do no more to prevent its sale than he did for the prohibition cause at the last election—viz., to pray against it—it will continue to exist.

The decision of Judge Hoffman in reference to the admission of the Chinese merchant, Fook Ah Heim, is not fairly open to any unjust criticism. Ah Heim is a merchant and former resident of San Francisco. He was entitled, under the treaty and under the recent law, to come and go to and from San Francisco as often as it pleased him to do so. Any limitation of this privilege by the courts would be an act of judicial tyranny. Any hesitation to declare his rights under the law would be judicial cowardice, and any small criticisms by the press are in obedience to a public clamor that comes from a class of foreign demagogues whose prejudices still exist.

What becomes of Black-and-Tan in this political upheaval? Is there to be another dead-lock in the Senate that Mahone and Riddleberger may provide for Gorham? We wonder if it has occurred to any of our more prominent statesmen at Washington that this disgraceful episode of the party history was remembered by the people on the 7th of November. How these Arab chickens did come roosting home.

LITERARY NOTES.

A correspondent, says the Hour, writes from Aix-les-Bains: "It is very amusing to see the bathers carried home in their chairs, all covered with an awning, taken up to their rooms, and tumbled into beds by the porteurs and kept there for twenty minutes. Sometimes the largest of the hotels stupid mistakes are made, people being taken to the wrong rooms, and tumbled into the wrong bed. You can not rectify the mistake, as you are so bandaged up; and if you can not speak French it becomes rather awkward, for the legitimate owner of the bed may be en route homeward and you may meet on the stairs. As for gambling, I have seen as much money lost at baccarat on an evening at Aix-les-Bains as at Monaco. One lady, after her husband's departure, amused herself last week by losing over one hundred and thirty-seven thousand francs. I often see thirty or forty louis put down by a player at one time. I am sorry that so many Englishwomen consider it "the proper thing" to play. The men are mostly a seedy lot of simple gamblers. The form you have to go through to get into the playing-room of the Casino is very strict. This is to make it as much like a club as possible. It is, of course, a mere blind, but sufficient to keep the police away

The Chicago Tribune's Paris correspondent, speaking of some queer American ladies who have flourished in the gay capital, says: "The most prominent and successful of these adventuresses flourished toward the end of the Second Empire. She was very pretty, very fascinating, and as clever and scheming a little witch as ever wore pearl-powder. She went everywhere—winning entrance to the very best of Parisian society by dint of the influence she contrived to exercise over several prominent French noblemen. She actually at one time supervised the lists of American ladies who were to be admitted to the state balls of the Tuileries, and struck from the list the names of all those who refused to receive her. Twice she was on the point of marriage with a titled and elderly Frenchman; and on both occasions the engagement was broken, simply because the intended bride could not produce the necessary papers. She returned to the United States after the downfall of the empire, and has drifted wholly into obscurity."

Miscellany: "A Reverend Idol," now in its eleventh edition, is still being rapidly sold.——Richard Blackmore, the author of "Lorna Doone," does not trust to his imagination for the delightful landscapes which seem now to glow and anon to darken under his pen. He spends months at a time in the places wherein he lays the scenes of his stories, and his studies of moor, forest, and garden are pursued with the keen eye of a painter and a naturalist, and the ardor of a lover.——Harper & Brothers have published in New York the following card in regard to the alleged piracy: "The telegraphed statement of Mr. Clark Russell, published in the Tribune and World of October 29th, to the effect that he 'had never received one single farthing from America,' admits of a simple explanation. We follow one of two courses in paying for English works which we reprint. If we receive advance sheets from the author, we deal directly with the author, to whom we remit the sum agreed upon. On the other hand, if we receive advance sheets from the London publisher, we deal directly with him. In the case of Mr. Clark Russell, we have in every instance received advance sheets of his works from his London publishers, to whom we have remitted the honorarium agreed upon for each."——Mr. Paul Meritt, the dramatic author, whose work is now almost as well known here as in London, was born at Kiev. His real name is said to be Paul Joaquin Maetker, his father having been a native of Prague, in Bohemia.——The unpublished novels of Balzac that were found, at a recent auction sale, of personal effects left by his deceased widow, stowed away and forgotten in the drawer of a writing-table, have been turned over to a Belgian nobleman and scholar, the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, and are to be prepared by him for publication. This gentleman succeeded in saving a large number of letters written by Balzac to his wife that were in danger of destruction.——The authenticity of the new Hawthorne romance is now conceded. The Century, by the way, will shortly publish two of the first drafts or plans which Hawthorne made of the story

What a strange, old-fashioned look the play-bill at the Grand Opera House has had this past week! There was a time when the public would have its drama without a "roaring farce" preceding it, but the roaring farce which was the delight of our fathers and our grandfathers is held in esteem to-day only by those who still retain respect for black hair-cloth furniture. The woman who would furnish her parlor in black hair-cloth to-day would count the hours by an erratic ormolu mantel-clock under a glass shade, would marry a man with long-legged boots, and go calmly through life with him unconscious that there was anything queer about his legs. And they would sit and laugh through roaring farces together, confident that the theatre had fulfilled its mission.

The roaring farce is a date behind the emotional drama, yet it has not looked unfamiliar beside such names as "East Lynne," "Under the Gaslight," and the "Woman in Red." It is wise to resurrect these old plays now and then. There is always some one left who has not seen them, and one can not think without a pang of any reasonable English-speaking person not having wept over "East Lynne." It is a part of one's sympathetic education.

I once knew a man who grew eloquent only upon one subject, and that was Madame Celeste as the Woman in Red, and ever since, although there is no obvious connection between the two, I have been wanting to hear some one sing "Wapping Old Stairs," and to see the play of the "Woman in Red." Ideas, you know, will pair off quite as inconsequently as lovers. "Wapping Old Stairs" has not yet come in my way, but Mrs. Bates put on an odd, clinging, flame-red gown, shot with sparse black hieroglyphics, one night last week, and played Rudiga. I was fresh from a very modern comedy, Gilbert's "On Guard," and it made the artificial staidness of the old play a delicate, unconscious burlesque.

The company at the Grand Opera House is quite good enough for the plays they have been running during the week, and Mrs. Bates is manifestly the fit star for them. She is a pretty woman with a good ringing voice, an experienced style, and a dead earnestness which permits her to play even the "Woman in Red" without cracking a smile. She is an actress who has not picked up one of the stage mannerisms of the past decade. You will see them now and then. Charlotte Thompson is one, and you will find the theatres dotted from floor to ceiling with long-time play-goers, who will assure you warmly, though in other words, that they prefer the stilted measures of these two actresses to the affected realism of the modern metropolitan star.

Going from "On Guard" to the "Woman in Red," I felt, poetically, like Owen Meredith going from the Marchioness of Carabas to his only love with her phrosite face:

"In short, from the present back to the past,
There was but a step to be made."

For "On Guard," though not in Gilbert's best vein, is a pleasant little comedy of to-day, with a very general nineteenth-century atmosphere of artistic drawing-rooms, yachting costumes, tennis shoes, blouses, subalterns, and flirtation. At least, these things all go to form a heterogeneous memory of it, and it all means something of to-day, from the lively Mrs. Fitz-Osbourne and her ingenious young friend to the returned African traveler. People once were not accustomed to dropping in upon you from Africa. Nowadays it is the man who has not been anywhere who is a curio.

What a genius some people have for laying their hands upon the vitality of the little things going on around them. "On Guard" is but a transcript from a bit of every-day English life, yet it made a long evening's pleasure. The most experienced theatre-goer enjoyed the entertainment, for the amateurs played the little comedy most neatly, all of them well, and two or three with the ease and aplomb of professionals. Our English cousins turned out in large numbers in the cause of charity, and it is strikingly comfortable to be charitable in this way—to give the orthodox nite, to sit at ease, and see a witty comedy intelligently played. Sometimes I wonder at our strong metaphysical digestions. An absconding wife and mother, an unconscious bigamist, a touch at poaching, a bit of necromancy, child-stealing, brigandage, the slums of New York, railroad wrecking, wholesale poisoning at a supper party, and the career of a consumptive lorette, have been the main points of the Grand Opera House this week. It is unnecessary to recapitulate the wild succession of incident in the "White Slave." Watch the people emerge from the theatre limp with reaction to realize of how many stirring plays the "White Slave" is composed. After all, the drama of the past is not so much more vivid or lurid than that of the present. Perhaps it draws a little more heavily upon the imagination, for when Rudiga threw open the door of her secret closet the other night, and requested the Countess Constanza Donati to help herself to gold and jewels, a pair of very rocky-looking silver pitchers and a golden ewer were all that presented themselves to make the imagination riotous. The fact that they were obviously of paper, and wobbled badly, detracted considerably from the riot.

In a modern play, the man who is going to pay out his money brings out his check-book. Every one has a sort of involuntary respect for even a check-book. It is not picturesque, nor spectacular, nor beautiful, but it is endlessly, boundlessly, delightfully suggestive; and one can always feel a gentle thrill pervade the circle during the signing of a check. It is so much more dangerously like real business than silver pitchers and golden ewers, for it really, after all, would have been quite absurd on the part of the Countess Constanza Donati to have carried off a lot of this stuff to pay her noble husband's debt with.

The founding alone holds her own in the old drama and the new. In order to be properly interesting, the young person in any drama must be of undetermined parentage, for, to return to Wednesday night, to the absolute contrast of the old and the new, Miss Jessie Blake, in "On Guard," was not quite sure of her own papa at the Baldwin, while in the "Woman in Red," Miss Francesca Donati was turning out to be the daughter of the red enchantress, instead of the Countess Constanza, and Lisa, the white slave, was looking up a mother, at the California. Yet the orphan never became funny till Gilbert burlesqued its woes in the "Pirates of Penzance."

As for Miss Blake, in the comedy, her paternity was in debate only to give the villain—who is not, indeed, a very wicked villain at best—a little chance; for a situation is needed now and then in comedy, as well as brilliancy and repartee. Talking of situations, what mood can have come over the melancholy Alfred de Musset when he boldly appropriated the plot of the tragedy "Cymbeline," and turned it into comedy simply by twisting its ending; for the French Iachimo, in "Barberine," is suspected of his nefarious designs by a pretty slave, Barberine's maid, and locked up in a dark closet, where he is kept on very light fodder till the return of the French Posthumus, whatever his name may be. The tragedy of it all ceases when Iachimo becomes ridiculous.

The slave girl, an Oriental maiden, is a picturesque bit in the play, and given curious prominence, as if De Musset had some one in his mind's eye for the part when he wrote. This was the part that the beautiful young Russian was rehearsing who killed herself the other day in the apartments of the Duc de Morny, so that it is evident the French stage-manager was seeking to abide by the tradition which De Musset intended to give it. "Barberine" is entirely a comedy of situations, and, in so much, different from most of its kin. We have not many of them in our own language, which is odd enough, too; for the quick American temperament is much given to and enjoys nothing more than repartee. No other audience appreciates more keenly those bristling points of dialogue which glance between a pair of wits.

I heard what I thought a clever retort the other day, and I beg the young fiancée's pardon for reporting it. "My dear," said her friend, "how could you ever nerve yourself up to accepting him at last?" "Ah, well," said the one addressed, with a sigh, "I began to think his name would look better on my visiting-cards than my own name on my tombstone, and so I said yes."

There is a bow of promise in the theatrical sky—a holiday season at the Baldwin with the Madison Square plays, the Jersey Lily in the distance at the Grand Opera House, and a change of bill at the California. "My Geraldine," Mr. Bartley Campbell's next play, is said to be an unorthodox Irish drama without Fenianism or famine, and as such certainly almost unique; for the translated, transposed, and transported "Kerry" is too bold a plunder to be accounted a genuine picture of Irish life.

Another one of Mrs. Henry Norton's charming song recitals is announced, with a programme as varied and satisfying as her programmes always are. Meanwhile the charitable ladies of the city, noting an opening place in public amusements, have seized the opportunity to announce an evening kettle-drum at B'nai B'rith Hall on the Monday of Thanksgiving week, for the benefit of the California State Woman's Hospital.

The Christmas play is not much spoken of yet, but "Siberia" is under way at the California, and that seems to mean furs and sleigh-bells, frost and snow, and Christmas weather generally. BETSY B.

"North Columbia."—No, Josie, the editor does not "apprize" the value of MSS., he appraises them; then he appraises the writer of their fate. "In the event of their rejection, are they returned, if stamped envelope is enclosed?" Josie, we should smile. Send along your MSS.—with a stamped envelope, Josie.

"Elizabeth."—You ask "whether the 'obscure intimations' are not 'dummy,' and if the bad poetry therein appearing is not written in the office?" No, Betsy, it is not; when we write bad poetry we print it as "Argonaut Verse." Other bad poetry we print here. Send us some.

"J. M." Santa Barbara.—The article has been read. We are holding it until the advent of some tragedian shall excite public interest, and make the subject more timely.

"Rye Patch," Nevada.—Please send us your name. "H. L. B." Milwaukee.—MS. received, and will be considered. To your remark: "I read the Argonaut regularly, and especially enjoy Betsy B.'s and Zulano's every-day philosophy. May I ask if they are the products of 'the glorious climate of California?'" we are regretfully obliged to reply in the negative. Betsy B. hails from Nova Zembla, and Zulano landed in where is heard the wolf's long howl on Onalashka's shore. But then that is not the fault of the climate. We still produce gigantic squashes and things.

A. E. W., New York, and F. D., Milwaukee.—Thanks; taffy forwarded to the scribbler in question. "D."—I, yes, we do; 2. according to value, like other commodities.

"C. C. R." London.—The verses are good, but their strong flavor of Rotten Row, and the fact that they have ceased to be timely, render them unavailable. Thanks, all the same.

"H. W. V." Saratoga Springs, N. Y.—If the story is forwarded very soon, there is some chance, otherwise not. Verses to appear shortly.

At Haverly's California the "White Slave" has been drawing good houses all the week. "My Geraldine" will take its place on Monday next. "Siberia," Bartley Campbell's new play, is in active preparation, with probably Sara Jewett and Charles Thorne in the leading parts. It will, to all appearances, open on the 27th instant.

The Bush Street Theatre opens on December 25th with Leavitt's Specialty Company, after which will follow the Harrisons.

The Baldwin Theatre has been leased by the Frohman brothers, but will not come under their régime until January.

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Second Philharmonic Concert.

"Gade, Overture, 'Im Hochland,'" read the first of the eight variously noted numbers, whose combined attractions and renown secured so large an audience last week, for the second Philharmonic concert. "And what does 'Im Hochland' mean?" the ignorant of us had time to ask our linguistic betters, while yet it was before eight o'clock, and the lights turned discreetly low. "In the Highlands, of course," said these wise people, with one accord; and the title proved to be no idly chosen superscription of the gifted North-man's selection. Gade wrote with art when he allowed himself the repose and preparation of the short andante, increasing to a moderato, which prefaces the dominant idea and intention of his Scottish overture. Those opening measures of refined and serious thought impart all their worth to the lusty allegro molto. That, indeed, is a hearty, whole-souled movement; but without those first beautiful and simple reminders of humanity's hope, fear, and need, it would be nothing more than the picture of a heather-grown upland, where the air is crystalline, and the sweep of the hills magnificent, yet every association of life and memory is lacking. As it is, we are carried on the wings of music to free, bracken-covered heights; but reminiscence, too, is there, and the senses and heart are charmed together. One is tempted to linger long over the spirit of this particularly fresh and spontaneous composition, whose rendering, under Mr. Hinrichs, was so good in many ways. Its orchestration is such as to give the effect of the instruments all joining hands, while, at the same time, no prolonged or insipid unisons exist. It is like a general conversation which flows easily and well, because all in the room take equal part. Hesitancy and awkwardness of response only appear when silence falls upon the majority, and a single voice finds itself unsupported and alone. Those are apt to be the times in parlors and concert-rooms when smoothness of connection is not everything that could be desired.

The same illustration serves to set forth the precise difference in method that exists between two works so widely unlike as Gade's overture and Schubert's B minor unfinished symphony. In an entirely concerted movement, like the overture, the main points are so definitely set forth, and the swing is so rhythmic, that while a certain roundness of effect may be perceptibly missing, and the sparkle and shine of clear-cut precision be altogether absent, a thousand minor imperfections easily pass unnoticed—in fact, are wholly covered and hidden by the universal speech. But when, as in the allegro moderato of Schubert's delicately constructed symphony, part answers to part, instrument to instrument, and a recurring melody is now here, now there, the tiniest discrepancy must necessarily come to light. Throughout the length of its admirable programme, this one matter seemed the chief cause of trouble to the Philharmonic orchestra: namely, the difficulty of making smooth exchanges and transfers of melody and accompaniment, and when there was nothing to do, of "doing it" all together. Only the first of the two movements which form the unfinished symphony was given at this time. Its difficult syncopated passages were for the most part successfully played, and Mr. Hinrichs's standard of feeling and musical expression is always high. The exceeding beauty and interest of this strange composition—regarded by musicians as Schubert's "most individual creation"—stands in need of no comment. Its poetical loveliness speaks for itself, under all circumstances.

Three movements from Lachner's Suite in D minor—the Præludium, Menuet, and Marsch—excited lively interest. That a short little man, who swears a great deal, wrote the Præludium, might be easily divined; for although it is not precisely profane, its presiding genius seems to be an impish sort of a spirit, whose chief business consists in rushing around, and setting all the instruments down hard at regular intervals, with a tremendous accent. But how came the pure and graceful Menuet, with its delicious trio, in such black company? It seems an estray from some realm of fancy, where ethereal, golden-haired beings salute each other in a dance unknown to our material clumsiness. The March was distinguished by high and loud-voiced aspirations on the part of the wood-wind, which, being out of tune, appalled to a limited sympathy; but the Suite as a whole was exceedingly enjoyable, and should have been more warmly acknowledged.

The allegro molto, from the concerto for violoncello, by Raff, was carefully played by Mr. Julius Hinrichs, whose interpretations are always finely felt and conscientiously executed. The movement in question possesses points of rare beauty, and was happily accompanied. Mr. Hinrichs has not a strong tone, and in extreme registers it is in danger of becoming harshly vibrant; but the quality which determines its character and individuality is very ingenious and pure. Whatever that gentle and appealing something may be is hard enough to say, yet out of the allegro molto (with whose restless force so mild a spirit was scarcely fit to cope), it looked forth from quiet, lamb-like eyes, and won the recognition of all honest appreciation.

Two Saint-Saëns numbers, "Une Nuit à Lisabonne," and "Danse des Prêtresses de Dagon," bore the unmistakable stamp of that composer's musical trade-mark, and were exceedingly smooth and pleasing. Mr. Solano, at the harp, contributed in a good degree to this fortunate end. The Albumblatt, "Mein Schönes Wien," by Strauss, received marked applause, and was a pretty trifle. The familiar Pilgrim Chorus, from "Tannhäuser," by Wagner, was lately introduced, but improved toward its end, and gave rise to the reflection that, with better brass-wind at his command, Mr. Hinrichs's resources would be materially improved. Meyerbeer's "Schiller March," given for the first time, as were numbers four, five, and six of the programme, concluded the evening's profitable entertainment. The third concert of the series will take place December third.

Prominent among coming musical events is a recital to be given by Mrs. Norton, assisted by Mrs. Carmichael-Carr, on Friday evening, the twenty-fourth of November. F. A.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 15, 1882.

At the Grand Opera House Mrs. Bates and company opened on last Monday night in "East Lynne," to a large audience. On Wednesday she changed to the "Woman in Red," and on Thursday to "Lucetta Borgia." Last night "Camille" was played, and this and to-morrow evening will be devoted to "Under the Gaslight." Next Monday night Jay Rial opens with "Uncle Tom's Cabin." On December 20, "Youth" will be produced, with Harry Lee, Emily Rigel, and others. Milton Nobles is in prospect.

LANGTRY'S FIRST NIGHT.

Who Wrote the Criticisms for the New York Press.

Mrs. Langtry's début has had a devastating effect on the critics of New York. Never before did that worthy band suffer as it did on Monday night. The Sun's regular dramatic critic, W. M. Laffan, is in Europe, and Mr. Odion is acting for him. At the last moment it was decided not to send Mr. Odion, but to turn the matter over to Mr. Bowman, who is the musical critic of the paper, and perhaps the best critical writer in New York. However, the musical critic preferred to attend Patti's rény at the Academy, and a muddle occurred in the matter, so that to-day it is not known out of the office who wrote the Sun's admirable account.

The Herald's critic, Mr. White, did not appear at all, but in his stead was Jim Fisher, of the Herald's police department, Joe Howard, general reporter, John Habberton, the author of "Helen's Babies," and Harry McDonough, of the Herald's Arctic Expedition. It will be seen at a glance that this was a wide conglomeration of men, well adapted to pass erudite critical judgment on a theatrical performance. The Tribune sent a sad-eyed "sassy" reporter, who was subsequently supplanted by the saddery-eyed Willie Winter, and the Times appeared in the person of a young man whose blonde hair was banged down to his eyebrows, and who was accompanied by several handsome women.

The World outdid itself. Mr. Kobbé, the regular critic, was calmly set aside, and that long-haired abomination, Oscar Wilde, sent in his place. Oscar's appearance, as he walked in beside Jim Fisher, of the Herald, was interesting. The World, however, seemed to fear that Mr. Wilde might go a little astray, and considerably sent another man along to help him out. The other man was not the regular dramatic critic, however, but a man who gathers police news in the suburban wards above the city. I am sorry it was impossible to range these men in a row on the stage, that the public might have an opportunity to judge of the men who are supposed to direct their thought. But if they were personally incongruous, how much more so were their criticisms? I am told by a managing editor that these productions were telegraphed all over the country, and went by Associated Press to England, so that the entire English-speaking race is at present basking in the radiance of their brilliancy. My sympathies are with the entire English-speaking world. You have probably suffered from their outbreak of critical genius, and are wondering quite as much as I how under heaven ten or twelve men can write columns about a certain woman and yet disagree all around about every point of her beauty, voice, manners, movement, and acting. One would think that the exigencies of the English language alone would cause them to agree in some minor points, at least; but it has been proved that each is of his own particular kind, and nothing is left for us to do but raise our eyes and pray.

I am told that the lovely Jersey Lily cried after she had read the papers, because her efforts to please had been so oddly received. I confess that I myself was almost moved to tears when I read the combined production of the police reporter, the general reporter, the author of "Helen's Babies," and the Arctic correspondent in the Herald, while the article evolved by Mr. Wilde cast a settled gloom over my breakfast, and made the coffee bitter. I wonder why it is that our great dailies do not engage competent men for theatrical criticism? It must be because the position is regarded as a rather "soft" thing, and usually filled through influence, for there are certainly men of enough ability among the newspaper fraternity of New York to supply all the papers with good writers in this particular branch. I never aspired to be a dramatic critic in New York, and fail to understand the charm that the position seems to possess. I think it rather good fun to go to the theatre on first nights with friends, and talk scandalously about actresses afterward at supper; but I don't see the attraction when you have to go every night in the week, and he obliged to rush down town after the second act, and grind out an article for the paper. However, the position is very much sought after.

The hitlerest contest I ever heard of was when Cyrus W. Field bought the Evening Express, and made it a joint paper with the Mail. The paper is now called the Mail and Express, but is more widely known, on account of its general weakness, as the Female in Distress. The Mail had a dramatic and two musical critics, and the Express had a dramatic editor, two dramatic critics, and a musical critic. The men on afternoon papers have nothing to do nights, which is invariably regarded as a good training for dramatic criticism. When the Mail and the Express came together, these seven men were brought face to face, and the most intense and bitter fight in the annals of American dramatic criticism was begun. The war still wages, but alas! only two prelate to carry it on; and as one of them is sickly, the end may come at any time. During all this struggle the proprietor and the editor of the paper steadfastly refused to interfere, leaving it all to the managing editor.

NEW YORK, November 11, 1882. FLANEUR.

During the performance on last Monday night, at the London Globe Theatre, of Tennyson's new drama, "The Promise of May," the Marquis of Queensbury twice arose and protested against Tennyson's representation of the principles of free thought, which, he said, was a travesty on the sentiments of freethinkers. His remarks created a sensation, and the Marquis left the theatre. The plot of this new drama is said to be suggested by Tennyson's poem of "The Sisters," which is printed in another column of this week's issue.

Mr. Samuel M. Fabian, who went to Germany last year for the purpose of perfecting his musical education, has already attracted considerable attention, especially in Berlin. The Prussian press speaks very highly of his abilities. The Stuttgarter Zeitung says of his performance at Wintergarten, on October 13th, that it was a great success, and that the performer received many successive encores. The fact that he has been engaged by Madame Gerster to play in her concerts speaks for itself.

Manager Abbey has leased the Grand Opera House for the second week in December, when Christine Nilsson, supported by the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, will give three concerts.

Emerson's Minstrels have had their usual success during the past week, and have many novelties in prospect.

Roast Venison. Currant-Jelly Sauce.

Vegetable Salad.

Raspberries. Cream Cakes.

Apples, Peaches, Pears, Figs, Japanese Persimmons, Pomegranates, Plums, and Grapes.

CURRENT-JELLY SAUCE FOR DUCKS OR VENISON.—Take a glass of currant jelly, put it in a small saucepan over a slow fire; when it melts add a tablespoonful of butter, a salt-spoonful of cayenne, and the juice of a lemon; stir rapidly for a minute and serve very hot.

CHICKEN CUTLETS.—Season pieces of cold chicken with salt and pepper; dip them in melted butter; let this cool on the meat, and dip in beaten egg and fine bread crumbs. Fry in butter till a delicate brown; serve on slices of hot toast, with either a white or army sauce poured around. Pieces of cold veal make a nice dish if prepared in this manner.

Fashion in Champagne.

When the Prince of Wales suddenly decided, about two years ago, that no wine was suitable for the royal palate but Pommery Sec, the reason was certainly apparent—in fact, just as apparent as it is that kings and princes generally prefer the best of everything. All other wines were banished from the little suppers which the prince gave to his friends, and Pommery became the proper thing. If a nobleman prepared a banquet, Pommery was the first consideration. The London dealers were so surprised that, until they communicated with the French headquarters, they could hardly supply the demand. It was the same way in America. New York society was seized with the craze, and in every fashionable novel of the season Pommery Sec figures prominently. The witty correspondent of the Cincinnati Enquirer writes from the fashionable Virginia White Sulphur Springs that at that gay resort Pommery was at a premium. In fact, this boom may be said to have attained immense proportions; for last year the sale in this country amounted to thirty-eight thousand cases.

When Doctor Norman McLeod was minister of the Barony parish in Glasgow, and loved, as few men have been, by his flock, another minister in the city was called upon to visit a case of sickness. As the applicants were strangers and seemed decent, God-fearing people, he asked if they did not attend any church. "Deed, ay," they said, "we gang to the Barony, but this is a bad case of typhoid and we couldna risk Norman!"

—ON WEDNESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 8TH, the Original Lytton Club gave a party at Lunt's Hall, which was beautifully decorated for the occasion. The six young ladies who comprise the society had done everything in their power to secure a signal success, and their efforts were well rewarded. A large number were present, and dancing was continued until a late hour. Among other dances, the singing lancers, which was very successful.

—ATTENTION SHOULD BE DIRECTED TO THE advertisement in another column of a complimentary concert tendered to Mrs. L. P. Howell and Mrs. A. E. THE MAN-EATING TREE.

A Tale of Nubia.

Before committing this paper to the ridicule of the Great Mediocre—for many, I fear, will be inclined to regard this story as incredible—I would venture on the expression of an opinion regarding credulity, which I do not remember to have met before. It is this. Placing supreme Wisdom and supreme Unwisdom at two extremes, and myself in the exact mean between them, I am surprised to find that, whether I travel toward the one extreme or the other, the credulity of those I meet increases. To put it as a paradox—whether a man be foolisher or wiser than I am, he is more credulous. I make this remark to point out to those of the Great Mediocre, whose notice it may have escaped, that credulity is not of itself shameful or contemptible, and that it depends upon the manner rather than the matter of their belief whether they gravitate toward the sage or the reverse way. According, therefore, to the incredulity found in the following, the reader may measure, as pleases him, his wisdom or his unwisdom.

Peregrine Oriol, my maternal uncle, was a great traveler, as his prophetic sponsors at the font seemed to have guessed he would be. Indeed he had rummaged in the garrets and cellars of the earth with something more than ordinary diligence. But in the narrative of his travels he did not, unfortunately, preserve the judicious caution of Xenophon between the things seen and the things heard, and thus it came about that the town-councilors of Brunsbüttel (to whom he had shown a duck-billed platypus, caught alive by him in Australia) had him posted for an importer of artificial vermin.

Thus, for instance, who could hear and believe the tale of the man-sucking tree from which he had barely escaped with life? He called it himself more terrible than the Upas. "This awful plant, that rears its splendid death-shade in the central solitude of a Nubian fern forest, sickens by its unwholesome humors all vegetation from its immediate vicinity, and feeds upon the wild beasts that, in the terror of the chase or the heat of noon, seek the thick shelter of its boughs; upon the birds that, flitting across the open space, come within the charmed circle of its power, or innocently refresh themselves from the cups of its great waxen flowers; upon even man himself when, an infrequent prey, the savage seeks its asylum in the storm, or turns from the harsh foot-wounding sword-grass of the glade to pluck the wondrous fruit that hang plumb down among the wondrous foliage." And such fruit!—"glorious golden ovals, great honey drops, swelling by their own weight into pear-shaped translucencies. The foliage glistens with a strange dew, that all day long drips on to the ground below, nurturing a rank growth of grasses, which shoot up in places so high that their spikes of fierce blood-fed green show far up among the deep-tinted foliage of the terrible tree, and, like a jealous body-guard, keep concealed the fearful secret of the charnel-house within, and draw round the black roots of the murderous plant a decent screen of living green."

Such was his description of the plant; and the other day, looking it up in a botanical dictionary, I find that there is really known to naturalists a family of carnivorous plants; but I see that they are most of them very small, and prey upon little insects only. My maternal uncle, however, knew nothing of this, for he died before the discovery of the sun, dew, and pitcher plants; and, grounding his knowledge of the man-sucking tree simply on his own terrible experience of it, explained its existence by theories of his own.

"How," he would ask, "can we claim for man the consequence of perceptions, and yet deny to beasts that hear, see, feel, and taste, a perceptive principle coexistent with their senses? And if in the whole range of the animate world there is this gift of self defense against extirpation and offense against weakness, why is the inanimate world, holding as fierce a struggle for existence as the other, to be left defenseless and unarmed? And I deny that it is. The Brazilian epiphyte strangles the tree and sucks out its juices. The tree, again, to starve off its vampire parasite, withdraws its juices into its roots, and, piercing the ground in some new place, turns the current of its sap into other growths. The epiphyte then drops off the dead boughs on to the fresh, green sprouts springing from the ground beneath it, and so the fight goes on. Again, look at the Indian peepul tree, and the fierce yearning of its roots toward the distant well.

"Is the sensitive plant unconscious? I have walked for miles through plains of it, and watched, till the watching almost made me afraid lest the plant should pluck up courage and turn upon me, the green carpet paling into silver gray beneath my feet, and fainting away all round me as I walked. So strangely did I feel the influence of this universal aversion, that I would have argued with the plant; but what was the use? If only I stretched out my hands, the mere shadow of the limb terrified the vegetable to sickness; shrubs crumbled up at every commencement of my speech; and at my periods great sturdy-looking bushes, to whose robustness I had foolishly appealed, sank in pallid supplication. Not a leaf would keep me company. A breath went forth from me that sickened life. My mere presence paralyzed life, and I was glad at last to come out among a less timid vegetation, and to feel the resentful spear-grass retaliating on the needlessness that would have crushed it. The vegetable world, however, has its revenges. You may keep the guinea-pig in a hutch, but how will you pet the basilisk? The little sensitive plant in your garden amuses your children, (who will find pleasure also in seeing cockchafer spin round on a pin,) but how could you transplant a vegetable that seizes the running deer, strikes down the passing bird, and, once taking hold of him, sucks the carcass of man himself, till his matter becomes as vague as his mind, and all his animate capabilities can not snatch him from the terrible embrace of an inanimate tree?

"Many years ago," said my uncle, "I turned my restless steps toward Central Africa, and made the journey from where the Senegal empties itself into the Atlantic to the Nile, skirting the Great Desert, and reaching Nubia on my way to the eastern coast. I had with me then three native attendants—two of them brothers, the third, Otona, a young savage from the gaboon uplands, a mere lad in his teens; and one day, leaving my mule with the two men, who were pitching my tent for the night, I went on with my gun, the boy accompanying me, toward a fern forest, which I saw in the near distance. As I approached it I found the forest was cut into two by a wide glade; and seeing a small herd of the common antelope, an excellent feast in the pot, browsing their way along the shaded side, I crept after them. Though ignorant of their real danger the herd was suspicious, and, slowly trotting along before me, enticed me for a mile or more along the verge of the fern growths. Turning a corner I suddenly became aware of a solitary tree growing in the middle of the glade—one tree alone. It struck me at once that I had never seen a tree exactly like it before; but, being intent upon venison for my supper, I looked at it only long enough to satisfy my first surprise at seeing a single plant of such rich growth flourishing luxuriantly in a spot where only the harsh fern-canes seemed to thrive.

"The deer, meanwhile, were midway between me and the tree, and looking at them I saw they were going to cross the glade. Exactly opposite them was an opening in the forest, in which I should certainly have lost my supper; so I fired into the middle of the family as they were filing before me. I hit a young fawn, and the rest of the herd, wheeling round in their sudden terror, made off in the direction of the tree, leaving the fawn struggling on the ground. Otona, the boy, ran forward at my order to secure it, but the little creature seeing him coming, attempted to follow its comrades, and at a fair pace held on their course. The herd had meanwhile reached the tree, but suddenly, instead of passing under it, swerved in their career, and swept round it at some yards distance.

"Was I mad, or did the plant really try to catch the deer? On a sudden I saw, or thought I saw, the tree violently agitated, and while the ferns all round were standing motionless in the dead evening air, its boughs were swayed by some sudden gust toward the herd, and swept, in the force of their impulse, almost to the ground. I drew my hand across my eyes, closed them for a moment, and looked again. The tree was as motionless as myself!

"Toward it, and now close to it, the boy was running in excited pursuit of the fawn. He stretched out his hands to catch it. It bounded from his eager grasp. Again he reached forward, and again it escaped him. There was another rush forward, and the next instant boy and deer were beneath the tree.

"And now there was no mistaking what I saw.

"The tree was convulsed with motion, leaned forward, swept its thick-foliaged boughs to the ground, and enveloped from my sight the pursuer and the pursued; I was within a hundred yards, and the cry of Otona from the midst of the tree came to me in all the clearness of its agony. There was then one stifled, strangling scream, and except for the agitation of the leaves where they had closed upon the boy, there was not a sign of life.

"I called out, 'Otona!' No answer came. I tried to call out again, but my utterance was like that of some wild beast smitten at once with sudden terror and its death-wound. I stood there, changed from all semblance of a human being. Not all the terrors of earth together could have made me take my eye from the awful plant, or my foot off the ground. I must have stood thus for at least an hour, for the shadows had crept out from the forest half across the glade before that hideous paroxysm of fear left me. My first impulse then was to creep stealthily away, lest the tree should perceive me, but my returning reason bade me approach it. The boy might have fallen into the lair of some beast of prey, or it might be the terrible life in the tree was that of some great serpent among its branches. Preparing to defend myself, I approached the silent tree, the harsh grass crisping beneath my feet with a strange loudness, the cicadas in the forest shrilling till the air seemed throbbing round me with waves of sound. The terrible truth was soon before me in all its awful novelty.

"The vegetable first discovered my presence at about fifty yards distance. I then became aware of a stealthy motion among the thick-lipped leaves, reminding me of some wild beast slowly gathering itself up from long sleep, a vast coil of snakes in restless motion. Have you ever seen bees hanging from a bough—a great cluster of bodies, bee clinging to bee—and by striking the bough or agitating the air, caused that massed life to begin sulkily to disintegrate, each insect asserting its individual right to move? And do you remember how, without one bee leaving the pensile cluster, the whole became gradually instinct with sullen life and horror with a multitudinous motion?

"I came within twenty yards of it. The tree was quivering through every branch, muttering for blood, and, helpless with rooted feet, yearning with every branch toward me. It was that terror of the deep sea which the men of the northern fiords dread, and which, anchored upon some sunken rock, stretches into vain space its longing arms, pellucid as the sea itself, and as relentless—maimed Polyphe me groping for his victims.

"Each separate leaf was agitated and hungry. Like hands, they fumbled together, their fleshy palms curling upon themselves and again unfolding, closing on each other and falling apart again—thick, helpless, fingerless hands, (rather lips or tongues than hands,) dimpled closely with little cup-like hollows. I approached nearer and nearer, step by step, till I saw that these soft horrors were all of them in motion, opening and closing incessantly.

"I was now within ten yards of the farthest reaching bough. Every part of it was hysterical with excitement. The agitation of its members was awful—sickening yet fascinating. In an ecstasy of eagerness for the food so near them, the leaves turned upon each other. Two, meeting, would suck together face to face, with a force that compressed their joint thickness to a half, thinning the two leaves into one; now grappling in a volute like a double shell, writhing like some green worm; and at last, faint with the violence of the paroxysm, would slowly separate, falling apart as leeches gorged drop off the limbs. A sticky dew glistened in the dimples, welled over, and trickled down the leaf. The sound of it dripping from leaf to leaf made it seem as if the tree were muttering to itself. The beautiful golden fruit as they swung here and there were clutched now by one leaf and now by another, held for a moment close enfolded from the sight, and then as suddenly released. Here a large leaf, vampire-like, had sucked out the juices of a smaller one. It hung limp and bloodless, like a carcass of which the weasel has tired.

"I watched the terrible struggle till my starting eyes, strained by intense attention, refused their office, and I can hardly say what I saw. But the tree before me seemed to have become a live beast. Above me I felt conscious was a great limb, and each of its thousand clammy hands reached downward toward me, fumbling. It strained, shivered, rocked, and heaved. It flung itself about in despair. The boughs, tantalized to madness with the presence of flesh, were tossed to this side and to that, in the agony of a frantic desire. The leaves were wrung together as the hands of one driven to madness by sudden misery. I felt the vile dew spurting from the tense veins fall upon me. My clothes began to give out a strange odor. The ground I stood on glistened with animal juices.

"Was I bewildered by terror? Had my senses abandoned me in my need? I know not—but the tree seemed to me to be alive. Leaning over toward me, it seemed to be pulling up its roots from the softened ground, and to be moving toward me. A mountainous monster, with myriad lips, mumbling together for my life, was upon me!

"Like one who desperately defends himself from imminent death, I made an effort for life, and fired my gun at the approaching horror. To my dizzied senses the sound seemed far off, but the shock of the recoil partially recalled me to myself, and starting back I reloaded. The shot had torn their way into the soft body of the great thing. The trunk, as it received the wound, shuddered, and the whole tree was struck with a sudden quiver. A fruit fell down—slipping from the leaves, now rigid with swollen veins, as from carven foliage. Then I saw a large arm slowly droop, and without a sound it was severed from the juice-fattened bole, and sank down softly, noiselessly, through the glistening leaves. I fired again, and another vile fragment was powerless—dead. At each discharge the terrible vegetable yielded a life. Piecemeal I attacked it, killing here a leaf and there a branch. My fury increased with the slaughter till, when my ammunition was exhausted, the splendid giant was left a wreck—as if some hurricane had torn through it. On the ground lay heaped together the fragments, struggling, rising and falling, gasping. Over them drooped in dying languor a few stricken boughs, while upright in the midst stood, dripping at every joint, the glistening trunk.

"My continued firing had brought up one of my men on my mule. He dared not (so he told me) come near me, thinking me mad. I had now drawn my hunting-knife, and with this was fighting—with the leaves. Yes, but each leaf was instinct with a horrid life; and more than once I felt my hand entangled for a moment, and seized as if by sharp lips. Ignorant of the presence of my companion, I made a rush forward over the fallen foliage, and with a last paroxysm of frenzy, drove my knife up to the handle into the soft bole, and, slipping on the fast congealing sap, fell exhausted and unconscious, among the still panting leaves.

"My companions carried me back to the camp, and after vainly searching for Otona, awaited my return to consciousness. Two or three hours elapsed before I could speak, and several days before I could approach the terrible thing. My men would not go near it. It was quite dead; for as we came up, a great-billed bird, with gaudy plumage, that had been securely feasting on the decaying fruit, flew up from the wreck. We removed the rotting foliage, and there among the dead leaves, still limp with juices, and piled round the roots, we found the ghastly relics of many former meals, and—its last nourishment—the corpse of little Otona. To have removed the leaves would have taken too long; we buried the body as it was, with a hundred vampire still clinging to it."—From Philip Robinson's "Upas Sun."

FROM FRIENDS OVER SEAS.

Arriving at Amsterdam.

Sailing up the IJ Canal—A Silent Wharf and no Hackmen—The Confusion of Tongues—A Ride through the City.

A more delightful sail can not be imagined than gliding over the waters of the IJ Canal on a fine sunny day, such as we were favored with, and gazing from the steamer deck at the very quaint and picturesque scenery on both sides. True, little of it is due to nature, so liberal to our own blessed land; but brain-work and industry have made up for her shortcomings in Holland. Skillful engineering and Dutch persevering tenacity have now converted swamps into land made fertile under steady cultivation; not an inch of it but is now made subservient to the wants of man. Numberless cottages, barns, and wind-mills stud these fields, where cattle of all kinds graze, and where the peasants and working-men, women and children go briskly to and fro, while steamers, sailing vessels, and fishing-boats ply the waters up and down. The tout ensemble presents a living picture, in which cleanliness is a great feature—so much so that one might fancy it a mechanical panorama in working order, where neither mud nor dust could possibly be found. Had I been obliged to cross those fields on foot, perhaps I might have had a proof to the contrary, but even at the short distance of the steamer deck, they looked like fit walking-grounds for fashionable city people.

Just fourteen days after her departure from America, our steamer anchored at her dock in Amsterdam. The scene at the landing was widely different from one in an American seaport. No deafening cries nor urgent appeals of hotel agents, hack-drivers, expressmen and newspaper boys; none of the rushing and hustling so strongly characteristic of the arrival of steamers in our country. Here all was calm and quiet—too much so, indeed; only a certain number of idlers, mostly boys, stood around the pier, and passengers were left to their own resources to devise how and when they should land, unless expected by relatives and friends who came on board to greet them and take them home. After sundry inquiries and much delay every passenger succeeds in getting a carriage, which takes him to some hotel for one guilder, forty cents of our coin, baggage and all, unless he be encumbered with too many trunks and bundles.

At most public places in Amsterdam—hotels, restaurants, stores, etc.—foreign languages are supposed to be understood and spoken; but I would sincerely recommend every foreigner to go where no such announcement is made. There he may have a chance to find somebody who can understand one foreign tongue, perhaps the German, which is most generally spoken; but heaven protect him from the polyglot establishment where set answers will be dealt out to him with a coolness which will impress him with the idea that he is talking to dead people. I had my full share of trouble with the confusion of languages and dialects in Amsterdam. After considerable useless skirmishing in English and French, and remembering that Holland had long been under the dominion of Spain, I ventured on a Spanish phrase. That was too much for the polyglot Dutchman, who, instead of smiling benignantly and answering in his native affirmative, "ja," as is his invariable habit, was brought to a dead stand in conversation, and actually muttered "nein," which must have hurt his heart to pronounce, as by nature he is so very obliging and dislikes that negation. Fortunately for me, although no universal language has yet been adopted, and probably never will be, pantomime, the natural resource for desperate cases of interpretation, was left me, and recurred to with success; but not without one great objection—viz., standers-by, whenever they notice a person endeavoring to make himself understood by signs, gradually draw up toward him, and form a circle, all volunteering their services. This coöperation is rather embarrassing, and does not always help to settle matters.

After my useless efforts in several languages, and a fair display of pantomimic ability, I succeeded in securing comfortable quarters, and, after resting a little, sallied forth to see the city. This can be done here almost without recurring to carriages, since the American street-car system is fairly established. From the Dam, which is a large square, and the great artery of Amsterdam, all the lines of cars diverge to different streets, and to the suburbs. The cars are much handsomer and better finished than ours, have plate-glass windows, and are upholstered with velvet. In size and shape, they look very much like ours. The driver remains standing, and the conductor at the back comes in, in due time, to collect the tickets, which cost twelve cents in their coin, about five cents of ours. These consist of slips of printed paper, and can be bought either as you step in the car, or at any of the ticket stations around. Some cars have one horse, others two; and their motion is very even and gentle. Carriages are always expensive to foreigners, even where—as here—the rates are moderate, in comparison with those at home. But where is the driver who can not, or will not, find the means to fleece travellers? Nobody can reasonably expect that any one of them should thus break through the traditional principles of their class. So here, as everywhere else, if you must and will have a carriage, you have to abide by the consequences. I will only add that it is seldom absolutely necessary.

Among the places which I visited, and to which an historical recollection is attached, I would mention the house of Michel Ruyter, the front of which is adorned with the bust of the great admiral; the Muiderport, or last of the eight gates that formerly enclosed the city; the old Catholic Cathedral built in 1300; the Westerkerk, or old Protestant church, which has the highest tower in the city and a remarkably fine chime of bells; the tombs of some of Holland's great men, and the statues erected to the memory of others. Among the modern institutions are the Sailors' Home, the Botanical Garden, the Palace of Industry, the Exchange, the Museum of Paintings, the Academy of Sciences, the Military Hospital, the Institution for the Blind, and many others.

To see the canals, sluices, and dams of Amsterdam would be a day alone; to examine them and in any way to appreciate them would need many weeks and a goodly knowledge of engineering. They are the work of many, many years, and have cost immense sums. To the profane eye it is simply a matter of wonder that the idea ever occurred to undertake such work, and that the same has been completely successful. The famous IJ Canal is considered one of the most gigantic works of the present age. It was finished and solemnly inaugurated in 1876, and has contributed largely to the material prosperity of the country. It is a question, however, whether the public health is not affected by the waters of some canals, as they are partially stagnant by the time they reach the city, where they are made the receptacles for much of its refuse.

The Czar's White Elephant.

One of the Features of the Zoological Gardens at St. Petersburg—The Gift of an Eastern Monarch—The Enterprise Displayed by a Yankee Circus Manager.

I dare say there are many people who have heard of a white elephant, but who have scarcely ever expected actually to see one. White elephants have by some skeptical minds even been derided as creatures wholly of the imagination, without actual existence at all, while the exceptional animal has, by others, been made to do duty in a proverbial way as the synonym of an unwieldy encumbrance which it was a very dubious advantage to become possessed of. I am glad to be able, from personal observation, to put the white elephant in a better light than the foregoing opinions have cast upon the creature, and to assure those who may still have doubts that not only is there such an animal, but also that it would be a most enviable object of acquisition. The individual quadruped of which I write is the pride and boast of the Zoological Gardens of St. Petersburg, and, if I am correctly informed, was a royal gift from an eastern sovereign, the King of Burmah, to the Emperor of Russia. Being rather too large for a household pet, his majesty wisely put the beast in the care of the superintendent of the public gardens, and shortly thereafter "Chin-Chee" was installed in a neat and commodious dwelling especially designed for his personal comfort. The house is, as you might suppose, a one-story dwelling, but has an ample portico, with folding doors between it and the main, and, in fact sole, apartment of the house. I may add that there are two insignificant wings to the mansion; in the left of these the keeper of Chin-Chee resides, while that on the right is the place where potatoes and sundry other delicacies are stored for the use of the sacred brute.

I have not been informed as to the family antecedents of Chin-Chee, but am warranted, however, in stating that his parents were of a much darker hue than himself. Aside from any more scientific surmises as to the amelioration of his tints, I may refer to the belief of the eastern nations, who have regarded the white elephant as the embodiment of some radiant spirit which could rightfully command the veneration of the masses. From the particularly accommodating manner of Chin-Chee, as regards the reception of any kind attention, I am of opinion that the animal would willingly lend himself to a ready connivance with such a superstitious idea. Chin-Chee would also bring to the position a certain dignity, which was never possessed by the hawks, beetles, cats, or bulls, which the ancient Egyptians apotheosized. In his present position, and among the picture-worshipping Russians, Chin-Chee, although a most noble creature, is only a simple beast, merely a private citizen in the animal kingdom, and, since his arrival in Russia, Chin-Chee has led a quiet and almost uneventful life. It is said that on one occasion he was brought out and led over the bridge to the Champ de Mars, to do honor to a military review. The blare of trumpets and rattle of drums not proving agreeable, he quietly turned about, and, after certain warning gestures, intimating distinctly enough that he did not wish to be interfered with, he walked back to his more tranquil and secluded abode, and has not since come before the public.

For him at present the routine of daily life comprises his regular meals—which are generous—a sunning, when the weather permits, and a private exhibition, (at any unoccupied hour,) wherein he goes through an interesting programme of exercises. We called on the illustrious quadruped a few days ago. After presenting ourselves outside of the portico of his dwelling, and announcing our wish to see Chin-Chee, the keeper gave three raps at the double doors of the salon of royalty. An instant's pause, then the ponderous doors moved outward, and a moment later we saw for the first time the white elephant. He advanced a few paces, then made a graceful bow; at the suggestion of the keeper he rang a bell, and, thus opening the exhibition, he performed various tricks which showed at once a gentle disposition and an intelligent mind. He has a quick aptitude for gathering up the smallest coin, and in the absence of his keeper he generally solicits on his own account. If the audience does not respond, he has an ingenious way of appealing to the resources of his pantry, which, however, on this occasion, afforded us more amusement than it did any profitable return to Chin-Chee, as a patient search did not reveal to his proboscis the position of the potato-sack.

Chin-Chee is now under engagement to Mr. Forepaugh, the circus manager, to make a three months' tour in the United States. Forty thousand dollars is the consideration, and a deposit of seventy thousand dollars is made to insure the life of the valuable creature. Who would not wish to have a white elephant?

RICHARD WYLIE.

ST. PETERSBURG, November 1, 1882.

The French, says the New York World, are beginning to complain of the competition of foreigners in their own markets, and especially of the introduction of German articles which are passed off as Parisian. Their competitors, however, have not yet reached the pitch of enterprise attained during the last days of the Second Empire by a lithographer at Frankfurt, who wrote to one of the great dealers in perfumery something as follows: "For several years past I have been engaged in reproducing fac-similes of your labels and wrappers for use in the foreign trade, and this department of my business has increased so rapidly that I have patented a new and improved process, by means of which I can furnish you with labels and wrappers, absolutely undistinguishable from those you now employ, at a price which defies competition. Hoping to be honored with your patronage, I am, etc."

STUDIO LIFE IN PARIS.

[Much that has already been written on this subject is being continually added to by the fresh experiences of the young art-students of today. Fred Yates, the artist, who has recently returned from Paris, gives us a sketch of his atelier life, while studying there during the past two years.]

In Bonnat's atelier, which comprised a school of fifty men, we had representatives of every nationality of Europe, besides Japanese, South Americans, Egyptians, and Algerians. Our atelier bore no reputation for being orderly; the place was generally in a semi-uproar, except on one occasion in each week, when Bonnat came to correct our drawings. Then every voice would be hushed, pipes and cigarettes put away, and every man hard at work. The master would stay with us about an hour, during which time he gave every student his individual attention. His remarks were laconic and full of meaning; his "pas mal" being considered a fair reward for a week's work. He took sincere interest in every hard-working student; but the lazy ones be disposed of with little ceremony. On one occasion he asked an idler what his father was. "A farmer," replied the fellow. "Then go home and help your father," was Bonnat's response, and that was the last we saw of the idler.

The mixture of sounds in the atelier almost defies description—some one was always singing, others imitating the tuning of the different instruments of an orchestra, another giving High Mass, in which the intoning of the priest, the tinkle of the small bell, and the rumbling of the organ would be heard. Such were our entertainments; our customs were various. A new man coming among us was termed a "nouveau"; after being accepted as a pupil by Bonnat, he presented himself to the "massier" or treasurer of the atelier. The first few weeks he was the fag and hutt of the place, his earliest privilege being to pay his "hienvenu." Punch being served from the proceeds, he would next be asked to sing, his efforts usually being brought to a speedy termination by cries of "assez, assez!" which, if not immediately understood, were explained more clearly in the language of hard crusts of bread, which came flying in from all sides of the room. If the nouveau was a swell—for counts, barons, and even live marquises have been among us—the manner in which he received the order to make the fire was attentively observed, and if he was stubborn and refused, he was immediately broken in by means of the "douce." This was prepared previously, and consisted of a can of cold water suspended above the door of the atelier. The unsuspecting nouveau would enter by this door, then the can was upset, and, as a rule, produced a wholesome effect upon him.

Another practice which worked very effectively was called the "hrocbe." Any one who made himself obnoxious by singing or whistling some hackneyed air, or even committed some lighter offense, was put à la broche. The victim was first bound hand and foot, his knees touching his body, then a pole was inserted, spit fashion, under the knees and in that condition the individual would be bung up until he was considered sufficiently subdued.

In the Atelier des Beaux Arts, an offender is crucified, the hands and feet being tied to a cross for some hours. On one occasion a man was suspended on the cross and left hanging, the students intending to return later in the evening to release him. By some unpardonable forgetfulness, he was left in the position until the next morning, when the poor fellow was found dead.

Practical joking, however, never went that far with us. During the course of the day many models came in to be engaged. They strip, assume a pose on the platform, and the students vote by show of hands which model meets approval. The models are paid by the week, the men receiving twenty-four francs, and the women thirty francs, for morning or afternoon school.

Every year we gave a fête, to which Bonnat and several other artists of note were invited. The evening opened with a play, which was followed by a masquerade. Picture a room of wild costumes from that of a "chiffonnier" to a Turkish sultan. Every color of the rainbow whirling and blending together, and some of the men half-seas over from the effects of our liberal punch-bowls. Two hundred guests were usually invited, married men bringing their wives, and those of us in the miserable state of celibacy taking the prettiest of the models; most of whom were Italians. No celebration of the kind was over before daylight, and the remaining days of the week were spent in recovering from the effects of that night.

Our life outside the atelier was of course governed by the length of our purses. Some men lived in luxury; others had to rough it, and did so cheerfully. Most of us had a knowledge of cooking, and could compete with any French cuisinier in grilling a steak, frying an omelette, or in making coffee. Two-cent cigars, smoked in contentment, proved the very finest brand, and "Caporal ordinaire" equal to the best Virginia "Straight-cut." In a word, we were Bohemians, who, bar none, live the merriest of all existences.

The following is one of the New York World's literal translations from the French: "The richissimist M. Stewarts, there is some years, offered one day to a painter of the big life who seizes to marvel the littles Parisians, and the exquisite and the refined of the life of Paris, a triple price for a picture, at the condition that the artist should put upon the vestments of the woman a quantity infinite of jet, ear-rings of jet, laces ornamented of jet, everywhere the jet. The painter was stunned, finding the fantasy a few singular. 'This is not a fantasy,' said M. Stewarts. 'This picture will be exposed at New York. All the elegants will regard it. If they see that the Parisians carry the jet, they will buy the jet; and I have precisely in the magazine a stock considerable of jet, and then, you understand.'"

At a recent banquet in London, Lord Charles Beresford, whose gallant exploits with the gunboat Condor at Alexandria made him so conspicuous and so popular, in response to the toast of "The Navy," paid a warm tribute to the service rendered by the Americans after the bombardment. The Americans, he said, like brothers, joined the small band which he had under his command, saying that blood was thicker than water; they worked splendidly, and he could never thank them enough.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

City Boys—By a Countryman.

Some one writes to a Detroit paper to ask why it is that the proportion of country boys who succeed in life is greater than that of city boys, who have by far the greatest advantages from the cradle up. It does seem as though people would get that little secret pounded into them after it has been told a few thousand more times by newspaper men and other philosophers who have given such matters a study all their lives. Take a boy who has grown up in the country, and either spent his time on a farm or worked around in a country town learning a trade, and he does not have the time nor the opportunities to acquire the peculiarities and the habits that become a burden to the city boy before he has got half through life, but which the city boy thinks he can not live without. The boy in the country who works all day plowing with a pair of rebellious steers, and being jerked over the stumps, is not busying his mind with some scheme to paralyze a town. He is not working up some plan to win in a game of poker as soon as he finishes his supper and gets down town. The boy in the country may be busy thinking all day how he will beat his neighbor's boy out of a certain girl at singing-school that night, but he don't want to learn a confidence game that is surer than a lightning-rod peddler for taking in folks. The country boy may look outlandish in a suit of clothes made over from some his father wore, pants that bag at the knees and at the seat of war, only one suspender, and his arms, and face, and neck, and for a yard down his spinal column, where his shirt opened, may be burned to a delicate brown by the summer sun; but that boy has not acquired the tight pants, and the cigarettes, and the latest styles of profanity of the city boy. While the boy in the city is taking lessons in draw-poker, the country boy is running a fanning-mill or a corn-sheller in the barn, and listening to his uncle tell of the improved styles of sharpers and confidence men that cities are thronged with nowadays. And when, a few years afterward, the country boy, with only a smattering of an education, but a large bulk of common sense, leaves the old farm and goes into business in the city, he is called "fresh" by the city "boys," who have grown up to be sporting men, and men who would go their last dollar on a horse-race. The young man from the country goes about the city and attends to his business, and when some city sharp stops him on the street, and endeavors to "work" him for a "snap," and play any confidence on him, he simply says: "Oh, go along, old fellow; you'll have to excuse me." But the city boy who is smart, and onto all the fine "rackets" of the day, will bite like a sucker, and the confidence man will play him for all he is worth, because the boy thinks he is smart. That is the reason the proportion of country boys who succeed is greater than that of boys who are born and brought up in the city. The boy from the country is not so badly mashed on himself that he loses his presence of mind and his common sense, or gets off his base, as it were. —Peck's Sun.

Country Boys—By a City Man.

What is this? This is a Suburban Road. Who are these two People coming our way? They are Two Young Men. They are of the same Age. What are they doing? They are Taking a Walk. Do they know each other? No. One is a City Young Man, and the Other is a Country Young Man. Which is the City Young Man and which is the Country Young Man? One of them is Big. His Feet are Large and Heavy. He walks with a Slouch. His Shoulders are Bent. The Other Young Man is Small. He holds his Head High and keeps his Chest Out. He has Little Hands and Feet. He Walks with a Spring. The Big Young Man is the Country Young Man. The Small Young Man is the City Young Man. If you want to look at the City Young Man you must look Now. He will be Out of Sight in About Two Minutes. Where is he going? He is Taking a Little Constitutional. His Little Constitutional is Ten Miles Out and Ten Miles Back. Will the Country Young Man walk Twenty Miles? Oh, no; he will walk About a Mile. Then he will Sit on a Fence and Chew a Stick for the Rest of the day. Does the Country Young Man wear good Clothes? No; he is above such Vanities. He believes in Republican Simplicity and a Bad Tailor. The City Young Man has a nice Suit and a Stand-up Collar. The Country Young Man would call him a Fine Dandy. Then why does not the Country Young Man call him that? Because he does not Dare To. Why does he not Dare To? Because it would be very Un-wholesome for him if he did. Would the City Young Man Hurt the Country Young Man if they should Fight? Yes, I think the City Young Man would Inconvenience the Country Young Man. But the Country Young Man is the Bigger of the Two. Oh, yes; but the City Young Man has a Big Chest for his Size; and he belongs to an Athletic Club and he has a Large Muscle in his Fore-arm. Besides, he can Box. Can the Country Young Man Box? No; and he would Scorn to Learn. Is the Country Young Man a Member of an Athletic Club? No; he says he has no time for Such Nonsense. Does the Country Young Man Work Harder than the City Young Man? Oh, no; he is a Farmer's Son, and he works Hard; but not So Hard as the City Young Man. The City Young Man is a Clerk in a Wholesale Store. In the Busy Season he sometimes Works from Eight one Morning until One the Next. Why is the City Young Man a Better Man than the Country Young Man? Because he takes Systematic Exercise, and That gives him Muscle. Because he Grooms himself well, and That keeps him Fresh and Bright. Because he has Plenty of Amusement, and That put Spirits into him. Because he eats Good Food, and That keeps him Healthy. Does the Country Young Man take Systematic Exercise? No; and he Slouches over his Work. Does he Groom himself well? No; he thinks it is Frivolous. Does he have Plenty of Amusement? No; he has only Loafing and a Circus once a Year. Does he Eat Good Food? No; he eats Pie for Breakfast, and Saleratus Bread, and very Little Meat, (and That is either Boiled or Fried.) But are not all Country Young Men Stout, and Strong, and Healthy?—and are not all City Young Men Thin, and Feeble, and Sickly? Oh, no, my child; that is one of the Things learned in the Nursery, and you must Put it Away with the rest of the Fairy Tales.—Puck.

ARGONAUT VERSE.

Requiem.

Our lips with the sweets of love are wet;
The amber wine is aglow with light;
Ah, dear, in a year we may forget
The glory, the passion of to-night!
For years are cold as the drifted snow
That shines on the highest mountain crest,
Where the fierce, great winds forever blow,
And sing of sorrow and wild unrest.

We drain the wine, and our warm hands meet,
And far away, like a call, we hear
The toll of a bell. Yes, lips are sweet:
Are they sweet or bitter when on the bier?
The bell tolls on. There is death. Ah, yes,
Sad death, and sorrow, and wasting pain,
And the amber wine grows less and less:
And what are we reaping—loss or gain?

The years are cold, and they swiftly fade,
And centuries come—ay, come and go;
And their ghosts lie prone in a realm of shade—
Lie there unheeding earth's weal and woe.
Great giants they with their rusty mail
All rent in the battle's hurtling storm,
By the slash of swords, and fierce assail
Of lance-blows, seeking where blood ran warm.

But we, what care we for years long dead?—
For the waving plumes and crossing swords?
Lo, these belong to the days now fled.
Their fruits are garnered; they are the Lord's.
Enough for us that we hear far off
The solemn bell with its dreary toll,
And drain our wine and our bonnets doff
To the wail that tells of a passing soul.

You love me, sweet, and the night is fair;
We see its depths through the lattice-bars;
And leavens away, in the purple air,
There burns the glory of countless stars.
Who knows but that there, with glasses high,
Two souls in some bright celestial world
See this, our earth, in its orbit fly,
Like a meteor down through heaven hurled?

Who knows but that soon those shining spheres
Shall bear our passion through pathless space,
Free from the burning of bitter tears—
Love's deathless glory within each face?
Who knows? Yet a year is long—so long!
And death is sure, and the grave is cold;
And what comes after—a sigh or song?—
Hard chains of iron or chains of gold?

Who knows? Who cares? When the amber wine
Is bright in the glass, and lips are sweet,
And I feel your heart-beat answer mine,
What care have I that the days are fleet?
Enough for me if the world give this:
Warm lips, that with passion's breath are hot,
That meet death's cold with a fragrant kiss
Ere the silence comes when life is not.

Magdalen.

In weariness she leans against the wall,
Crumbling and stained, with sombre, far-off eyes
Fixed in dumb pleading on the Judean eyes—
Wan eyes forgotten of their fatal thrill.

Her slender hands are wrung together hard;
Her tarnished hair trails down its ruined gold
Over her fair white bosom's marble mold;
Her sad sweet eyes are like late skies, unstarred.

The pale, mute lips, the strained brow marred with pain,
The drooping form, the passionless, still face,
Hold still a wider beauty, subtler grace,
Than in the days when warm Love lured, unslain.

A Dream of the Golden Gate.

Dreaming? Ah, yes; beside my window sitting,
Hemmed in on every side by city walls;
A patch of blue overhead, across it flitting
Soft, fleecy clouds, and where the sunlight falls
Upon the narrow pavement far below
Shadows, like spectres, gliding to and fro.

Dreaming? Ah, yes, like one whose eyes are holden.
The world without has faded into night,
And far beyond the western sunlight golden
A land of beauty floats before my sight,
Where every glowing tint beneath the sun
By subtle alchemy is blended into one.

Dreaming? Ah, yes. If such be called the mystery
Of this, our two-fold being, I but dream,
While o'er the page of life's unwritten history
A softer light than sunset's parting gleam
Reveals the outline of that distant shore,
By memory glorified forever more:

Mountains in soft and shadowy undulations,
Wave beyond wave, all tremulously fair,
Enwrapped in gold and purple exhalations,
In the dim, dreamy distance melt in air;
While the dazed sense, transfixed, still vainly tries
To trace the horizon-line twixt earth and skies.

If only once, before the smouldering embers
Upon the altar of my heart expire,
A breath divine, such as my soul remembers
Ere time and care had quenched the sacred fire,
Should melt the seal of silence borne so long,
And let my unchanged soul break forth in song—

Oh, with what rapturous throes of re-creation
Would I embody that remembered scene,
When on the hill-top, wrapped in contemplation,
With naught of earth or sense to intervene,
My soul was borne along the purple sea—
The Golden Gate of Paradise to me.

Passed to New Lords.

I was made slave to Pleasure—a goodly mistress she;
Whose chains knew never measure, whose thralls despised the free;
Whose toil was others' leisure, whose grief was others' glee;

But, that dear lady dying, possess me in her stead
Her heirs, and, freedom buying, with tears I eat my bread.
Ah, cold and low she's lying, yet—were I with my dead!

FRENCH FIRE-EATERS.

The Band of Duelists which was Abolished by a Band of Bourgeois.

One of the most interesting and curious of modern additions to the literature of dueling, says the Saturday Review, is afforded by Monsieur Théodore de Graves's "Les Drames de l'Épée," to which Monsieur Jules Claretie has written a preface, which in its own way is equally interesting. Monsieur de Graves's very curious and interesting book deals, to a very great extent, with the fortunes of a club which was formed at Bordeaux in the 1830 period, under the name of the Fraternelle, for the sole purpose of exterminating the professional bullies and duelists—the bretteurs, as they were called—who infested the place and made the lives of wives and mothers an unceasing anxiety. There are still bretteurs, Monsieur Claretie tells us; but as the new romanticists are but the shadow of the chevaliers of 1830, so is the modern bretteur but a poor creature to those who practised the coup du Colonel Zanceschi or the coup du cochon. The first of these, known also—as Monsieur Claretie omits to state—as the botte de Nevers, consisted in fixing your point just between your adversary's eyebrows. The second took the name from the fact that the point severed the artery beneath the ear. Monsieur Claretie goes on to tell a story of what befell one of these bretteurs who managed to pick a quarrel with an honnête bourgeois who occupied the same room with him at an inn. "We will fight to-morrow," said the duelist. "On the contrary, we will fight now," replied the bourgeois; and, attacking the bully with his fist, beat him into a mummy. "We will do this," he added, "as often as you like;" and the next day the knight of the foil left the town. Later on Monsieur Claretie tells again the pleasing story of the duel between Sainte-Beuve and Dubois of the Globe. Sainte-Beuve appeared upon the ground with a pistol of the time of Francis I., and holding an umbrella (it poured with rain) over his head. To all protestations he answered: "Gentlemen, Monsieur Dubois has undertaken to kill me to-day. Very well; I am willing to be killed, but I will not get wet." As late as the days of Benjamin Constant we find something like the conditions of editorial life in the Far West prevailing in Paris. Both Constant and a friend of his, a retired colonel, who was a shareholder and collaborator in his paper, were weary of continual challenges and duels, and set to work to find some one who should do the editorial fighting. Such a one was found in an old soldier, who had served under the colonel, and who said, when the place was offered to him, that he must consult his wife. "You have a wife?" said the colonel. "Yes, sir, and three children." "In that case let us talk no more of it; I will find you something else to do." The soldier, however, whom the colonel assumed to be a good fencer, insisted; his wife consented, and he took the place. Two duels came quickly upon him, and in both he was wounded, and thoroughly well looked after by Constant and the colonel, who showered presents upon his wife and children. A third duel came, and the colonel said: "Come, no child's play this time. One, two, and down with your man." The old soldier was wounded again, and the colonel asked him: "What has happened to you, Vincent? You, a vieux de la vieille, to be worsted like this three times running!" "Ah, mon colonel," Vincent replied, "what can you expect? I had nothing to do; I had a wife and three children; you offered me this place, which is well paid. I took it. But, as for fencing, I know nothing whatever about it." "Voilà cette fois," says Monsieur Claretie, "du vrai courage," and he does not seem to be far wrong. The club of the Fraternelle, with which Monsieur de Graves deals, was, as has been said, founded in the 1830 period in Bordeaux, and the things which led to its being founded were such things as these. The Comte de Larillière, one of the well-born among the bretteurs, met one day in the street a business man named Castera walking with his young and pretty wife. He advanced to him, and said with a polite bow, "I beg your pardon, but I have made a bet with my friend here, whom I beg to introduce to you, that I would kiss your wife while she was walking with you"—here the other man turned livid—"after having given you a slap in the face." Castera fought him next day with pistols. The count's first shot hit Castera on the right ear, his second on the left. Before the third he said: "Cette fois je ferai mouche," and with the third he shot Castera through the eye. Castera was avenged in a manner dramatic enough. One night, as Larillière sat in his favorite seat in a café, while a masked ball was going on bard by, a stranger in a domino and mask came up to him, overturned his glass of punch, and ordered a glass of orgeat instead. Larillière, for the first time in his life, turned pale and cried: "You scoundrel, you don't know who I am." "Oh, yes," the stranger replied, "I know who you are quite well," and with the words forced him down into the chair from which he had risen. The orgeat was brought, and the stranger, holding a pistol to Larillière's head, said: "Unless you drink this off I shall blow out your brains on the spot; if you drink it off, I will do you the honor of fighting you to-morrow." "With the sabre?" cried Larillière, who had lately been practicing with that arm, and had acquired some skill. "How you like," said the stranger. Then, as Larillière drank off the orgeat, he added: "I have humbled you enough to-night. I put off killing you until to-morrow." The morrow came, the adversaries met, and Larillière found that he had met his match. The stranger left him not a moment's breathing space; but never followed up his attacks, until at last Larillière cried, insolently: "When are you going to kill me?" "Now," said the stranger, for the first time using his sabre like a dueling sword, and lunging straight toward Larillière's heart. Masses were said in the churches of Bordeaux for this man, who kept his name secret, and who rid the town of its scourge. This, however, was before the days of the Fraternelle, and yet more terrible duels took place before the Fraternelle was founded. One was between the two principal bretteurs of the place, and was a duel which began, without witnesses, in a bed-room, and was continued from time to time until Claveau, having deliberately killed his infamous friend, accomplice, and subsequently er Marquis de Lignano, in a pistol duel, ended his by suicide. In one of the duels with swords before Claveau, who hated the Marquis, made a feint and nailed his right foot to the ground with his

A NEW YORK WEDDING.

A Marriage which took the Lustre from all of its Predecessors.

At last we have had a wedding in New York which takes rank indisputably as the most brilliant in the history of the city. For years we have wrestled with this problem. It has kept many worthy citizens awake o' nights, and induced numberless quarrels and heart-burnings. The first Miss Lorillard's wedding was about as fine as anything we had seen up to that time; but the wedding of Mamie Astor quite cast it in the shade. Then Bessie Morgan's marriage to August Belmont Jr. took first rank with some difficulty, until Miss Vanderbilt and Doctor Webb were united at the cash outlay of a couple of hundred thousand dollars. But Miss Berryman's nuptial ceremonies cast grave doubts on the position of the others, and all were jeopardized by Miss Jerome's marriage. A week ago it would have been impossible to fix upon any one wedding which would take rank as the most brilliant and impressive of them all. Now, all is settled, and we once more enjoy repose, for Fanny Ida Helmuth's wedding leaves everything else we ever had out of sight in the rear. It was a nuptial pageant on a scale of uncommon magnificence.

In the first place, Ida Helmuth is herself a girl of very superior beauty. She is above the average height of women, and carries her head like a queen. Her beauty is not of the soft or gentle kind, but clear, striking, and sharply cut. Her profile is as finely chiseled as a cameo, and her eyes bright and dazzling. She is the kind of girl who is more brilliant than her surroundings. She is the only daughter of a very wealthy and aristocratic physician, Doctor William Tod Helmuth, and has been reared with the idea of becoming a society woman. Her graces are natural; her accomplishments unlimited. The groom—poor devils are these grooms at a wedding, you know, and utterly unworthy of attention—is Lieutenant Wright Prescott Edgerton, son of ex-Governor Edgerton, of Ohio. He is a popular officer, stationed with the Second Artillery, U. S. A., at West Point. The bride some years ago went up the Hudson to West Point, with a party from New York, and met there the tall and distinguished looking young officer. He rides and dances well, and is popular among his comrades. I am told that he has many relatives and connexions in San Francisco. Three thousand invitations were issued for the wedding, and they were not cast about promiscuously either. The ceremony was performed in Saint Bartholomew's Church, by the Lord Bishop of Huron, Isaac Helmuth, assisted by the Reverend Doctors Cooks and Percival, of New York. As it drew near to the time the throng began to pour into the church, many ladies being obliged to walk several blocks in light evening slippers, so dense was the crush of carriages. It seemed as though all the diamonds in New York were at the wedding, and the glitter of the uniforms and decorations of the army and navy officers made a highly striking picture. General Hancock, looking simply superb in the splendor of his decorations, was present with his entire staff. His wife accompanied him. She is so very domestic, and has mourned the death of her daughter so long, that people are surprised when she appears occasionally, and say: "Why, I never knew before that Mrs. Hancock was such a beautiful woman."

It would be tedious to describe the way the church was dressed. It seemed, in a word, to be walled in with flowers; and the people within talked and chatted vivaciously until the building fairly hummed. The wedding ceremony did not begin promptly—that would be vulgar. It is proper to be late. And so the assembly waited in chattering expectancy until half past eight, when the music of the "Bridal Chorus" burst forth, and the huge doors of roses swung open for the entrance of the bridal party. The aisle of the church was very long, fortunately, or the procession would have been too large.

First came two charming little children with roses, toddling along with happy faces and the grace inseparable from childhood. The boy—who looked like a cherub—wore one of those charming Van Dyke costumes, of garnet velvet; and the little girl, a Kate Greenaway dress, of pink silk. Hand-in-hand they wandered down the aisle, gazing with childish delight at the beautiful picture about them, and smiling happily. Following them, and at quite a distance apart, marched nine erect and handsome lieutenants of the army, in full uniform. After them, with their voluminous trains stretching out far behind, in a cloud of silk and filmy lace, walked eight bridesmaids. Four were in blue and four in pink, and each carried a huge bouquet of roses. Their corsages were cut low, and sixteen shapely arms were plainly visible to the naked eye. Then came the bride, on the arm of her father. Last of all marched another lieutenant of the army, erect, stately, and at ease. At the altar she was met by the groom and his best man, Lieutenant McComb, U. S. A. By-the-by, I may as well state here as anywhere that if you are looking for any more lieutenants, you are doomed to disappointment. The list is now complete. Twelve ought to satisfy any one. I am only surprised that there were twelve such handsome lieutenants at West Point, for the ones I have met heretofore have had a tendency to shortness of stature and weakness as to mustache. As the three clergymen moved forward to the rail the vast assemblage rose, and the ceremony was performed with the utmost impressiveness. Then the children walked gayly up the aisle—how charming they were! Their entire innocence and lack of conventionality contrasted wonderfully with the appearance of the wedding cortège, and provoked a smile that was almost tearful on many a woman's face. The bride and groom then walked slowly up the long aisle, as the deafening strains of the wedding march poured forth, followed by the father and the best man, the eight military ushers escorting the bridesmaids, and ending in the person of the handsome lieutenant who walked alone.

It was a magnificent wedding, and I hope every one is pleased that it went off without a flaw. But I fear it was almost too pretentious. It seemed to lack something that ought to be the feature of all weddings. I think, if I should have an insane freak and decide to get some one to leave my lounging existence, our nuptials would be celebrated in a little church away from a pushing multitude of eager onlookers. However, I find that this notion is not received with the degree of enthusiasm by the world at large. I mentioned it in deep and earnest tones to that portion of the world at large that was compassed in the person of a pretty girl at this particularly gorgeous wedding, and she remarked, with great decision:

"You are quite out of your mind. Nothing in all of this great earth could be better than this! It's just awfully splendid!"

"Yes, but, you see, it—er—sort—er—lacks something."

"What?"

"Soul."

"Well," she said, gazing at me with an air of candor that was somehow rather embarrassing, "it would be all right if you were in it. You are all soul, you know."

I perceived that this was satire, and said that I objected to being jeered at, but she only smiled and talked more rapturously of the wedding. I suppose women really believe that it is the only way to get married. This bride received one hundred and seventy-six presents, and was the bright particular star of the reception that followed the church service. A privileged society matron said to General Hancock, during the evening:

"Dear me, what a come-down it will be for the poor girl to settle down to the hum-drum life of a lieutenant's wife. And—horrors! suppose he should be ordered to the frontier! But I'm sure, general, you wouldn't do that?"

"Such are the vicissitudes of war, madam," with a smile.

"But you wouldn't do it?"

"Soldiers must suffer," answered the general, still smiling. She failed utterly in her efforts to get any sort of a half-way promise from the commander. He has a level head, has General Hancock, and only says what he means.

Mr. A. M. Palmer, manager of the Union Square Theatre, gave a charming little breakfast to Mr. Charles Wyndham Thursday morning, at which there were nearly all the prominent theatrical people now in town. The breakfast was served at twelve o'clock, in the new Hotel Dam—the name may strike you as being odd. It is the new hotel built by Andrew Dam, who runs the Union Square Hotel and the Astor House here. He insisted upon calling his new hostelry by a rather striking name, and one that really conveys no idea of its elegance and beauty. But to return to the breakfast. It was eaten in three hours, and was, I must confess, rather a dull meal. No long speeches were given, which was a blessing under the circumstances, and the guests went quietly home after the affair was over with the impression that they had been doing something highly decorous and courteous, but just a little stupid. I remember very well that some years ago I felt greatly delighted at getting my first invitation to an actor's supper in George Browne's old place. I went joyfully forth, expecting to have a howling night of gayety. It seemed to me that actors must be the jolliest and wittiest of men at table, and I expected much. I was never more completely undeceived. It has occurred to me many times since that I will always be disappointed in these things. The fact is, the suppers a man gets at college totally unfit him for anything later in life, and he is bored by everything that has not snap, and vim, and go. But, for a sober fact, actors are undoubtedly stupid in social life.

NEW YORK, November 17, 1882.

FLANEUR.

It has been decided by a judge in Idaho that the refusal of a boarder to eat codfish-balls does not justify the keeper of the restaurant in shooting him. A case occurred in Wyoming Territory, during the period of building the Union Pacific Railroad, where a person was acquitted of the crime of murder for killing a passenger who refused to eat sausages in the ball. We presume these cases must have rested upon the usage and custom of the country, rather than upon the quality of the fish-balls or the sausages. In our judgment the presumptions of law should favor the accused who refuses to eat either, except in self defense. Now comes Nevada with another crime unknown to the code or the common law. Sullivan shoots Miller for wearing his hat in a ball-room. This has not yet reached a hearing. We can not anticipate what the theory of the defense will be, but the verdict will be, no doubt, justifiable homicide. If Wyoming, Idaho, and Nevada would send to the chain-gang every cowardly blackguard who carries a pistol, decent citizens might be permitted to refuse codfish-balls or sausages, and wear hats with impunity.

Saphir was a remarkably ugly Jew, who was deformed in person, who lived several centuries ago in Germany, and who was a marvel of satirical wit. Nobody was ever known to have got the better of him in repartee. Many of his retorts have been handed down to the present time. The following was his style of talking back to people: He was traveling in a stage-coach in company with two Jesuits, who made allusions to the personal appearance of Saphir, and were disposed to make fun of him generally. He put up with it for some time, but finally he asked: "Who are you two fellows, anyhow?" "We belong to the Society of Jesus." "Which society of Jesus?—his first or his last?" "What do you mean?" "Well, his first society were donkeys in the manger, and his last were thieves on Mount Calvary. Now I want to know to which of these societies you belong?"

The strange and horrible scenes enacted nightly in some of the ordinarily frequented quarters of Paris would make one imagine that the most civilized people of the universe had suddenly become more savage and lawless than the Ku-klux Klan of America. It is not an uncommon thing for a foot-passenger, returning home from the theatre, to be stayed in his promenade by a human form flung from an upper window and falling lifeless at his feet. Nor is it rare to be accosted by a group of brigands, who pinion their victim behind while the accomplice rifles his pockets.

Obscure Intimations.

"Orin Belknap," Spokane Falls, W. T.—You remark, apropos of our printing "John A. Logan" as "John M. Logan," that "a little learning is a dangerous thing." Very true, Orin, so it is. The man who possesses it in such perfection as to always get middle initials correctly, is none the less valuable in a newspaper office. He generally gets $2.50 a week. In addition to correcting initials, he sweeps out, during his leisure time.

SOCIETY.

DEAR BESS: With the cold weather has come an intimation that the holidays are at hand, and with them additional demand for the deft devices in Kensington, knitting, crochet, painting, etc. So busy have most of the ladies been in their various vocations, that they have hardly noted the unusual stagnation in the social community. Some efforts have been made at festivity, however, and among the most noticeable was the reception last Friday evening of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Lohse, introducing into society their daughter Jessie. The floral decorations were elegant, the supper nicely gotten up, and to the soft strains of music the dancers wended their way through the intricate mazes with spirit and enjoyment. This was strictly a young folks party, a feature quite national in its being so thoroughly American; for nowhere else could the indispensable chaperone be so nicely disposed of. Among those present were the Misses Durbrow, Miss Bessie Kittle, Miss Georgie Hammond, Miss Matie Peters, Miss Kate Olier, Miss Lulu Perry, the Misses Bolton, Miss Kate Hutchinson, Miss Jennie Vassault, Miss Elam, Miss Masten, Miss Carrie Corner, Miss Morrill, Miss Maud Miller, the Misses Bigley, and Miss Annie Shaw; of the gentlemen there were Mr. Walter Gilmore, Mr. Roundtree, Mr. Valentine, Mr. Harry Durbrow, Mr. Pray, Mr. Bergin, Mr. Gerberding, Mr. H. Hall, Mr. E. Scott, Mr. Page, Mr. Eli Hutchinson, Mr. Perry Kewen, Messrs. Hellman, Mr. Stafford, Mr. Parker, Mr. E. Coleman, and Messrs. Herman.

Another young people's gathering was an informal musicale and dance given by Mr. E. Sheldon, Thursday evening, during his occupancy of the Collier mansion. It was the occasion of bringing together a number of our young society people, as well as many of the army officers stationed here. Mrs. Low, Mrs. Blanding, Mrs. Buford, and Mrs. Breckinridge assisted in receiving and acting as chaperones. The musical exercises displayed much amateur talent, and, with dancing and a good supper, concluded the evening's enjoyment. Among those present were the Misses Ogden, Miss Jessie Bowie, Miss Bessie Sedgwick, Miss May Smith, Miss Jennie Flood, Miss Addie Mills, Miss Annie Crocker, Miss Maggie Brooks, Miss Lucile Thornton, the Misses Blanding, Miss Lucas, Miss Bessie Slade, Miss Jarboe, Miss Ashe, Miss Florence Atherton, Miss Sullivan, and Messrs. George Crocker, R. Pease, Carlton Coleman, George Pinkead, J. Leroy Nikel, Lieutenant Tait, Lieutenant Bailey, Harry Gillig, H. McDowell, Charles Platt, A. Bowie, Harry Tevis, M. Wilson, Porter Ashe, Frank Carolin, Will Thornton, H. Redington, E. N. Greenway, Harold and Alfred Wheeler, H. Hussey, Captain Dillbeck, Lieutenant Payson, Ernest White, and Messrs. Lucas and Nicholson.

Those participating last Saturday in the Pacific Yacht Club hop report an enjoyable time, though neither that nor the San Francisco Yacht Club closed with as much gayety as their auspicious opening promised; yet, after the music of Ballenberg and the informal good cheer provided, the guests dispersed at eight o'clock, well satisfied with the efforts of the members. An interesting feature of the afternoon was the presentation of prizes to the successful competitors in the last regatta. The first prizes, awarded to the Aggie, were a solid silver berry-dish and spoon, donated by John Ray Hamilton; also a silver goblet and champion flag, donated by members. The schooner Valde was awarded the second prize of a silver berry-bowl, donated by the club, and the sloop Annie won the third prize, a silver goblet, donated by P. Magowan.

A most interesting event occurred last Wednesday in Oakland. It was the golden wedding of Judge Crockett, in commemoration of the time when he, a young man of twenty-two, plighted himself to be all that was nearest and dearest to a sweet young girl of sixteen. Fifty years have passed, and, after all the chances that fortune and health are liable to, they were again enabled to celebrate the anniversary by sitting down with their children and grandchildren.

I hear there are most energetic rehearsals going on for the first of the promised series of Grand Hotel musicales. This season's entertainments at the Presidio were inaugurated by a luncheon on last Wednesday, given by Major Breckinridge to several of his brother officers, and it was followed on Friday evening by an informal hop well attended by many of our society people. Apropos of military receptions, General and Mrs. Schofield have taken possession of the house at Black Point, and will receive Saturday.

The kettle-drums promise to be revived, and, as an inaugural, next Monday, at B'nai B'rith, will be the occasion of benefiting one of the private hospitals of the city. The ladies impressed into service, (disbursing refreshments and vending tickets,) are some of our society leaders, which will no doubt add much to the selectness of the affair.

The banjo has become a popular and fashionable instrument East; and, catching the infection, some of our young society folks have organized a "banjo club." The members propose meeting at the house of Miss Lena Ashe. The club is composed of forty members. None of them are proficient as yet, but hope to be by assiduous effort.

The proposed Germans remain statu quo. It is feared they will fall through; but the project will no doubt receive some impetus which will enable the arrangements to be concluded. As a suggestion, I would note very agreeable "Occasions" which have lately been introduced in Paris by a leading New York society gentleman, Mr. Ed. M. Curtis, and the Countess of Trobiand. Variety seems to be the feature—music, recitations, theatricals, and charades.

But I see I have exhausted the week's news, and must close with a promise of more anon. Ever your friend, DORA.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 23, 1882.

The Robinson Party.

The winter gayeties at the Palace, the general headquarters for winter gayeties, were inaugurated on Tuesday night by Mr. and Mrs. James A. Robinson, who gave a farewell party to Miss Nina Platt, who is on the eve of departure for Rochester, N. Y. The conveniences for entertaining have been so thoroughly arranged in the Palace, that a party given there can scarcely fail to be a success. The floral decorations were unusually abundant, and the supper-table was a chef d'œuvre. It was observed by many that the number of wall-flowers was unusually small, and the number of dancing men unusually abundant. It was essentially a young people's party, and the few who lined the walls were dowager chaperones, and held their place from choice. Youth and pleasure met and chased the glowing hours till none were left.

The party was a very brilliant affair, and in many ways alike abundantly testified the charming hospitality of the hostess and the esteem and affection in which the principal guest of the evening is held. The guests commenced to arrive a little before nine, and dancing commenced half an hour afterward. The party took place in the main parlors of the hotel, which were brilliantly illuminated and tastefully decorated, a most conspicuous feature of the floral ornamentation being dependent spheres of pansies and other flowers from the chandeliers, which were otherwise plumed with smilax and kindred evergreens. There were no dance-cards, which is en regle. Refreshments were served during the evening, and supper at midnight on small tables.

Among the costumes the same predilection for white was observed that held sway last winter, and a growing tendency to trained dresses.

Mrs. Robinson received in a costume at once exceedingly rich and exquisitely delicate, a combination of very pale pink satin and duchesse lace. Miss Platt in white silk with lace quillings.

The growing fancy for the picturesque was displayed to some extent. Miss Nellie Wood wore a white satin with peplum of pale blue, with a chaplet of ivy leaves, a la Norma.

Miss Lillie Hastings, in a court-trained red satin and a picturesque coiffure, was reminiscent of the court of Louis XV.

Miss Amy Crocker, of Sacramento, in an elegant pink satin, en cour and covered with rich bead-work. Two humming-birds were poised for flight upon her shoulders, and two tinier ones nestled in her hair.

Miss Johnson, in white, and her hair bound with thin filets of silver, was in the Greek style.

Miss Annie Bradley, in a short pink silk, with baby waist and broad sash, in the style of the First Empire.

Miss Bessie Sedgwick was in white, with Spanish lace trimmings.

Miss Mollie Dodge (just returned from her trip East) was in blue satin with cascades of Valenciennes.

Miss Nellie Trowbridge, long white satin.

Miss Kate Felton, short white satin with pearl embroideries.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, a rich Paris costume of cream color covered with oriental embroideries.

Mrs. Schmiedel, pale blue satin, and a pair of diamonds.

Mrs. Harry Newton, light blue silk and pearl embroideries.

Mrs. Rutherford, white satin, court train, with embroidered front of iridescent beads. Coiffure à la Langtry.

Mrs. R. C. Hooker, pink cashmere and black lace.

Mrs. James Withington, white satin and Valenciennes lace.

Mrs. Loomis, a cream satin richly embroidered and Elizabethan ruff. Miss Susie Russell had on a cream-colored satin, embroidered in pearls and trimmed with Spanish lace.

Among the many present there were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Schmiedel, Mr. and Mrs. Drury Melone, Mr. and Mrs. L. Henry Newton, Miss Nettie Schmiedel, Morris Newton, Judge and Mrs. Ross, General and Mrs. Schofield, Miss Nellie Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Alex. D. Sharon, Senator Sharon, Miss Florence McKune, Mr. and Mrs. George Loomis, William Bauman, W. R. Paine, H. Bolland, C. J. Swift, Charles Felton, Miss Katie Felton, Miss Mamie Kohl, the Misses McAllister, Harall Moore, the Misses Moore, Miss Minnie Mizner, Miss Addie Mills, Miss Hawes, Miss Caldwell, Miss Polhemus, G. B. Polhemus, Miss Nellie Trowbridge, Consul Orlowsky, J. Wood, Mr. and Mrs. Goad, Mr. Schofield, Lieutenant C. R. Schofield, Miss Schofield, John Boyd, Mr. and Mrs. Charles McLaughlin, Miss Amy Crocker, Colonel and Mrs. Sullivan, Mr. and Mrs. Kittle, Miss Mamie Woodward, John W. Taylor, and many others. Those who attended the reception on Tuesday made their party calls last evening, and there followed an enjoyable affair, hardly second to that of the twenty-first. Miss Platt departs for the East this afternoon.

Notes and Gossip.

The many friends of Mrs. Harold Holderness gave her an affectionate greeting upon her arrival here from the East on Wednesday last. Mrs. Daniel Cook returned from Los Angeles on Sunday last. Dr. S. D. Cogswell and Mrs. Cogswell returned from the East on Wednesday last. Senator Miller and family are at the Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York, where they will remain until after the marriage of Miss May Crittenden. Hon. Leland Stanford and Mrs. Stanford, accompanied by their son and Miss Lizzie Hull, are at the Windsor Hotel, New York. Mayor Blake, who has been quite ill, is in a state of convalescence. William G. Griffin, United States Consul at Auckland, sailed for that place on the Zealandia on Sunday last. Miss Ada Ryland, who has been visiting in this city several weeks, returned to San José on Saturday last. General A. McD. McCook has been visiting Southern California, accompanied by his niece and daughter. Miss Minnie Mizner has been visiting the city during the week, but has returned to Benicia. Major and Mrs. Whitney, who were up here from San Diego most of last week, have returned to that place, where, of course, Mrs. Whitney at once became a great favorite. Mr. and Mrs. James V. Coleman have arrived in New York. Commodore Charles H. Baldwin, U. S. N., who has been at the Palace for a week or two, has returned to Washington. Mrs. Parrott and Miss Parrott have arrived in Paris. Medical Director Jacob S. Duncan, U. S. N., left for Yokohama on Wednesday last. John L. Chamberlain and Harry C. Benham, U. S. A., have been at the Occidental during the week. Major M. R. Morgan, U. S. A., and Mrs. Morgan and her two children, are at the Palace. Lieutenant-Commander George E. Ide, U. S. N., was at the Occidental on Saturday and Sunday last. Mrs. Doctor Kellogg, of Sacramento, is visiting in this city. Louis Sloss, who has been roaming over Europe for nearly three years, returned home on Saturday last. Mr. and Mrs. George Gibbs have gone East. Cards are out for the party to be given in Oakland on next Wednesday evening, by Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Miller. Mrs. George D. Roberts and her daughter have returned to the city for the winter. Mrs. P. D. Brown, of Oakland, leaves for the East to-day, to remain away all winter. Mrs. W. R. Fisher, of Stockton, is visiting Mrs. John McMullin; the many friends of Mrs. Governor Kinkaid, of Nevada, will be glad to know that she will be in the city next week as the guest of Mrs. McMullin. Mrs. W. T. Coleman will return to the city from San Rafael on or about the first of December, permanently for the winter. Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Dodge and their niece, Miss Mollie Dodge, who have been enjoying Indian summer in New York and elsewhere in the East, returned to San Francisco on Tuesday last. Assistant-Engineer George W. Snyder, U. S. N., arrived here from the East on Tuesday last. Mrs. G. W. Jones and Miss Daisy Jones, of Benicia, who have been visiting in the East, have returned. Senator Grover, of Oregon, tarried here day or two last week while on his way to Washington. Lieutenant Howell, U. S. N., is in Paris. Miss Josie Mallard, of Los Angeles, is visiting friends at the Navy Yard. Mr. Albert Castle returned home last week after nearly a year's absence in Europe. Mr. and Mrs. Lucien Herman, accompanied by their granddaughter, Miss Mamie Tucker, went down to Monterey on Saturday last, to pass a few days. Colonel James Zabriske, formerly of the army, but now United States District Attorney for Arizona, is visiting in this city for the first time in many years; the colonel is a brother of Mrs. R. H. Sinton. C. Adolph Low has been passing a few days at Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. J. C. McMullin and Miss L. E. McMullin, T. R. McMullin, and W. O. Lake, of Chicago, arrived in Los Angeles by special car a few days ago, and will spend the winter at the Sierra Madre Villa and elsewhere in Southern California. Mrs. T. B. Reynolds, Miss Reynolds, Miss Stetson, and Miss Hastings went to Monterey for a few days on Saturday last. Hon. Eugene L. Sullivan has returned from his ocean trip up the northern coast. Miss Jennie Galatin has returned to Sacramento from Benicia. Mrs. E. B. Crocker went up to Sacramento on Saturday last. Mrs. Robert Graves and Miss Graves are at Monterey. Lieutenant Haskell, U. S. A., and Mrs. Haskell, who have been at the Grand for some few weeks, have gone East. The next "Literary" at the Navy Yard will take place on the first Thursday in December, at the residence of Captain and Mrs. Boyd. Captain William Kohl, of San Mateo, who has been in the East for nearly six months, returned home on Thursday last. Mr. and Mrs. William Norris also returned from the East on Thursday. Lieutenant George H. Morgan, of the Third Cavalry, U. S. A., who was wounded in the last Apache troubles in Arizona, and who is well known in this city, was married to Miss Mollie Brounson in Omaha on the first instant. The announcement in the Argonaut, some weeks ago, of the wedding-day of Miss Katy A. Hutchinson and Mr. John F. Olmstead, of Washington, may now be supplemented by the announcement of their nuptials, which were celebrated at Miss Hutchinson's home in Washington, No. 1619 Massachusetts Avenue, on the eighth instant. Mrs. General W. H. L. Barnes, who tarried some time after leaving Cambridge with her relatives and friends on the Hudson, returned home on Thursday last. Mr. and Mrs. D. Ogden Mills will remain as guests of Mr. and Mrs. Maturin Livingston at their place on the Hudson during the winter. Mr. and Mrs. E. Barrett, of Oakland, returned from the East on Sunday last. Rev. C. T. Mills, of Mills Seminary, who has been visiting in Los Angeles, has returned. Mr. and Mrs. M. F. Garrett, have been spending the week in Los Angeles. Mrs. Colton has returned from Southern California. There are quite a number of San Francisco ladies in Los Angeles, among whom are Mrs. Captain Mrs. A. H. Wilcox, and the Misses Mamie, Fannie, and Tulita Wilcox, H. M. Newhall, and Mrs. G. Palache. Governor Pitkin, of Colorado, has been visiting in Southern California during the week. General G. Pitcher, U. S. A., and Mrs. Pitcher and son arrived here from the East yesterday. Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Sargent, who have lately returned from their wedding tour, gave receptions at the Palace on Tuesday and Thursday, the twenty-first and twenty-third instant. Mr. and Mrs. George H. Kimball, who have been at the Lick for a year or more, have taken up their residence at the Grand. Hon. T. D. Mott and Mrs. Mott of Los Angeles, and Miss George Mott, are at the Grand. Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Wilson have taken up their residence for a while at the Palace. Mrs. De Guigné gave a dinner to Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Donahoe at the Parrott residence on Folsom Street on Tuesday evening last. Evan J. Coleman returns from the East to-day, accompanied by a brother. There will be a hop at the Presidio on Friday evening next, and alternate Friday evenings thereafter during the season. Mrs. H. E. Judah, of Menlo, who has been in the East for a month or more, will return home to-morrow. Mrs. Samuel Holladay and her two daughters, who have been passing nearly a year in Europe, have arrived in New York, and will leave that city in time to arrive here on or about the first of December. Mrs. General I. Kautz is contemplating a European visit. Mrs. Major Samuel T. Cushing, of Vancouver barracks, with her family, will spend the coming winter at 914 Pine Street.

Next Thursday is Thanksgiving Day. So declared by President Arthur. We are glad that he made his proclamation before election, else we fear this interesting festival had been postponed till the political reaction, and perhaps that is an indefinite period. Thanksgiving Day means, primarily, gratitude to the good God who is the hounteous giver of all good things, the source from whence all blessings flow; and, secondarily, it is the day of feasting upon fat things, the day upon which we piously stuff ourselves and our children, and in gratitude eat. It is a day of rejoicing to children, and a day of tribulation to turkeys; a day of roast and boiled fowls, chicken pie, and plum-puddings. Our own good and wise Governor also commends to all within his political jurisdiction that they be thankful, pray, and eat, in testimony of their appreciation of the gifts of the bountiful Giver. We have everything to be thankful for. First, for the elections; and then for national prosperity, peace with all nations, bounteous harvests, plenty abounding throughout the land, and in California a year of progress, health, and abundance. We have escaped the comet, elected Stoneman, and, in addition to a bounteous harvest and an abundant grape crop, we have our climate, and Doctor McDonald, and Holtz for city assessor, and other blessings too numerous to mention. In the midst of our own rejoicing and feasting, our own prosperity and happiness, let us not forget that in the vicissitudes of our history good people have come to grief, and that rich people have become poor. As we gather our own families around the happy fireside, and place our legs beneath the mahogany groaning with good things to eat and lemonade, let us remember those to whom God has not been good, those upon whom he has frowned, those whose poor homes are bare and destitute, those whose children wear pinched and hungry faces, those who are sick, and those who are poor and proud and are hiding away in tenement house and alley to escape the eyes that would pity them. There are such, and they are many in this great, rich, bustling, busy city of San Francisco. There is in our midst an association of young girls known as "The Flower Mission." They are fair-faced, rosy-cheeked, pretty girls; young, tender-hearted, and generous; full of kindness and sympathy; acting, and willing to act, as the almoners of the bounties of generous people; volunteering to visit the sick and the poor, and hunting out the shrinking and sensitive ones, who steal away to hide their crime of poverty in secret places—the proud poor, who have seen better days. These girls visit hospitals with flowers; carry soups, jellies, and good things to the poor and sick; carry their bright, saucy faces into sick-rooms, and make them blaze with the radiance of their sunny smiles. There is healing in the cool, soft, velvet touch of a bright, cheerful girl to the head that burns in fever or the heart that aches with pain. One such touch and one such smile are medicine to the mind diseased—worth more than all the prayers of paid preachers and all the ministrations of professional philanthropy. On Thursday next the girls of the Flower Mission, 713 Mission Street, will send out seventy-five Thanksgiving dinners to such poor people as, after personal investigation, they shall find to be deserving. There will be seventy-five boxes, each containing a Thanksgiving turkey, two heads of celery, vegetables in variety, cranberry sauce and dessert, dried fruits, candy for the children, dates, prunes, figs, nuts, raisins, and all sorts of good things, with pies and cakes and sugar-cookies. And now we say to the readers of the Argonaut: We desire you, and each of you, to contribute to this charity. Send your gifts on Wednesday, in time for arrangement and distribution. Everything we have named will be acceptable, and, in addition, sugar, coffee, tea, and chocolate; butter—good, fresh dairy butter, no oleomargarine; pumpkin pies, and especially—very especially—nice, rich sugar-cookies, as they will keep. Fruit—fresh, dried, or in cans—is acceptable. Anything that is good for sick people, and any delicacy that will tempt the appetite, these girls will cheerfully receive and distribute. Persons having flower gardens and conservatories should send flowers for distribution. Violets are now in season, and the French hospital has not received a bouquet in over three weeks. Only think of the happiness of a sick Frenchman at the receipt of a bouquet of fresh violets with their rich perfume! People from the country are more generous, it is said, than people from the town. Let each send a box of apples, grapes, or other fruit, or a box of raisins. They come freight-free by Wells, Fargo & Co.'s express, and the boxes, baskets, and other packages returned. One country lady has promised ten turkeys. If this notice is read too late for Thursday, send along anything that will keep. And to all of those of our readers who have no turkeys, fruits, edibles, or flowers to send, send money. Money is always acceptable. During the first year of the Mission, it only received twenty dollars. The next year it had five hundred dollars. This last year one thousand dollars have been sent. Next year the girls want two thousand dollars. They want three hundred dollars to hire two carriages for distribution one day each week. Money, kind, generous reader—money for the sick and poor who have seen better days; money not to be wasted by professional philanthropists, hired secretaries, and paid almoners. The Flower Mission work is all done by young girls who volunteer—not a sour-face or a preacher among them. Let those who have an abundance think of this, and give; let those who have known poverty themselves think and give; let those who fear it may come to them think and give; and, our word for it, every dollar shall reach the bed-side or fire-side of the suffering poor. The Flower Mission is No. 713 Mission Street, opposite the Grand Opera House. The time to fill thanksgiving baskets is Wednesday.

If there is one place in life more satisfactory than another it is the barber's shop. To sit in cushioned easy chairs, with legs extended across a carpeted rest, with head thrown back upon an adjusted support, nicely tucked about the neck with clean towels, and submit to the gentle manipulation of a colored artist, is to realize all that this world affords of creature comfort. The German or Italian barber is a failure. The Irish barber we never saw. The white barber we eschew. It seems to us that no white man should handle a razor or shears, and that no American should play a fiddle. The true barber is the colored man, and he should be clean of person, sweet of breath, gentle of touch, low in voice, and full of gossip. When a white barber asks how we are, we resent the impertinent familiarity. When he takes us by the nose or plucks at our beard, we shrink from the touch as though we had had our nose pulled. Did any one, native American born, ever subject himself the second time to a hair-frizzing Frenchman, exuding garlic at every pore, or to a plethoric Dutchman filled with lager-beer and limberger cheese? The writer was shaved the other day by a female on Market Street, and he liked it. There is a ravishingly sweet sensation in having one's head gently supported just off the hard, crescent thing that clasps the base of the brain. A man likes the gentle, undulating motion that assures him that the respiratory organs of the fair barberous one are calmly performing their duty without heat or excitement. We have an ideal barber: a "lady," young, not too bewitching in manner, in perfect health, strong-lunged, deep-chested, with embonpoint, small hands, white arms, sweet breath, voice like the melodious cooing dove, low, musical, and soft, a touch of velvet, dressed neatly, cleanly of course, and redolent of sweet perfumes. The barber-shop should be a boudoir, with fresco, frieze, and dado; cool, soft pictures in oil, hidden here and there, animals switching flies, meadow, shade, and running brook; draperies of lace, subdued light, and only one barber's chair, with a waiting-room for the next gentleman. Then what becomes of our colored brother? We reconcile our tastes, and our ideal female barber shall be black.

SANTA CRUZ, November 20, 1882.—DEAR OLLA-PODRIDA: I am curious to know what distinction, if any, you make between the Pope's Democratic Irish and the Pope's Republican Irish? I am an Irishman, Catholic, but a strong Republican in politics. Took your advice, however, and voted against Estee. Am I a good fellow, or am I a "fannel mouth?" Respectfully, PATRICK NOLAN.

DEAR PATRICK: There is no doubt about it: you are a good fellow. You are one of those exceptions we have been making all the way along. You are probably not a very good Catholic; hence, we are prepared to admit that you may be a very good citizen. And now, Patrick, let us ask, if you had sore eyes, would send to the holy spring at Lourdes for miraculous water? Would you wear a tin medal blessed by Saint Anybody to prevent you from baving fits? Would you put this tin medal into a horse-trough to cure a sick horse, or, if you were going to sea, would you wear a blessed cross to prevent you from being drowned or hanged? If you had rheumatism, gout, or one leg were shorter than the other, do you believe that holy cement from the miraculous gable of the parish church at Knock has the power to cure you or make your leg grow? If you did a mean and wicked thing—if, for instance, you had voted for Estee—would you go to a priest and confess?—and, if you did, are you ignorant and bigoted enough to believe that this priest could do you any good, or that he could get any nearer the great white throne to ask for divine intercession than you could? If your grandfather should be suddenly kicked to death by a mule, and sent all unprepared to his last account, do you believe he would bring up in purgatory, and that from purgatory he could be prayed up to the golden harp and golden pavement by masses for his soul, mumbled in Latin by an Irish priest for coin? And, dear Patrick, would you pay coin?—and, if so, how much for the repose of the soul of the ancient Nolan? Do you think the Pope is the civil as well as spiritual ruler of the world? If he is the viceregent of God—His representative on earth, infallible in wisdom, with the power of the All-powerful—then he ranks our President, and should have authority over our country and its people. Are you priest-ridden? When an election comes along, does some snuff-taking old man, or some flabby boy in a white cravat and coat with a stand-up collar, presume to take you aside and threaten you with extra purgatorial punishment if you don't vote for General Rosecrans for Congress, or Dave Belden for Superior Judge? And now, in conclusion, friend Nolan, if you edited the Argonaut, and were an American and not a Catholic, and didn't care a tinker's imprecation for Irish, Democrats, or priests, and you should observe a loud-mouthed, ignorant, bigoted Irishman hanging around primary conventions, getting up ward clubs, interfering in politics at all times, drunk and noisy at the polls on election day, shouting "Here's your regular Democratic ticket," working and sweating all day, and (when he goes home at night and passes before a church with a cross on its spire) crosses himself and mumbles a prayer; and if you were in the midst of ten thousand of this kind where they met on the sand-lot and rioted and made processions in the streets, smoking Chinese cigars, demanding that the Chinese "must go," and on banners declaring that they were suffering for bread; and if, to crown all, they got elected to State and city offices, and to judicial positions, then, friend Nolan, what in the devil's name would you call them? It strikes us that "Pope's Democratic fannel-mouthed Irish" is drawing it very mild. Yours, truly, OLLA-PODRIDA.

The December number of the Californian is the last. Henceforth this magazine will appear as the Overland Monthly. The present number contains a variety of interesting papers; among which are "The Bancroft Historical Library," by F. F. Victor; "Wandering Joe," a story by Miss Addis; and "Down the Mississippi." The prospectus for the coming year gives promise of many good things. Among the Eastern contributors will be Mrs. "H. H." Jackson, D. C. Gilman, Noah Brooks, Edgar Fawcett, W. E. Griffis, (the writer on Corea,) Doctor Edward E. Hale, William H. Baker, and others. Among the Pacific Coast authors will be John Muir, H. H. Bancroft, John R. Pomeroy, J. W. Gally, President Reid, and many others. The present number contains a largely increased advertisement list. From the fact that "Gaskell's Compendium" has finally appeared on the last page, it is to be supposed, probably, that the Californian is now accepted in the East as a magazine.

A very contemptible and altogether worthless Polish Jew by the name of Chohnsky, who deals in second-hand books, has had the impudence to visit Los Angeles and to ask from General Stoneman an appointment as Registrar of Voters in San Francisco. We are opposed to the giving of this place to any foreigner, and certainly to neither of the Polish Jews who are now clamoring for it—neither Kaplan nor

SHE BEING A PHILOSOPHER.

After the Carnival—A Nocturne.

The man Grump had taken it into his wise head to present each participant in the Bon-Bon Booth with a box of marrons glacés, and Elias Tucker, knowing this beneficent intention, had said to Arabella, early in their acquaintance: "Shall I bring you yours?" with just the smallest hesitation, showing that he would not necessarily be the messenger selected; and Arabella had said: "Bring them!" with alacrity, for it established another opportunity to talk about her beloved candy trade. But when Elias spoke those few words to her on the last night of the Carnival, she thought of the day when she should receive the marrons, and her heart quailed a little; yet she did not tell him that he had best not bring them, and the next moment sternly asked herself why—she being a philosopher, and therefore introspective and retrospective, rather than prospective; which last might possibly do some good, whereas the first two never can.

Her answer to her self-asked question was beautiful. It was like this:

"The men in my world—really participants in the booth, as it were—use just such phrases as Elias used, simply to give conversation a fillip and add a spice to an evening's companionship. They lay them aside and resume them as they do their canes, and why may not Elias, dealer in candy—by the stick, dear calling!—have caught up so much of a genuine participant's address? Probably he has done so. It is acting—and capitalizing assumed. I have told him that it does not please me; so when he brings the marrons we shall confine our conversation strictly to their manufacture. Oh, the candy trade!" Here she fell into an ecstasy. "Perversely, bitterly beloved, the wherefore of the attraction past all power of the most philosophical analysis to seize upon, why must Elias Tucker be the one man with whom it is easy to discuss these saccharine subjects, when he is under a ban? Yet why under a ban? After all, we are Americans!" Arabella's thoughts were quite startling in their boldness when she was alone—she being a philosopher.

Then she went down to the Bon-Bon Booth to receive the marrons, and saw Elias. They talked—how he had learned to make all his life and experience converge to the one great focus of candy-making; how he taught her that, if it ever was to be her trade, she must work into it every thought and feeling; even if she made a "sweet speech," immediately to consider its use as a motto to wrap round a burnt almond. And Arabella of the fervent temperament said, Amen! with all her might. It suited her to think of all the power in her tossed to the mighty engine that provides the world with the choicest candies, while she learned to work better and better, and, though the laurels of candy-making are so scant, amply rewarded by the absolute pleasure of the work itself, as is the case in all strenuous endeavor.

Coming out of her dream with a start, she saw Elias standing before her, with a blind look of pain in his eyes, as of one hurt to death—not shrinking at all, not appealing, but suffering exquisitely—and her heart smote her with a deep, unavailing remorse.

Arabella was accustomed to ridicule this sort of thing unsparingly. She was used to seeing the men of her world pay their little court with their cautious little vanity on the alert, their prudent little loophole of escape ever guarded for their inordinate self-esteem, their pale little preferences trying hard to catch ever so faint a glow from their lack-lustre imaginations; or else she had seen the sudden flame of unworthy passion blaze up and die, smothered in a laugh and quick curse. These vistas had not seemed of an auspicious nature.

The look in Elias's face did not, in any way, resemble these studies, nor recall them, and she felt singularly disinclined to laugh.

He had warned her and she had not heeded; she had hurt him and she was sorry. Oh, feeble, pitiful, pitiless story!

He said gently, with that simple, sturdy, ineradicable sense of justice that belongs to the Eliases, and, alas! almost never to the Arabellas of this tired world:

"You know it depends upon you whether I see you or not, Arabella."

And she, understanding the reproach, and with that bitter, passionate pang of pity even then rending her heart, told him how he might see her again, coward that she was, and weaker than a spent wave's wreath of foam. Because it was pleasant to see him, because it had become hard to refuse, and she had let it become so.

At home at night she leaned against the window and saw the lights spring up, here and there and everywhere, like fire-flies in the little homes clustered on the flat toward the west; saw the hills beyond, the red scar of the afterglow on the horizon, toward the north the frown of the mountains, and the bay darkling and quivering at their feet; and then saw, with the inward eyes, her own nature like a dim, starlighted waste, full of ruined columns of fair, heaven-reaching dreams overthrown, crumbling shrines of deserted gods, prowling wild beasts of the mind's cravings, famished for infinite delight, infinite comprehension. She caught her breath and stretched out her hands.

"You understand," she said, aloud, and her voice broke the spell—the dream was dreamed out.

Next day, or a week after, or any time, she stood upon the incoming El Capitán. The whole city was wrapped in a bank of warm, neutral-tinted vapor. All the houses were invisible, but the towers upon the hills that caught fire from the sun going down. It made the city like an old castled town. The sun was a disk of burning red, that, as it fell nearer the purple cloud-bank, burned away the upper, thinner films, and seemed strong enough to blaze triumphantly through all. Then one of the city's towers stood threateningly against the flaming shield, a black bar cutting the sun's plane across, while one might count seven, and then the god sank into the fleecy blue fog that he flooded and expanded with light, but could not dispel.

This pageant awoke no reverie in Arabella, as the skyey influences sometimes did—she being a philosopher. Each change merely made its impression, like lines of the printed page one is learning, and the whole remained a vivid, imperishable memory. Yet her mind was not adrift on the boundless sea of mere passionate languor. She had a thought —a distinct and controlling one—symbolized by two little words, not unmusical, that heat in her brain with tireless iteration, and shocked thought awake each time it would have gladly slept. The words were a woman's name, the name of Elias's sweetheart.

Does the phrase chime harshly, untunably with sunsets and windless seas? Does a theft jar discordantly with fair morality? She had robbed this girl of the allegiance of an honest heart. There was no surprise sprung; it was no news to Arabella that Elias had won the favor of a sweet young girl, who, but for her, would be—all a sweet young girl should be to the one who cares to woo and win.

And she should be so still! She who had injured would atone, as far as in her lay—give back, give up, let go. The sentence she passed on herself rang these different changes.

Only a star-lighted sky should hood forever above the dim dream-landscape; the tremulous, golden dawn scorned such crape-hung heavens, and of the wrecked shafts and fragments it were well to build dykes against the inpouring desolation of the desert sand.

Smile on, Democritus, wise and well-contented old man! Pull the red scarf of creature-comfort over the brown of sere fancy, and, as you hurry away, shake a taunting finger at the heavy payment for the short delirium.

"The Bosphorus, the Bosphorus!
When thorns took place of moss for us,
Gone was all! Our hearts were graves
Deeper than the Bosphorus!"

The night fell, electric, convulsive, and shook fierce, flaunting pennons of color over the sky, but sleep was better, the heavy, dreamless sleep of exhaustion and grief. What care? The lovely, eternal changes play on above benumbed fatigue and un-wondering eyes of worship, without slight to the one, without favor to the other, by the dear, the immutable, the bitterly wholesome indifference of Fate.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1882. PHILIP SHIRLEY.

Mr. F. Francis, in the October number of the Nineteenth Century, speaks in the following terms of this city and its inhabitants: "San Francisco is rapidly forsaking the 'dandy rig' of the gambler, and assuming the sober garb of commercial propriety. Stocks have gone all 'endways.' The old times when fortunes were made and lost in a day, when a man might go to bed a pauper and wake a millionaire, or wake a millionaire and go to bed a pauper, have vanished. Nor is it probable that they ever will return. Those were times! Refer to them in the presence of any one who knew them in their golden prime and mark how his eyes will glisten. How eagerly will he launch forth upon a sea of anecdote!—how he will revel in the train of recollections thus induced! 'Dog gone if I know the place!' said an old fellow to me when I was last there. 'Ye never see a shot fired from year's end to year's end now. No, sir. Why, it isn't often ye even hear a champagne cork drawn.' Stead of the clink of gold, ye hear nothing but the scratching of pens. All the boys are gone, and there's only store clerks and society men—bummers we call 'em—t' associate with. Ye never saw such a change in all your life. I'll be dog if the women's half as pretty as they were. Hell! 'Tain't no sort of place to what it used to be. No, sir.' Nevertheless, to the stranger it will seem that a spirit of princely extravagance still characterizes the inhabitants of the Golden City. With his last ten-dollar-piece the true San Franciscan will dine sumptuously, take a box at the theatre, or a drive out to the Cliff House. His last twenty-five cents will be invested in a good cigar. The veriest 'dead beat' who asks for money in the street would feel insulted by a tender of coppers. The Californian will starve rather than pinch. Fortunately, he has only to work to be rich. There is no fight for existence there. No man need jostle his neighbor. Such being the case, men accept greater risks and experience losses with less concern than is the case in Europe. Returning to San Francisco, on one occasion, after an absence of some twelve months, I discovered that several men, who, during my previous visit, had appeared to possess bottomless purses, had vanished from the club circle. 'Where is A.?' I asked. 'A.?' Oh, he's got a mine down in Arizona. When the bottom tumbled out of that Polar Star Silver Mine, A. had to skin out of this. 'And what has become of B.?' 'Well, one of the boys met him prospecting down in New Mexico the other day. Said he was carrying his own pack, dead broke. B. will be up again, though. He's a rustler. You'll hear of him soon.' 'Has C. gone, too?' 'Yes. Soon after you left they knocked Golcondas higher'n a kite. C. was a large holder. They do say he's prospecting a new mine down in the Tombstone country, and it's likely to turn out a bonanza. Hope it will, anyhow.' There is much that is very admirable in the character of these Western men. I speak not of the 'store clerks and society men or bummers,' for whom my old Frisco friend had such undisguised contempt, but of those who came in early days to California. They are lost in a crowd of a different type and of a later date now; but wherever you find one, though, you will find a large-hearted, generous man, with nothing 'small or mean' in his whole character. In the better stamp of the old Californian there is less of the snob than in any man in the world. He cares very little for what Pall-Mall would call 'good form'; but he cares a great deal for what is manly and unselfish, and in carrying out these views he is as fearless of what others may think or say as he is of what they may do." In the course of the article, while describing a "jerked-beef and jack-rabbit" dinner on the Mexican border, the writer remarks: "We laughed as we compared these frugal meals with the extravagant breakfasts and dinners of a year ago at 'Marchand's,' the 'California House,' and the 'Poodle Dog,' in San Francisco."

Complaint is made by the Pall-Mall Gazette that in "a new and remarkable American novel, of which we shall have something to say another day," one of the characters is described as "dressed in a long frock of cheap diagonals, black cassimere pantaloons, a blue necktie, and celluloid collar." It acknowledges that it knows the "blue necktie," and that it can guess the "black cassimere pantaloons;" but the "cheap diagonals" and the "celluloid collar" are surely new to literature. "Is it not well," asks the Pall-Mall, "that the technicalities of a tailor's bill should remain out of literature?"

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A German peasant comes to a broker to exchange a hundred-mark note for silver. The broker gives him a hundred-mark roll, which the peasant opens to see if it is all right. He counts up to seventy-one, and then puts it all in his pocket. "It was all right so far, so I suppose the rest is right, too."

A Paris parvenu, having purchased an ancient castle with all the accessories, is found by his daughter on the first cold day warming his hands at a fire which he has had kindled in a suit of plate armor. "Oh, pa, what have you been doing?" The lord of the manor, with satisfaction—"The feller that patented that stove must have been crazy, but I've made the old thing heat up!"

Lord Alvanley had been dining on one occasion with Mr. Greville, whose dining-room had been newly and splendidly decorated. The meal was, however, a very meagre and indifferent one. Some of the guests were flattering their host upon his magnificence, taste and hospitality. "For my part," interposed Alvanley, "I would rather have seen less gilding and more carving."

At a hotel in Oswego, recently, a couple from the country, of Milesian extraction, took seats at the dinner-table. Directly after a young couple seated themselves opposite, and the young man took a stalk of celery from the dish and commenced eating it. The old lady opposite looked at him a moment with an air of disgust, and then nudged her husband and said, in a stage whisper: "D'ye moind the blackguard aiting the bokay?"

Cecco d'Arcoli argued against Dante that nature was more powerful than art. Dante asserted the contrary, and attempted to prove the truth of his assertion by exhibiting his cat, which, by dint of long practice, had been accustomed to hold a candle in its paw while he supped or read. Cecco, however, was not unprepared for this exhibition, but while Dante's cat went through his performance he let loose a couple of mice. Whereupon the cat immediately dropped the candle, and rushed upon the mice; so that nature once more triumphed over art.

A man, says the New Orleans Times-Democrat, was carrying a coon he had caught, when he met three little boys in the road. All of them said, excitedly and at once: "Mister, give me that coon; give me that coon, mister." "Well, boys, I'll tell you what I will do. If you will tell me the party you belong to and why, I'll give it to the boy who gives the best reason for his faith." "I'm a Republican, because that party saved the Union," said one. "I'm a Greenbacker, because that party is in favor of plenty of money." When the time of the third boy came, he said: "I'm a Democrat, 'cause I want the coon."

A bridal couple boarded the train at Kemptville the other day. The groom was a strapping fellow, and squeezed the bride into a seat next the window. Some of the train hands who were posted put the newshy up to bringing in a box of baby-rattles and offering the embarrassed party their choice for five cents. All sorts of excuses were offered by the man as reasons for not buying. Finally he made a clean breast of the situation with: "See here, young feller, I've only been married a little over fifteen minutes. Give us a rest. We don't want to set up housekeeping right here in the car. Keep your tinware an' I'll be along next year. If the returns are satisfactory, I'll buy your hull caboodle."

One of the difficulties, says a writer in the London World, of manipulating the naval brigade on shore is to get them to understand military words of command. I can sympathize with the staff officer who tried, but in vain, to get a battalion of sailors to manoeuvre round the corner of a house. He gave all the orthodox and regulation words of command—"right wheel," "bring the left shoulder forward," etc.—but Jack remained obstinately fixed. At last a naval officer, who was standing by, on being appealed to, solved the question. "Get them round that house? Is that all you want? Here, blue-jackets!" he cried, "luff, and weather that house!" The sailors were round the corner in a twinkling.

Probably the politest and most considerate man who ever lived was General Bradshaw, of Arkansas. Some time ago, boarding a train, he perceived his son, whom he had not seen for twenty years, occupying a seat, reading. The old gentleman sat down immediately behind the young man. After the train had gone about thirty miles, the young man laid aside his newspaper, and, discovering his father, seized the old man with affectionate warmth. "Why didn't you let me know that you were on the train, father?" "Because," replied the old gentleman, "I saw that you were reading, and I did not wish to disturb." "That would have made no difference." "And, besides," continued the father, "I thought that you might want to borrow a few dollars."

A hunter with an empty game-bag, says the New York World, enters a country tavern at nightfall, and with an air of gloom bids the host serve him with a glass of wine. "Yes, my friend; I did not bag a single thing. The first time such a thing has happened to me in the course of my life." (Sportsman's perjury at which Jove laughs.) "Well, if you are anxious to take something home, I have a hare out in the stable that I would not mind parting to you for ten francs." "A hare? Dead?" "No; alive. I caught it yesterday." "I'll take it." The landlord leads the hunter out into the yard and brings out the hare, which he ties to a stake by a cord fastened to its foot. "Now, sir, blaze away!" The sportsman retires a few paces, brings his gun to his shoulder, and blazes away, and the charge takes effect in the cord, and the hare bounds lightly over the fence, and disappears in the azure distance.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The latest Oxford incongruity is Professor Max Müller on a tricycle.

Sir Garnet Wolseley has changed his mind, and will enter the British peerage as Baron Wolseley of Cairo, instead of "of Egypt," as was at first intended.

Premier Gladstone is said to own a piece of land at Niagara Falls, between Table Rock and the Prospect House, which he refuses to sell at any price.

"The Reverend the Earl of Mulgrave" intends, it is said, soon resigning the vicarage of Worsley, England, and coming to America as a missionary in British Columbia.

Zola, the novelist, writes a round, rapid hand, every letter being formed distinctly, but hastily. His signature is bold and plain, and covers several lines of ordinary ruled paper.

Queen Olga of Greece carries with her on her travels a lap-dog of that rare breed so often represented by Sir Peter Lely in his pictures of the ladies of the Court of Charles II.

Two of Ismail Pasha's daughters have been placed in a fashionable school in Paris, and are described as being bright and winsome girls. The harem of their ex-royal papa is in the Rue Bayard.

Strauss, the composer, has recently purchased a house in Paris, and declares that he will end his days there. The cause of his removal is reported to be domestic infelicity and a consequent divorce suit.

The unhappy Emperor of all the Russias, on returning to St. Petersburg from Moscow, at his first meal in the royal palace found, it is said, a Nihilistic proclamation wrapped in his table napkin, placed there by a disloyal page.

Father Peter John Beckx, the general of the order of Jesuits, is now in his eighty-seventh year, and his declining health has of late given rise to much speculation concerning his probable successor. He has been at the head of the order for nearly thirty years.

Sir Archibald Alison, who commanded the Highland Brigade at Tel-el-Kebir, is eldest son of the late Sir Archibald Alison, sheriff of Lanarkshire, and author of a history of Europe. He lost an arm at the relief of Lucknow. He is a fine looking soldier aged fifty-seven.

Major the Hon. Oliver Montagu, remembered in New York as a "dancing" man, performed prodigies of slaughter in the charge at Kassassin, and, according to Lord Desart, has not yet allowed his sword to be cleaned from the sanguinary stains which show the deadly use he made of it.

The death is announced of the chief wife of Sidi Muley Hassan, Sultan of Morocco. She was the daughter of an Italian blacksmith, and firmly clung to the Christian faith all her life; notwithstanding which she was honored by the Mohammedan prince with the rank of legitimate Sultana.

When the ex-Empress Eugenie was in Paris, two weeks ago, on her way to the castle of the Duc de Mouchy, she stayed at the Hotel Bedford, in which, and close by her apartments, was living that very Prince von Hohenzollern who was the indirect cause of the war that wrought her and hers such ruin.

The cable brings word that Lord Dufferin is to be made a marquis for his diplomatic services. The career of Lord Dufferin, still a comparatively young man, has been a most brilliant one. Of the adage, "Nothing succeeds like success," we have a striking illustration in the careers of Lord Dufferin and Sir Garnet Wolseley.

Professor Barfoot, of the Museum of Natural History, Salt Lake City, was born at Warwick Castle, England, in 1816, a lineal descendant of Robert Bruce, and at the time of his death heir to the earldom of Crawford. He embraced Mormonism in London in 1856. A Mormon peer would have had all the charm of novelty at Westminster, where as yet there is not even a Jew.

Two natives of Maine have sought fortune successfully in Europe. One is Lilian Norton, a granddaughter of Camp-meeting John Allen. She is under engagement in Paris as a singer at twelve thousand dollars a year. The other is Frederick Gower, who is said to have made one million five hundred thousand dollars by forming telephone companies in London. They are to marry each other.

Gambetta, the ex-dictator of France, has a niece who is a very promising danseuse. Her services have been engaged in a London music hall, and it is believed that she is one of the most attractive women in her profession. It appears that Mademoiselle Gambetta belonged to an unsuccessful branch of the family, and as her uncle, like many other uncles of the present age, entirely ignored her, she adopted the stage as a means of livelihood. This ill-treatment of their poor relation is, it appears, peculiar to distinguished Frenchmen. At the very time when Thiers was President of France his sister kept a wretched little cook-shop. Of course, a great statesman could not recognize a woman who kept an eating-house, even though she was his sister.

Bonnat, the famous French painter, is a solid and muscular little man, with broad shoulders, a massive head, and strongly marked features. His dark hair is brushed back from a broad, high forehead, his black beard is only slightly marked with silver, and his black eyes sparkle with that vivacity peculiar to the Basques. He is neither a wit nor a brilliant talker, but is esteemed as a true friend and an excellent and amiable man. He is forced to put on full dress and appear in society every evening, the victim of his models; but he looks as if being socially victimized agreed with him. He has an elegant studio—the walls adorned with tapestry, faïences, Venetian mirrors, and rich works of art. On the mantel is his own bust, by Chapu, between massive silver and gold candelabra. To the right is a dais covered with green cloth, on which stands a chair upholstered with blue velvet. In that chair have been seated Thiers, Hugo, Grévy, and French statesmen and American millionaires innumerable, to have their counterfeit presentments placed on canvas by Bonnat's wonderful skill.

THE LATEST MAGAZINE VERSE.

Found Drowned.

She searches, searches everywhere,
As one would treasure find—
Old Susan, with the wandering eye
And long-bewildered mind.
All up and down the shining sands
With eager step she goes;
And speaks with hesitating voice,
Not knowing friends from foes.
"Oh, have you seen my pretty hoy,
My little baby brother?
She left him to me when she died,
And made me be his mother—
Our mother. She frowns out of heaven
On me, as once she smiled;
So I go searching night and day
Until I find her child.
'Tis a few weeks ago"—(alas,
She has lost count of years!)—
"I laid him on the soft warm sand
Asleep, and had no fears.
I only went a little way,
And sat behind that stone,
Writing to William Beverley,
That is to India gone.
He will come back and marry me,
He says, in two years more;
I shall be then but just eighteen,
And he scarce twenty-four.
But can he marry me?" she shrieks—"Me that was hanged? I mean
They would have hanged me, but perhaps Somebody told the Queen,
And she said—what, I do not know;
I think I slept or died.
And woke up in a world of dreams
Most horrible and wide.
I did not kill the hoy," she moans;
"I only left him here—
Forgot him—and the tide flowed in
And ebb'd out—no one near.
Not guilty! O my lord, my lord,
Not guilty!" sobbing wild;
"I only let him float away
And drown—my mother's child!
And so my mother made them shut
On me the prison door,
Till I was dead; yet now, it seems,
I am alive once more.
I walk along the shining sands,
I hear his shout of joy;
I know I'll find him very soon,
My little darling boy."
So on she goes with cautious tread,
And eager eyes and wild;
But never, never will she find
The little drowned child.

Individuality.

Sail on, sail on, fair cousin Cloud:
Oh, loiter hither from the sea!
Still-eyed and shadow-browed,
Steal off from yon far-dreiling crowd,
And come and hrood upon the marsh with me.
Yon laboring low horizon-smoke,
Yon stringent sail, toll not for thee
Nor me: did heaven's stroke
The whole deep with drowned commerce choke,
No pitiless tease of risk or bottomry
Would to thy rainy office close
Thy will, or lock mine eyes from tears.
Lo, Cloud, thy downward countenance stares
Blank on the blank-faced marsh, and thou
Mindest of dark affairs;
Thy substance seems a warp of cares;
Like late wounds run the wrinkles on thy brow.
Well mayst thou pause, and gloom, and stare,
A visible conscience: I arraign
Thee, criminal Cloud, of rare
Contempts on Mercy, Right, and Prayer—
Of murders, arson, thefts—of nameless stain.
(Yet, though life's logic grow as gray
As thou, my soul's not in eclipse.)
Cold Cloud, but yesterday
Thy lightning slew a child at play,
And then a priest with prayers upon his lips
For his enemies, and then a bright
Lady that did but ope the door
Upon the stormy night
To let a beggar in—strange spite!
And then thy sulky rain refused to pour,
Till thy quick torch a barn had burned,
Where twelve months' store of victual lay
A widow's sons had earned;
Which done, thy floods with winds returned—
The river raped their little herd away.

What the cloud doeth
The Lord knoweth,
The cloud knoweth not.
What the artist doeth
The Lord knoweth;
Knoweth the artist not?

Well answered! O dear artists, ye—
Whether in forms of curve or hue
Or tone your gospels be—
Say wrong This work is not of me,
But God: it is not true, it is not true.
Awful is Art because 'tis free.
The artist trembles o'er his plan,
Where men his self must see.
Who made a song or picture, he Did it, and not another, God nor man.

Oh, not as clouds dim laws have planned
To strike down Good and fight for Ill;
Oh, not as harps that stand
In the wind and sound the wind's command,
Each artist—gift of terror—owns his will.
For thee, Cloud, if thou spend thine all
Upon the South's o'er-hurrying sea
That needs thee not; or crawl
To the dry provinces, and fall
Till every convert cold shall give to thee
Green worship; if thou grow or fade,
Bring on delight or misery,
Fly east or west, be made
Snow, hail, rain, wind, grass, rose, light, shade:
What matters it to thee? There is no thee.
Pass, kinsman Cloud, now fair and mild:
Discharge the will that's not thine own.
I work in freedom wild,
But work as plays a wild child,
Sure of the Father, S-H, and Love, alone.
—Sidney Lanier in December Century.

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.

Among dinner-table novelties are to be seen smoothing-irons, trowels, dust-pans, acorns, birds, cats, dogs, and dozens of other animals, though babbly they are not all alive. Owls accommodate the guest with pepper, salt is derived from a humming-bird's open bill, a couple of oxen hold the knife and fork, and a milking-pail standing by a cow is intended for the napkin. Butter is placed in a smoothing-iron, and an angel holds a tiny shell for olives. All these things are just from Paris. There are also canary birds, cats appearing to jump out of hats, chickens, fac-similes of the Obelisk about three inches high; dogs of every description, from a poodle to a mastiff; butter-plates in the form of trowels; besides cupids, doves, monkeys, babies, and many other figures for holding the knife. For the napkins there are jaunty little crownless hats and dainty parasols, queer shaped shells, and miniature pails and jars. These articles are of silver, gold, and oxidized ware. In the salt and pepper receptacles, the silver is intended for salt, the oxidized ones for black pepper, and the gold for red pepper. For the desert comes in Cupid driving a swan of silver filled with ice cream; then an elephant with a huge acorn on his back that holds the nuts. Another new fashion is a card-receiver in the shape of an open fan on a high pedestal; also one fashioned out of a large pearl-shell, with a blue-bird holding a pencil. I see that Mrs. Langtry has started the fashion of wearing a narrow piece of ribbon around the neck, formed into a neat little bow in front. Of course, the ribbon or velvet, whichever it may be, must correspond in color with the costume of the wearer. Another fashion this professional beauty has started is the trimming of dark camel's-hair dresses with India camel's-hair borders, such as those used on India shawls. These borders are also used on morning wrappers, and make a novel and pretty border for the scarfs that are now the craze for tables, bureaus, and mantles. I saw some very pretty bracelets the other day that have just been placed on exhibition. The ornaments upon them were in quartz and oxidized work, and represented harps, fans, horse-shoes, open books, etc., the most novel being tiny frames for miniatures. Quartz and oxidized jewelry is becoming quite the rage for gentlemen, especially for scarf-pins and sleeve-buttons, and they are found in all sorts of shapes—oval, round, square, and octagon. I was told by a lady recently from the East that colored stones are becoming exceedingly fashionable, and in a lace-pin may be seen the pearl, emerald, ruby, sapphire, opal, topaz, amethyst, jasper, and the diamond. Shawl-pins are again coming into vogue, the more expensive ones being ornamented with stones, as the lace-pins. I saw a new material for dress goods the other day called "Ottoman brocade," although it has the appearance of appliqué work. One piece, which I much admired, had a ground work of a dark blue, with flowers in large designs of dark brown shades. Another piece was of bottle-green, with flowers of various shades of heliotrope. The goods were twenty-four inches in width, and marked at five dollars a yard. Ottoman reps are quite new. They come in such shades as terra-cotta, myrtle, and forest-green, electric blue and olive. An exceedingly beautiful material for cloaks and over-dresses is a fabric where the ground is of uncut plush, with raised plush flowers. It is soft, yet thick and elegant. It will undoubtedly take the lead in garments for which it is intended. There is quite a discussion among the milliners now regarding the coming fall and winter bonnets. Some ladies from the East declare that the smaller the bonnet one can find, the more in fashion they will be; while milliners just from Paris say the head-covering is to be of the largest sort of pattern. However, a week or two will decide the vexed question. A recently imported bonnet shown me was of electric-blue felt, something on the order of the poke-shape, and trimmed with velvet and feathers a shade or two darker. The rich, heavy cord that now finishes the bottoms of skirts is a pretty novelty, and give an excellent set to the skirt. When one is trimmed with a cord, it needs nothing else, and is quite devoid of plaitings, ruffles, or anything of the sort. The paniers of the body are considered quite enough of a finish. Especially tasteful are the new rugs that have recently been introduced here, particularly the Smyrna and those which are embossed. One that I saw was of a lovely shade of red, with embossed flowers of a darker shade of the same color, and cost twelve dollars. The latest fashion in rugs is to have them about one yard and a half long and only a half yard wide, giving something the appearance of a scarf. One which took my eye had a blue ground. At one end of it was a vase in terra cotta color, holding a flower of various colors, that swept off in a vine toward the farther end of the mat. These irregular designs are quite refreshing to one after having so long the stiff, set figures. A dress which I recently saw at a reception, worn by a young lady with raven black hair and large, bright blue eyes, was of black satin, long, with low neck, and had scarcely any sleeves. A garland of bright scarlet flowers fell from the shoulder across the front of the robe, and extended nearly around the train. Scarlet flowers were in the hair. Black silk hose, with scarlet satin slippers, scarlet kid gloves reaching above the elbow, and of the mousquetaire style, and a fan of black satin on one side and the other of scarlet feathers, completed this charming toilette. Valentine, says the Washington Capital, the great varnish manufacturer of New York, lives in a fine house on Fifth Avenue, and is known to be a man of many millions. How many people know that Valentine takes more interest in the Atlantic Monthly than he does in his varnish business?—that it is his money that keeps the great publishing house of Houghton, Mifflin & Co. going in Boston? In New York he is known to a few as the owner of the Christian Union newspaper, Beecher's rival to the Independent, which has prospered well since Beecher went out of it. Valentine is a good friend to many literary men, and is, of course, a man of great business capacity.

STUDIO LIFE IN PARIS.....	MUSICAL NOTES.....
THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.....	CENTURY BRICA-BRAC.....

The history of no civilized community has presented a more curious and anomalous condition of affairs than attended the adoption of the present Constitution of California—the "new" Constitution, as we are in the habit of styling it. California has had a strange history. The mode of her settlement and the character of her immigrants differed from that of any of our Western communities. She was born in the lap of wealth, with gold spoon and porringer. Not wealth for which other generations had toiled and suffered; not wealth inherited, with the axioms and admonitions of prudence; but the lucky, copious showers of gold. Our immigration was a frolic; our immigrants were in the heyday of their youth and pride of strength; they came to find wealth—not hidden under boulders requiring strength to move, nor in the deep mines to be bunted with drill and blast, but scattered in the soil—placer diggings, rich in golden dust; gold to be picked up in nuggets, washed out in pan or rocker. Not here a speck and there a minute particle, to be treasured in a quill or homœopathic vial, but gatherable everywhere, by everybody, great buckskin bags full of gold. It was splendid while it lasted. We toiled and spent, gambled and frolicked, drank and dined. We laughed at poverty, and shook our fist at misfortune. We were poor to-day, rich to-morrow, generous, reckless, and extravagant always. Our climate had contributed to the formation of a character peculiar to ourselves. There were no realities of life to the early Californian. A house was not indispensable. No winter's cold required him to save a summer's harvest, nor provide for a day when work was impossible. So we drifted along, spending as we went, jovial, light-hearted, improvident, and gay. But time brought its wrinkles to our faces, its gray hairs to our heads. The placer mines gave out, and as the miner grew old and weary, he found himself toiling to turn rivers from their beds, hunting the precious treasure under great mountains, and seeking it in the caves of deep mines. The change from mining to agriculture was attended with embarrassments. It was after the mining era that we were compelled to face the realities of our situation, and lay the foundations of our government upon a somewhat more secure basis than the lottery of mines. Families gathered around us, and we had responsibilities and duties. Old age made us conservative. We had met and conquered the embarrassments of our early settlement; we had passed through booms and reactions; had our periods of speculative frenzy, and our depressions. The war had come and its fury, and had seemingly passed us, not leaving a mark. The railroad had been built. Its value to us had been discounted, and we had survived the new distribution of industries, and again were prosperous. The great wave of hard times, that had swept the Eastern States and Europe, came to us at a late day. We had hoped to avoid it altogether, but the unfortunate incident of a dry winter in 1878-9, following an unfortunate era of stock speculations, and accompanied by an unnatural influx of Chinese laborers, precipitated upon San Francisco the double calamity of hard times and popular commotion. As Athens produced its Kleon, so San Francisco produced its Kearney. The Sand-lot had drawn together all the vicious and discontented elements of society. It was our misfortune that just at this time we had summoned a convention to revise our organic law, and a new constitution was to be created. No more serious calamity could have overtaken our State than the conjunction of the two facts—viz, the necessity of forming a constitutional convention, and the organization of a labor party, that was called into existence by hard times, a dry winter, unfortunate speculative enterprises, and a wide-spread fear and alarm at the incursion of Chinese laborers. The result of this was the selection of a most nondescript convention. The personnel of which it was composed was such as had never before been gathered together. The influences that surrounded and overshadowed its deliberations were of the most unfortunate character. Intelligent people living in well-ordered communities can not realize the fact that the city of San Francisco and other parts of the State could have chosen, as makers of our organic law, such a conglomeration of ignorance, bigotry, communism, and chivalry as was gathered together for the purpose of forming a constitution. From out the very slums of our city there came a political force that imposed upon us, as delegates to this convention, ignorant and propertyless adventurers, who made no pretension of any knowledge of law; foreigners, who had no intelligent idea of our form of government, or its mode of conduct; a Parisian barber laid down his curling tongs, a German corset-maker was called from his shop, a French cook doffed his paper cap, an Irish butcher laid off his blood-stained apron, the janitor of a gin-mill gave up his occupation of cleaning spittoons and sweeping out a bar-room; and there came a party of organized idlers, criminals, and adventurers, to give to the young, hopeful, growing State of California an organic law. At the head of this party was an adventurous Irishman. Next in authority was an ignorant shoemaker. A dirty Tombs lawyer from Nova Scotia was its brains. Germany, France, Italy, Ireland, and Scandinavia sent their worst representatives to compose a constitutional convention. In this mob there was an exceptional minority of educated, intelligent gentlemen; there was also a dangerous class of political demagogues who were willing to pander to the very worst elements that had obtained political ascendancy in our State. The result is easily imaginable—viz, an incongruous, ill-considered botch-potch of crude absurdities. At this time a strong prejudice existed against railroads because they were supposed to be owned by successful and wealthy men. This was sufficient to direct against them the efforts of all the agrarian and political adventurers of which the convention was so largely composed. The cry of "monopoly" was raised. It was then as now, here and elsewhere, in San Francisco as in ancient Rome, the appeal of the party demagogue to the lowest passions of the brutal and jealous mob. It was the sentiment of agrarian communism that would govern society, not upon the principle that elevates, and builds up, and creates, but that levels by tearing down and destroying. This time—in April, 1879—the Evening Bulletin, which had not been blameless in respect to this Sand-lot uprising, and whose partner, the Call, had been an active and criminal abettor of this revolution, said: "There never was a new constitution drafted in 'America under the circumstances which attended that proceeding in California. The convention was the outcome of a class-fight as bitter and uncompromising as ever took place in the older civilizations of Europe. This is something that never occurred before in the United States. All the other conventions that ever met were embodied according to American methods. The divisions were, for the most part on general questions of policy, finance, and administration. The California convention, the contrary, was controlled by one class by reason of its superior organization, meditating aggression upon all others. The Constitution thus drafted corresponds with the peculiar circumstances of its evolution. It is intended to cinch the industrious, prudent, and thrifty class of the community for the benefit of the idle, vicious, and reckless. The new Constitution is not only a wretched bungle and jumble, but it is wholly and absolutely un-American. It is the evidence that we have caught a foreign disease against which our political constitution was heretofore considered to be proof. The proposed new Constitution for California is the first 'real manifestation of European communism in America.' This document effected an entire change in our organic law. It made a new departure for future legislation; it created new officials, both State and municipal; new judges under a new plan of judicial organization. It changed substantially our entire political system; it disturbed from the bottom all the existing State and municipal institutions, schools, banks, industrial organizations, and insurance companies; it enacted radical laws for the control of corporations; introduced commissions and boards with unheard of and most extraordinary powers, to whom it delegated legislative, judicial, and executive power; it created new property for taxation, and a new tribunal to impose and equalize it. The country went wild over the proposition of taxing mortgages and other securities, with the insane idea of punishing the money-lenders of the town. Anti-Chinese fanatics assaulted the treaty rights of the Chinese, and endeavored to set up the laws of California as superior to the Constitution of the United States, and to relegate the treaty-making power of the President and Senate to the San Francisco Sand-lot and its brainless alien and criminal adventurers. This Constitution so hampered municipal legislation that some departments of our city government are powerless. The result of the adoption of this new Constitution, and the two years' history that led up to it, were most unfortunate for our city and injurious to the State. San Francisco suffered most, because it was the centre of all the criminal demonstrations. It was just at this time that in Germany Bismarck was in conflict with the Socialistic forces, and was exiling them by the tens of thousands to America. It was just at this time that this Socialistic mob had become a terror, and had made an armed demonstration at Chicago. It was just about this time that the political parties, and we are sorry to say, the State courts, and we are still more mortified to admit, the Supreme Court of the United States, did not display the moral courage becoming to American organizations having confidence in the strength and permanence of republican institutions. In California the Democratic party tumbled to pieces, and became the abject and cowardly slave of the Sand-lot. Its best gentlemen and most courageous and respectable voters displayed a moral cowardice from which they have not yet recovered. The city of San Francisco fell under the rule of an organization which even at this late day we find it difficult to analyze. The criminal conduct of the young, ambitious, and brilliant proprietor of the Chronicle led to his death. He was murdered by the son of the mayor whom he had helped to make. The unworthy rivalry between the Call and Chronicle, and their shameful contest to secure the patronage of the Sand-lot mob; their encouragement to the armed bands of lawless men and dirty drabs of unsexed women, who paraded our streets under the lying pretense of wanting work and lacking bread; the incendiary mob that lighted suggestive bonfires on the hills crowned with our best residences, and were harangued by a crazy fanatic, who endeavored to usurp a seat on the Supreme Bench by seizing it; our final effort with clubs to beat down this riotous uprising—all this is part of the history that led to the formation of our new Constitution. We need not more particularly advert to the calamitous results of that disastrous period: how our property depreciated more than a hundred millions of dollars in value; how many of our most wealthy citizens left our city; how money, especially our foreign funds, stole silently away; how immigration was arrested; how for years we retrograded, and how for other years we stood still. It is unnecessary to recall this dark and dismal period in our history; for, thanks to the recuperative energy and dauntless courage of our people, we have, in a measure, recovered from this blow. Confidence has been in a large measure restored. Immigration again turns toward us; the Chinese question is solved by healthful national legislation; stock-gambling has cured itself, and there is no immediate menace of a new bonanza. Kearney has subsided; Kallach is preaching; Wellock is dead. The Chronicle is no longer a political power. The Call has secured the small advertisements. The Bulletin no longer abuses the railroad corporations. The railroad issue is pronounced a sham and a fraud by the result of last election. The State progresses in wealth and population; the city is in healthful condition; money is plenty; interest is low; crops are good; the Democracy is in the ascendant; no epidemics; times are prosperous, and everybody happy, or, what is just as well, think themselves on the big way to happiness. This present condition of things is largely due to the judicial tribunals. Our Supreme Court and the Supreme Court of the United States have had the courage to so interpret some of the more uncomfortable provisions of our new Constitution, and so adapt them to existing conditions, that we have been less inconvenienced than at one time we supposed we would have been. Under this state of affairs, confidence, which is a plant of slow growth, is coming back to us. The attack upon the treaty rights of the Chinese found in Article XIX of the State Constitution, which undertook to give power to the State to exclude the Chinese, to prevent municipal and other corporations from employing Chinese labor, and to regulate the commercial intercourse between the United States and China, has been declared to be inoperative and void, and gives to the Chinese equal rights under the law, and invokes for them the protection of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. Section 9 of Article XIII of the State Constitution created a State Board of Equalization, and gave it power to raise or lower the values of property. Acting under this supposed authority of law, three political and party commissioners served notice upon hundreds of citizens of California to appear at Sacramento, to show cause why assessments made by the local assessors should not be raised. When the territorial extent of our State is considered, the number of rich men and corporations in it who might be bled, and the personal character of the partisans who had secured the opportunity to exercise this power of equalization, is estimated, some idea may be conceived of the extent of alarm experienced by those who had something to tax—something to equalize. The Supreme Court of California, in the case of Wells, Fargo & Co. against the Board of Equalization, (56 Cal. Reports, page 196,) relieved us of this terror. In this case the Court decided "that the State Board had not the power to increase or lower any individual assessments," and Mr. Justice Thornton suggests the embarrassment that might attend the execution of this law, if the State Board could demand the presence of property-owners living at points most remote from the capital, to attend in person the equalization of their taxes. It would have clothed this board with power, and have been the cause of unending cost and vexation, if property-owners could thus have been summoned from the remote portions of our State to show cause why the assessment made by the local assessor should not be increased. A property-owner of dull imagination may be able to speculate upon the consequences of the continued existence of such a law under the manipulation of political machines, guided by political bosses in the interest of a party that draws its inspiration from the Sand-lot, and under the control of men who lack the moral courage of honest leadership. The word "equalization" expresses most distinctly the relation that the party official would hold toward the man or corporation that had property to tax. The framers of the new Constitution inserted a provision in this remarkable instrument which was intended to tax all the property of corporations, and in addition thereto the value of all stock to the stockholders in the corporation, thereby subjecting the same property to double taxation. This absurd and unjust proviso would have absolutely prevented the formation or existence of any manufacturing or industrial corporations. It would have driven out existing corporations, and would have closed all the larger and more important manufacturing, commercial, and mechanical enterprises. When this question was presented to the Supreme Court, it was held that it would be assessing the same property twice to assess to a corporation all its corporate property, and also to assess to each of the stockholders the shares held by him; and thus this mischievous provision was so interpreted that the evil was avoided. This decision was rendered by Mr. Justice Ross, and concurred in by all the judges except Mr. Chief Justice Morrison, who expressed no opinion. (California Reports, vol. 57, page 594.) In the Montgomery Avenue case, Mulligan against Smith, decided at the April term, 1881, by our Supreme Court, it was held that no one could be taxed unless the law under which the tax was laid and the assessment made provided some notice to the person to be affected by the assessment. By the terms of Section 10 of Article XIII of the new Constitution, providing for the assessment of railroad property—viz., that "franchise, road-way, road-bed, rails, and rolling-stock of all 'railroads operated in more than one county of this State, 'should be assessed by the State Board of Equalization,' etc., there was no provision for any notice to the railroad companies. It was decided by the court, McKinstry, Justice, in the case of San Francisco against the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, (vol. 8, Law Journal, page 1061,) that the section was self-executing; in other words, that the aid of a statute was not necessary to enable the Board to act, and needed no legislation to carry it into effect. It does not provide notice, and, therefore, when the San Mateo County case, decided by Judges Field and Sawyer, came before the United States Courts, they being bound by these State decisions and the State courts, and the State courts having decided that the law itself must provide for notice, and that Section 10 was self-executing, the whole system had to fall. This decision was rendered by Judges Field and Sawyer at the last sitting in San Francisco. The case is now on appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and has been advanced for hearing at the present term of the court. We can not be presumptuous enough to advise this august tribunal as to any case pending before it, but we may be permitted to suggest to it how important we regard this and other cases involving the consideration of kindred questions to the prosperity, progress, and welfare of our State. The decision rendered herein is acquiesced in by all our people. The press with unanimity accept it as the law, and as a solution of one of our vexed problems. We are beginning to see the end of our difficulties. We are getting back to our normal condition. The angry and passionate era has passed, leaving but the scars of this organic law. The new Constitution, generously interpreted by our courts, has been brought into working harmony with our institutions. Codes, both State and municipal, have been enacted to comply with it. The unreasonable communistic and agrarian sentiments, so rife among us five years ago, have passed away. The prejudice against corporations, wealth, and large land-owners has assumed more reasonable shape. Our insane speculations in mining stocks have ceased. The Chinese question, under the new law of Congress limiting the immigration, is working satisfactorily, and California is on the high road to a legitimate and healthful progress. We hope it is not unbecoming that we should express the earnest wish to the Supreme Court of the United States and to our State courts, that they may consider our history, the troubles we have endured, and the perils we have passed in the social and political upheaval that we have experienced in the past five years, and, if the law is not altogether inflexible, that it may be so interpreted as to work in harmony with our present prosperity, and in relief of the embarrassments of an organic law passed by the reckless, ignorant, and vicious class, under the leadership of impetuous and ambitious demagogues, who had nothing to lose and everything to gain by subjecting society and property to the hazards of such an experiment.

If we understand the Record-Union, it desires to establish high schools to be maintained at public expense in sufficient numbers to have one within the reach of all children. This would be a costly venture, as it would require some hundreds in the State. We do not profess to be in favor of educating the children of the poor in the higher branches of education at the expense of the rich, and we are opposed to educating the children of the rich at anybody's expense but their own. It strikes us that there is a vast deal of absurd sentimentality expended over the question of education. If a man is too poor to give his children food and clothing, those children must be fed and clothed at the expense of the public until they are old enough to provide these necessities for themselves; if a man is too poor to send his children to school, we would provide them with a training in the rudimentary branches of an English education. If a man is able to feed and clothe his own children and neglects it, we would compel him to do it at his own expense; if a man is able to educate his children, we would compel him to do it at his own expense. We would demand only plain common clothes and healthy food; we would demand only the elements of an English education. If parents, rich or poor, desired to give their children a high school or university education, we would let them pay for it or go without it, upon the same principle that we would refuse to furnish champagne, French dinners, velvet frocks, and ten-button kid gloves. We would abolish the university as an eleemosynary educational institution, and compel the students to pay for their education, reserving certain scholarships as a reward to the deserving, toiling, and ambitious poor student. As education is not more indispensable than food and clothing, we recognize no higher obligation to supply the one than the other. The man who has the means to supply his own children with all these things, including education, has no right to them unless he pays for them. If, having the means, he refuses, he should be compelled by law. Mr. William H. Mills of the Record-Union is a man of independent means. Having deliberately assumed the responsibility of getting children, we see no reason why we should be compelled to contribute to their education, any more than for their food, clothing, medicine, and medical attendance when sick. If Mr. Mills were a poor man, and had been improvident enough to get children whom he could not support or educate, we would contribute. We would buy for the girls flannel frocks and poke bonnets; for the boys, blue jeans overalls and stogy boots. We would help furnish cornmeal, beans, and cuts from between the horns for soup. They should be instructed in reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic up to and including vulgar fractions, and only this till they were old enough to work; there we would shut up our purse-strings, and let Mr. Mills's children scratch for better grub and better education. If there is anything in them, they will from this start get just as high up the ladder as it would be safe for them to climb.

The Freeholders' Convention, now engaged in the making of a municipal charter, is charged with an important duty. It is composed of intelligent and worthy men, each in his line having a large experience to qualify him in the discharge of this duty. We have a right to expect an almost perfect instrument, and one that will meet the approval of all classes of citizens and men of all shades of political opinions. We hope and we believe that there will be no display of demagogism. We are well assured that popularity will be best earned by intelligent and honest work. We beg these gentlemen not to shrink from, or attempt to shirk, any responsibility that the making of a good charter will demand. Especially do we hope that the civil service doctrine may be engrafted upon it, so that there may be permanence to those in subordinate positions. Especially do we hope that just as many officers as possible may be withdrawn from the political scramble, and just as many appointments as possible be given to the Mayor. Let the Mayor be charged with official appointments, and be held to the responsibility of securing good men. If the Mayor had the appointment of every official in our municipal government, except the Board of Supervisors and the Board of Education, and if those appointments were to be confirmed by the Supervisors, we have no doubt it would give us a better and more economical government than we have hitherto enjoyed. We believe in devolving responsibility upon the executive chief, and holding him responsible therefor. This is in keeping with our Federal system; it is analogous to the English system, and, if applied to the municipal government of San Francisco, would, in our judgment, be a great improvement upon our present system.

The Democratic State Central Committee can not do the honest politics of the country a better service than to expose and punish any Republican boss who at Mare Island or elsewhere has been intimidating voters. Mare Island politics, under Republican management, has been a shame and reproach to the country. It has been the centre for the operation of ring-thieves for twenty years. Its infamy culminated at the time of the tape-worm ticket, when Sargent managed affairs at Washington, when Robeson was Secretary of the Navy, when George M. Pinney was paymaster, when Montague was contractor, when Bill Carr was general fogleman, when Tom Rodgers furnished supplies, when Davis inspected lumber, and when every party loafer felt that he had a right to steal something from the Navy Yard at Mare Island, or to loaf in its employ. One bat-eyed old commodore after another has succeeded, till the whole business has become a stench in the nostrils of honest men and a reproach to every Republican who has not participated either in the stealings or social enjoyments of Mare Island. Enough money has been squandered there to build a fleet. A Democratic Presidential term would not be without its compensations if it should sweep the waters of reform through this particularly nasty stable at Mare Island.

Already the Democratic bosses are in deep and anxious doubt whether the election of Stoneman and Bartlett is not a mistake. General Stoneman will pay no more attention to the Irish machine party bosses in San Francisco than as though such vermin did not exist. General Stoneman is a gentleman and soldier, and he will have no regard for the working ward partisans of this city. They opposed his nomination. They did not aid his election, except by their votes, and they would have voted for a mule if it had been the party candidate. He knows them to be worthless as a class, personally dishonest, and politically unreliable. Washington Bartlett, as mayor, will have but little power and no inclination to serve the machine. He will endeavor to make an honest administration, and he recognizes the impossibility of doing so if he brings this vile element around him. Holtz has already quarreled with the bosses, and asserted his determination to make his own appointments, and be responsible for the workings of his office. Several others of the city officers elect have done the same thing.

"The Hamiltonian Church, Oakland!" What is the Hamiltonian Church? We have a general knowledge of the Church of Christ, and of the religions of Mohammed and Buddha. We know about the Roman Catholic, the Episcopalian, the Methodist, Baptist, and other churches; the Church of the Latter Day Saints, and "the little church around the corner;" the Early Primitive Church, and the Jewish Church. All these are familiar terms. But of the "Hamiltonian" Church we find no account in the writings of the fathers. There is no mention of it in either sacred or profane history. We do not find it alluded to in the Scriptures—old or new. If some one who is conversant with the rise, progress, and development of this "new" church will inform us what a "Hamiltonian" church is, we shall be pleased to become the medium of communicating its interesting history to the world. Last Sunday Mr. Levy preached in it.

The lager-beer Dutch are in a quandary. Hops have gone up. Camomile flowers, calumba root, and aloes have also advanced in price. The cost of lager increases, while its quality deteriorates. There is trouble in the ranks of the League of Freedom. The German mind is anxious. The German stomach is disturbed. The Republican Congress should seize the opportunity to recapture the German vote, by legislating for "free hops" and generous subsidies to breweries. Let the next Presidential election turn upon the question of cheap beer. A commission will undoubtedly be created at Sacramento this winter to "fix" the price of beer and regulate the size of "schooners." This is becoming a national question. Let Buhlert and Asmusen step to the front.

A strong force of laborers is now employed upon the Donahue road, from San Rafael to Point Tibarron. This road, when completed, will be the shortest and most direct between San Francisco and San Rafael, and will open up a new country. Villa residences will grow up along the line. We are pained, however, to observe that our friend Peter employs the "heathen Chinese." It was formerly his boast that all his railway work had been done by his Irish fellow-countrymen, and yet we ought to be pleased that the race prejudice between these immigrants is rapidly disappearing.

THE CLUBS OF LONDON.

Their Numbers, their Popularity, and Some of their Customs.

The autumn session of Parliament is now in full swing, and for the next six or seven weeks London will be as full of fashionable people as the counter attraction of fox-hunting, which either keeps men altogether in the country during November or draws them thither two or three days a week, will let it. There is no better indication of an influx of "our best society" in the metropolis than the fullness of the clubs; just as their emptiness is a certain sign of the departure from town of the swells whose presence and entertainments make the summer season what it is year after year. The clubs of London are an institution in themselves, and their influence—politically and socially—is a power in the land. Every man in England who considers himself anybody, or wishes to be thought so by others, belongs to a London club; and not only to one, but to as many as he can.

The Prince of Wales sets a good example in this respect, as he is a member of no less than seven clubs—to wit, the United Service, Travelers', White's, Army and Navy, Guards', Junior Naval and Military, and Marlborough. Of course, he could belong to every club in London if he liked, for his name in the list is considered a high honor; but he has to stop somewhere. There are, however, clubs whose prestige and reputation are sufficiently established to do without royal patronage. There are about ninety clubs in London—clubs of all sorts they are, from political and literary to racquet and chess clubs. Of this number, the leading clubs, par excellence, are the United Service, the Army and Navy, Arthur's, Boodle's, Brook's, White's, the Travelers', the Carlton, the Reform, the Conservative, the Guards', the Junior Carlton, the Athenæum, and the Marlborough. The "U. S.," as the United Service is commonly called, the Army and Navy, (famously known as "the Rag"), and the Guards', are the chief military and naval clubs. The membership of the U. S. is limited to senior officers of both services, while the Army and Navy admits junior officers as well, though a junior officer, to get in, would have to have his name on the club-books from the date of his birth; otherwise he would be a senior before a vacancy occurred and his name could come up for ballot.

This, indeed, is the case in most of the favorite and old-established fashionable clubs, where, without exception, the number of members being limited, it is by no means an uncommon thing for a man to have had his name on the books previous to election for fifteen or twenty years, and sometimes longer than that. The membership of the Guards' Club is confined to officers of the three regiments of foot guards, the Grenadiers, Scots, and Coldstreams. Boodle's, Brook's, and White's, with Arthur's, are the most aristocratic, exclusive, and longest established social clubs. White's is the oldest club in London, having been founded in 1730, though the other three all date from years in the last century, before which they were well known and fashionably frequented coffee-houses, retaining still, as clubs, the names they were then known by. Boodle's, Brook's, and White's are proprietary clubs; but, with a few exceptions, the rule is the other way in London clubs, the club building being owned or leased by the members, and the club affairs managed by a committee and secretary. The Travelers' Club limits its members to those who have traveled in a straight line from London at least five hundred miles. In these days of wandering and exploring this limit of distance seems absurdly small. But having traveled half a thousand miles from home is not the only credential required, though it be a sine qua non of eligibility; for the Travelers' is unquestionably the most exclusive and difficult to get into of any club in London. This may be, in a great measure, owing to the fact that it has but seven hundred and fifty members, and four times that number of Englishmen who could fill the bill in every other respect, go abroad every year considerably beyond the requisite goal. Among the members of the Travelers' are the dukes of Aberdeen, Argyll, Buccleuch, Edinburgh, Cambridge, Bedford, Westminster, Northumberland, and Sutherland, the Marquis of Hartington, Lord Dufferin, and Lord Kimberley. It is the only club that the Duke of Sutherland belongs to.

Among political clubs the Carlton is the leading conservative club, just as the Reform is the leading liberal club. Lord Salisbury, the late Lord Chancellor Cairns, Lord Derby, and Sir Stafford Northcote are among the most prominent members of the Carlton, while the Reform may boast of Gladstone, the Dukes of Bedford and Westminster, Lord Hartington, Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, and Sir Sidney Waterlow. The Junior Carlton was established in 1864, to ease the senior concern, of which it is virtually an offshoot, its members being generally the sons of members of the senior club. Both club-houses stand nearly facing each other, on opposite sides of Pall Mall, so that the elder establishment keeps a fatherly eye over its youthful scions. The Athenæum is the leading scientific and literary club, and within its portals men of every political complexion and bias meet and harmonize in behalf of the two great causes of the club's formation. Here may Lord Salisbury be found after a hard debate in the Lords, calmly discussing with Lord Kimberley the true authorship of Shakespeare's plays; or Gladstone and Sir Stafford Northcote, fresh from a bout in the Commons, be detected in earnest converse together over the probability of the comet's collision with the sun. The Marlborough, though a young club—it having been in existence but a little over twelve years—must, by force of its royal patronage, be classed as a leading club. It is social in its character, and is, in fact, the Prince of Wales's own club, its members including, for the greater part, the men who form the male portion of that none-too-select coterie known as the Prince's set. A few military and naval celebrities are scattered through them, to give the club the requisite ballast. Here may be encountered of an afternoon, or late into the small hours of the morning, people ranging downward from the Prince himself, his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh, the Marquis of Londonderry, and Sir Garnet Wolseley, to Lord Beaumont, Lord Charles Beresford, Sir Charles Forbes, and Captain Shaw, the Chief of the London Fire Brigade.

With the foregoing, as foremost clubs, might perhaps be added the Savage and the Garrick—the former being a great art, as well as literary, dramatic, and scientific club; and the Garrick the principal theatrical club, which can boast of Henry Irving and Toole as its brightest lights. The Duke of Beaufort is a member of the Garrick, his taste for dramatic art exhibiting itself more in his admiration for Nelly Farren and the other Gaiety enslavers than in any other way, however. But I am speaking more particularly of fashionable clubs, which are thronged with members when the season is on and Parliament in session, but are otherwise empty; not of those which seldom vary in their attendance of members from one year's end to another. Else, what with the Alpine, devoted to mountain climbing; the Road, in which coaching is a distinctive feature; the St. James, strictly diplomatic; the Turf, whose members are sporting men; the Universities' and the Public-School Clubs, there would be no end to it. Pall Mall and St. James Street are the two thoroughfares of the West End chiefly devoted to clubs. Pall Mall has no less than fourteen club-houses in it, and St. James Street nine. Piccadilly, too, is sprinkled here and there with them. The "U. S.," Reform, Carlton, Junior Carlton, Athenæum, Travelers', Guards', and Marlborough are all in Pall Mall; St. James Street claiming Arthur's, Boodle's, Brook's, and White's, with the Conservative, Devonshire, Eton and Harrow, and others. They are, in the main, elegant and imposing structures, commodious inside, and furnished more with a view to luxurious ease and comfort than an ostentatious display of gilding and fresco, though by no means are they wanting in the decoration of art kept within the bounds prescribed by refined and cultured taste.

London club subscriptions generally run high. The United Service, Army and Navy, and Travelers' have the highest entrance fee—viz., forty guineas, the annual dues ranging from seven to ten guineas. The entrance fees to the other leading clubs vary from fifteen to thirty guineas, and the dues from eight to ten guineas per annum. The rules governing the clubs are very strict, and, to all appearance, observed to a nicety. To an American, accustomed to the delightful good fellowship among members and freedom from restraint for which the clubs of New York and other American cities are renowned the world over, there is a chill about a London club—so many have told me—that time can not wait. To him members appear to talk in whispers, others sit apart, or walk about by themselves, seemingly unknowing and unknown, while over all there is an atmosphere of almost total silence and absence of sound that is painful. But whatever its destructiveness to the encouragement of bonhomie, individual self-assertion in any shape is never tolerated in a London club—such as I speak of, at all events—and that's where it all is. Members are kept in check from the moment the door is entered. Hats are taken off directly one leaves the entrance hall, sticks and umbrellas must be left in the care of the hall-porter, and the lighting or smoking of a pipe, cigar, or cigarette elsewhere than in the smoking-room would be regarded as a misdemeanor punishable almost by expulsion. Yet among no people are clubs such favorite resorts, so popular, or so prosperous as among Englishmen. None of the leading clubs admit strangers as visiting members. Sometimes when one club is undergoing renovation or repair, another club will tender the use of its house to the temporarily unhoused members, but in no other case is a stranger given the right of a member. At a few of the clubs, among them the Army and Navy, a member can ask a friend to dine or breakfast with him. But he must take him to the "strangers' dining-room, an apartment separate from the members' dining-room, and dine or breakfast with him there. Afterward, should the guest wish to smoke, the member must retire with him to the "strangers' smoking-room and there indulge in the weed, post matutinal or post prandial, as the case may be. This is doing far more for the stranger than some other clubs, the United Service and Junior Carlton, for example, which have but a "strangers' room in which, only, is a member permitted to see and talk to any friend who may call upon him.

On first thoughts these strict regulations seem strained, without apparent cause, to the verge of downright inhospitality. But a moment's reflection must satisfy one, as all old club-men too well know, how necessary it is to preserve the uses of the club for the men who support it, and that lax rules in this respect would be but for the benefit of the worthless and adventurous, who, under the guise of acquaintance with members, would frequent and throng the clubs, and by their presence deprive the members themselves of the very comforts their club was intended to supply them with. Any man of any pretension in London belongs to some club, and he can not therefore need the use of another man's. If he has proper feeling he will not want to intrude himself. It is a pity that there is not some exception made in favor of foreigners who are temporarily in London, for against their honorary admittance as members while in England the same reasons for the rule can not be urged. But the custom is, like many other things in England, too firmly established not to have any suggested alteration or innovation in respect to it regarded with suspicion and disfavor. There is one club, however, which admits its members' friends who do not live in England to honorary membership for three months, without ballot, on being simply proposed and seconded. This is the Raleigh Club in Regent Street.

Though not strictly a leading club, the Raleigh is fashionable enough, and is, in its way, one of the most aristocratic clubs in London, having among its members no end of swells, and possessing a chef for a cook. It is, in club parlance, a "pot-house" club. That is to say, its dining-room and cellars are kept open all night, and there is more latitude allowable than at other clubs in many ways. Therefore, men who belong to other clubs for respectability join the Raleigh for convenience and fun. That there is plenty of the latter to be had at the Marlborough there can be no doubt, if all one hears is true. But, jolly and familiar as the Prince of Wales is pleased to make himself with his immediate friends, the constant presence at the club of himself or some one of his suite, can not have other than a dampening effect upon the otherwise unrestrained spirits of those who are not of his set. I don't include gambling with fun, though there are few of the swell clubs in London at which there is not enough and to spare of it from three o'clock in the afternoon till well into the next morning. Whist, baccarat, and, lately, poker, are the games. Stakes unlimited.

LITERARY NOTES.

Miss Fannie B. Irving, the author of "Six Girls," is now dead. Her book evinces that, had she lived, some very good work would have been given to the world. The story is a breezy and pleasant description of the every-day life of some charming maidens. There are numerous illustrations, and all are well executed. Published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; for sale by the booksellers; price, $1.50.

"Christmas Rhymes and New Year's Chimes" is a charming book of jingles for the little ones, by Mary D. Brine. It is beautifully illustrated by well-known artists, and although the verses are by no means of a light order of merit in either material or metre, the volume will give pleasure to the young readers for whom it is intended. Published by G. W. Harlan, New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

A Philadelphia publishing house has for some time been translating Emile Zola's works. The last volume which has been issued is "Claude's Confession," translated by G. D. Cox. It is supposed to deal with several incidents in Zola's own life, and is written with the author's usual fidelity of description. The translation is a little better than usual. Published by Peterson & Bros., Philadelphia; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.; price 75 cents.

"Elfin-land" is a Christmas book for children. It consists of a number of illustrated poems. The verses are written by Josephine Polard, while the pictures are designed by Walter Saterlee. The volume is very showy, the cover somewhat resembling an aurora borealis. The illustrations are what might be termed gaudy, although in several instances they are very effective. Published by G. W. Harlan & Co., New York; for sale by Billings, Harbourn & Co.

"The Young People of Shakespeare's Dramas" consists of selections taken from the plays of "King John," "Henry VI.," "Richard III.," "Coriolanus," "Cymbeline," "King Lear," and "Winter's Tale," which deal with youths and maidens. Comments and explanations are inserted when needed, and the whole is intended as a sort of study for youthful readers. Prepared by Amelia E. Barr. Published by D. Appleton & Co., New York; for sale by James White & Co., 23 Dupont Street.

"The Harmony of the Bible with Science" is an endeavor on the part of Samuel Kinns, Ph. D., member of numerous royal associations in Great Britain, to prove what has been frequently attempted with greater or less success. It is profusely and excellently illustrated, and is very entertaining and ingenious in many portions. The author has, however, brought forward many seemingly absurd theories, and his reconciliation of Holy Writ with Nature's book is frequently absurd. His opinions are assented to, however, by a dozen columns of subscribers—from the Lord Bishop of London down to Mr. Alderman Figgins; while at the end of this pretentious work appears a list of all the faithful among the scientists who have "declared that it is impossible for the word of God in the book of nature and the word of God in Holy Scripture to contradict one another." It consists of twenty pages of names, in which are included almost all the English, Scotch, and Irish doctors, known and unknown, in the United Kingdom, from Bighy down to Tripe. There is a significance, however, in the fact that the names of such men as Balfour Stewart, Huxley, Tyndall, Herth Spencer, Sir John Lubbock, and Spottiswoode are absent from the list. They were, it seems, too full of prejudices to be written down in this new book of saints. Published by Cassel, Petter, Galpin & Co., London and New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

Announcements: Alexander Dumas is writing a book on the science of chirography, in which he is an ardent believer. Miss Rose Kingsley, daughter of the late Charles Kingsley, will contribute several articles to Wide Awake during the coming year. An especially interesting one is entitled "Our Dogs at Eversley." Another is on the "Washingtons in England." The publication this winter of the third edition of "Poole's Index to Periodical Literature" will supply a striking proof of the value of coöperative labor when well directed. The contents of more than two hundred periodicals, beginning with the Academy and ending with the Zotst, are included in the undertaking, and the work has been done voluntarily by literary students in England and America. Nearly five thousand volumes have been indexed, and the number of slips which required sorting and arranging exceeded two hundred thousand. We learn from Mr. Stockton, says the Critic, that Pomona, during her brief stay in London, has been "alive with emotion." She has leaned on the tomb of Edward the Confessor, and been nearly stifled with the gas of the Underground Railway. She has also become familiar with chimney-pots, and has taken to drinking ale—unless, indeed, she has tired of England, and gone with her historian to France. The scene of Mr. Tennyson's new village tragedy, "The Promise of May," is laid in a Lincolnshire village, and the heroines are two sisters, Dora and Eva Steer. Cassel, Petter, Galpin & Co., New York, have in press for immediate publication, "Evangeline, the Place, the Story, and the Poem," by Professor Noah Porter, President of Yale College, to be issued in a large folio volume, limited to five hundred copies, numbered and signed by Professor Porter, containing nineteen original illustrations by Frank Dicksee, A. R. A., fifteen of which are elegantly reproduced in photogravure by Messrs. Goupil & Co., of Paris, and four are proof impressions on India paper from the original blocks, beautifully illustrating Longfellow's poem of "Evangeline." James T. White & Co., No. 23 Dupont Street, have had made especially for them, by Eastern houses, some Christmas cards that are quite original in their way. They consist of delicately shaded hinged slabs, between which are included old English Christmas poems. Some of the designs are very elegant.

Miscellany: Mr. Whittier says in regard to a vexed question that the family whose name suggested the title of "Maud Muller" pronounced the word "Muller." They were Hessians. F. Anstey's "Vice Versa; or a Lesson to Fathers," has gone into an eleventh edition in London. This lively bit of extravagance is one of the chief literary successes of the season there. The author is a young man of about five-and-twenty. "F. Anstey" is a nom de plume. His real name is Guthrie. Mr. Howells has changed the title of his forthcoming novel; it is to be "A Woman's Reason," instead of "A Sea Change"—again a Shakespearean title, as the readers of the "Two Gentlemen of Verona" will remember. Julia asks Lucetta: "Your reason?" "I have no other than a woman's reason; I think him so because I think him so." Mr. Trollope's new serial novel, "Land-leaguers," is to appear in Our Continent simultaneously with its publication in London. Mr. Trollope spent most of the summer in Ireland, preparing material for this novel. It is not impossible that that pleasant fellow, Phineas Finn, will make his reappearance again. The most important bit of "literary gossip" in the last number of The Athenæum is the statement that Mr. John Morley has "abandoned the idea of bringing out a new magazine." Johann Arany, the author of some of the finest ballads and epic poems in the Hungarian language, is dead. One above all of them, "The Love of Toldi," a legendary hero of herculean strength, may be placed, says the London Times, side by side with the best of what has been written of the kind in any language. No man probably ever was more completely master of his own language and its genius. Thus some of his Shakespearean translations come probably nearer to the original than others in any language, and have become favorites on the stage. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" always attracts crowds, and the effect of its humor tells as much on the Hungarian as it does on an English audience. In Macdise's well-known Fraser's portrait gallery is a group of the popular lady authors of the day. They were sitting around a table—Mrs. Norton, L. E. L., Miss Porter, and Lady Morgan—while between Mrs. Hall and Harriet Martineau appears one of the best known, who is described by Maginn: "And last, the jolliest of them all, soft-seated on a well-filled cushion, her coffee sips, by Mrs. Hall, dear dear Mitford (Mary Russell)!" "Regina's Maids of Honor" is the title of the engraving, "Regina" being the pet name of the defunct magazine.

ONLY $8. OUR NEW AMERICAN LEVER WATCH!

After months of labor and experiment, we have at last brought to perfection A NEW WATCH. It is a Key Winding Watch with the celebrated Anchor Lever Movement, Expansion Balance, Fully Jeweled.
They are made of the best material, and in the very best manner, so as to "measure" and time-keeping qualities. The Cases are made of our Celebrated Composition metal known as Aluminum Gold. This metal has a sufficient amount of gold in the composition to give the watch a genuine gold appearance. Indeed it cannot be told from a genuine Gold Watch except by the best judges as the metal stands the acid test as well as pure gold. The cases are finely engraved or engine turned and are massive and strong and very handsome making it just the watch for Railroad men, Mechanics and all laboring men who require a good strong watch and an accurate timekeeper. For trading and speculative purposes, it is superior to any watch ever before offered. The can be sold readily for $15 to $20 each, and traded so as to realize double those amounts. Farmers as well as Agents can handle these watches to advantage as they can be readily exchanged for stock or goods. We send the watch free by registered mail, on receipt of $8.00. Or we will send it C. O. D. on receipt of $1.00 on a count; the balance can be paid at the express office. We also have very fine Aluminum Gold Chains at $1.00 each. Beautiful Medallion Charms 50 cents. We have hundreds of testimonials, but have room for only two.

It is seldom that we meet with an article that so fully corresponds with its advertised good qualities as does the New American Lever Watch. It has the advantage of being made of that precious metal Aluminum Gold; its works are of the best make, and the general style of the case rank it with the best Watches made anywhere. We recommend it to our readers as a Watch that will give entire satisfaction.

D. S. BROWN & CO., No. 36 California Street
Sole Agents for Pacific Coast.

In all the annals of the drama there is but one prologue which justifies its own existence, and that only by reason of its unexampled brevity. It runs:

"For us and for our tragedy,
Here, stooping to your clemency,
We ask your hearing patiently."

Shakespeare may be forgiven this miniature prologue to a miniature play, but a lesser man, never. And take warning by him, O dramatists of the day! Reveal no more in your prologues than he does in his, and your audiences will not only have a better opinion of your plays, but a better opinion of themselves, as well. One likes to have one's intelligence taxed a little, and if the heart of a mystery be plucked out and laid bare in a prologue, how is one ever to harrow up one's emotions when the play comes on? The first two acts of "My Geraldine" do not claim to be a prologue, but they are in effect nothing more. What are they all about? Who can tell? I consulted my play-bills as the different people came on, but though they were painfully explicit, I gathered nothing. Squire Arden, who is described vaguely as a "man who repents," is apparently just launching forth upon a career of crime. A majestic butler, with a fine vocabulary and very marked literary tastes, does nothing in particular. A comfortably arrayed housekeeper, with a large stock of property aspirates, very inartistically employed, accomplishes the same feat. The pretty but singularly inefficient soubrette of the company is vaguely described as a colleen, and remains one throughout seventeen long years. Phil Carroll (a man of iron) takes his apparently eering daughter kindly to his heart, takes her daughter willingly to be equally agreeable to a long extension of lineal descendants. Mary Carroll, the silent woman, goes about telling all she knows in emotional bursts at brief intervals. Geraldine is simply put down as a "deedish," a word with which no one quarrels, because no one knows what it means. "What in the world is it all about?" cried an interested young woman; "years are elapsing, according to my programme, and nothing is happening." "Oh, yes," said another, "that small child, who has just been whirled off in a gale of emotion, is being educated in France. These things take time, and perhaps the dramatist will allow Miss Cayvan to come on in the third act, at least. He has kept her off about as long as is warrantable or endurable." And sure enough she did come at last, and a very pretty little French girl she looked, to be sure; very like one just stepped out of one of Julia Kavanagh's novels. She has sent whole detachments of Irish maidens to France to be educated, and a most charming combination they turn out to be. Miss Georgia Cayvan had a soupçon of accent the first few moments, but it disappeared utterly under her fast-accumulating troubles. The Silent Woman, in the absence of her child, has determined not to reveal herself to the girl as her mother, and very considerably forbears for a time, but eventually reveals herself twice within twenty minutes. First, as a sort of flyer, she proposes to be her mother in posse, and ends with a tremendous emotional declaration that she is her mother in esse.

All these little preliminaries being decided, the curtain goes up on the fourth act, and the play begins. Geraldine, having been told by the villain that the Silent Woman is her mother under rather discreditable circumstances, immediately flies. Heroines always fly upon the heels of uncomfortable information. It never occurs to them to remain and face the music. It is the invariable custom of the species, and not one of them ever breaks through the traditions. Generally they go out into the midnight and the storm, in white gauze or pink tissue, but Geraldine makes a new departure; for some one, looking for her among the rocks of Craga Dhoul, finds a trace of her—a small sealskin saccage; at least such it appears to be from the front. Yet it staggers one a little to think of a sealskin in an Irish drama. I heard a prosperous citizen in a furrier's, the other day, say that he had been tossing half dollars to see whether he would buy his wife a homestead or a sealskin saccage, and, to his consternation, he had drawn the sealskin every time. His distress gave additional importance to the sealskin in the play. Besides, Miss Louise Sylvester gave quite a thrilling piece of acting over this little trace of the lost girl—perhaps the only acting in the play; for although they are a rather clever company, there is so little in "My Geraldine" to act about that everything seemed to be absurdly tense over nothing.

That extraordinary individual, Larry Loane, set down in the bills as having "the soul of a woman, the heart of a poet, and the form of a satyr," wandered about for some time without any ostensible reason, but eventually developed into the tool of the villain. It transpires that he has locked the lost girl up in the ruins of Gray Nun Abbey, and has there attempted her murder; but has not succeeded because it would abruptly end the scenic effects. So the villain, in disgust, determines to do the murder himself. And they roar their conspiracy at the tops of their voices—as stage villains always do—and the eavesdropping hero overhears it all—as eavesdroppers always do. He indignantly seizes the poet-souled, woman-hearted, satyr-formed Larry, drags him to the very top of Craga Dhoul, and they both go over the cliff together. Out of the play they would both be as dead as berrings; but when the enthusiastic Maurice reappears a moment later, disguised in the habiliments of Larry, the unsurprised villain simply bids him lead the way to the abbey, without seeing through a most transparent masquerade.

Arrived at the abbey, Miss Georgia Cayvan is discovered in a sweep of classical white drapery edged with swansdown, which she may have found awaiting her among the ivies, and, as there is nothing else to do, she looks terrified with her whole stock of emotions, and throws in some very pretty attitudes. The three parties play at hide-and-seek till the audience have properly digested the scenery, when the villain takes off his coat and prepares to remove Geraldine with a case-knife. Then ensues quite a neat case of collar-and-elbow wrestling, in which, through several rounds, the frail young girl comes off triumphant. But the villain is at last about to succeed in his fell design—villains' designs are always fell—when her lover bounds upon the scene, and rescues her.

But why the villain, who appears to be only a bailiff, should wish to murder her, does not transpire. In point of fact, nothing transpires. The first acts are dull and meaningless, the last acts eventful and meaningless. There is really no rational excuse for anything in the play except that they are in Ireland, and nothing Irish in the play but the brogue, and not enough of that to go round once.

It can not be called a picture of Irish life, for it differs in no whit from life in any English-speaking country. Indeed the Carroll cottage looks vastly more like a New England kitchen than an Irish farmhouse, and Louise Sylvester fits appositely into its contrary atmosphere. In short, "My Geraldine" is a trivial play, bristling with absurdities rather than broad faults, and with scarce enough material in it to uphold the scenery. It will be superseded on Monday by "Siberia," upon which much lavish preparation has been expended, and in which we are promised a revival of the ballet, which was fast threatening to become historical in San Francisco.

German art came into fashion with the Geistering season last year, and there has been a very liberal American sprinkling in the German theatre ever since, so that when Elmenreich came to town it seemed quite natural, and as it should be, that she should give performances in mid-week. From "Marie Stuart" to "Jane Eyre," is a wide leap; but versatility seems to be one of the characteristics of the German artists. Popular a novel as "Jane Eyre" has been ever since it founded a school, and teeming as it is with dramatic elements, it is strange that it is rarely well adapted for the stage; and quite as strange that the part attracts the fancy of such widely different women. Clara Morris and Madame Elmenreich elect to play the part, and are so far above its requirements that it needs as lurid a stage-setting as the book will allow. The Jane Eyre of the story is a small, plain, unattractive, intense little person, far more interesting between the covers of a book than she can ever be made to appear out of it. Madame Elmenreich is a tall, stately, finely formed woman, with a face full of character and strength, and a rich, full voice. The repressed intensity, which is the feature of Jane Eyre, she conveys with admirable repose, but one likes to see an artist who is capable of much more—play something more than repressed intensity. The play is but feebly adapted, and gives Madame Elmenreich an opportunity to rise to her own strength only in the last scene—the love-scene with Rochester, who, indeed, does not rise with her, and plays it tamely. It is at best but an abrupt ending. The Rochester type of hero is quite on a line with the German model in the Marit novels, which are the best known to English readers. And he might easily have made one suspect it to be a German adaptation, so familiar and so popular, alas! has the growing, grumbling, bulldog hero become.

They have made a lord of Rochester, as in the later English versions, and have purified the moral atmosphere by saddling his little peccadilloes upon a convenient brother. Indeed, Charlotte Brontë would never recognize her own deliciously wicked Rochester in this latter-day one, who has little left of the original but his ill-humor, and is carefully shielded behind a certificate of respectability. Grace Poole glides but rarely across the family life, and the mad West Indian shrieks but once. Indeed, the play of "Jane Eyre" is simply a pleasant little domestic picture, in which an ill-natured man thaws to love, and the part of Jane Eyre, so adapted, is beneath the capabilities of an artist who excels in the great roles, however agreeable it may be to see her play the small ones.

Madame Elmenreich will play the much-praised and much-abused "Odette," which has been so long promised and so long coming this way, for Modjeska, the Odette of Odettes, has thrown the French sinner over and taken to English Rosalind in a becoming doublet and a pair of yellow leggings, for it seems to be the later decree that the arch and merry Rosalind shall not make a point of her legs any more.

BETSY B.

Madame Elmenreich has caught all the German theatre-goers, who were already aware of the artist's fame throughout Austria and Germany. In "Marie Stuart" and "Jane Eyre" she has won much applause. To-day there will be a matinée at the Baldwin Theatre, when "Marie Stuart" will be played. To-morrow evening, "Adrienne Lecouvreur" will be produced at Haverly's California Theatre.

At Haverly's California Theatre, "My Geraldine" has been drawing good audiences during the past week. Monday evening Bartley Campbell's new play, "Siberia," will be produced with the full company in the cast and Mademoiselle Cornalba and a score of corymbes in the ballet.

Mr. Bartley Campbell has been seriously ill during the past two weeks, but is now on the road to a speedy recovery.

Jay Rial's "Uncle Tom's Cabin" is holding the boards at the Grand Opera House.

The minstrels are having their usual good success at Emerson's Standard Theatre.

The Langtry legs do not come up to expectation; neither, it seems, does the doublet skirt.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Concert of the Loring Club.

A Loring Club concert has never yet failed to be one of those fortunate affairs from which everybody goes home feeling as if the prince had married the princess, and all the world would consequently be happy for a year and a day to come. The story may not have been a Homeric tale, but disappointment finds no place in its denouement; and better is a modest programme where success is, than ultra-classicism and musical catastrophe therewith.

Part first consisted of three numbers only. "At Early Morn," by Abt, was clearly and evenly sung; and "Silent Night," by Von Weber, proved itself one of the most thoroughly harmonious and finished pieces of work ever undertaken by this able chorus. The accompaniment in arpeggios, and the tranquil melody it supported, could not have been more accurate in point of intonation and rounded, quiet strength; and while the climax of the crescendos trembled dangerously upon the verge of "sweet vocation," the shading was yet most carefully managed.

Following upon this were two scenes from "Fritiof's Saga," opus 23, by Max Bruch, which, being the most involved, was the most important number of the evening. The solo part of "Fritiof," taken by Mr. Nello, (whose wealth of fine baritone might well charm the young lady delighting in a "rich gentleman's voice.") a chorus, quartet, and orchestral accompaniment, constituted the features of this interesting selection. The many beauties and musical combinations of so thoughtful a composition were scarcely to be appreciated in one hearing; and it is always a matter of regret that these more profound selections are not sometimes repeated at succeeding concerts. A presentation may be correct, and unmarred by any open breaks; but where varied elements are introduced, and much rehearsal is necessary, one is apt to feel (as with the "Saga," on Tuesday) that the whole thing wants "licking into shape." Indeed, somebody quoting from a flippant writer of the day, went so far the other night as to call Mr. Bruch's music a "harmonious gruel," which—he added of his own wit—had been insufficiently stirred; and, although criticism of this culinary cast may have been somewhat out of place, it must be confessed that certain crudities, both vocal and instrumental, were apparent in the first rendition of the "Saga."

A very quiet and lovely interpretation of Barnby's "Sweet and Low" introduced part second. "Morning in the Woods," by Rheinberger, was delightfully sung; and a "Finland Love Song," with string quartet accompaniment, was rapturously encored. This novel and charming composition, by Engelsberg, was entirely out of the ordinary, as also was the "Ruined Chapel," by Becker, with its pulsating bell-stroke and harmonies as poetical as they were clever. Nessler's "Invitation to the Dance," which the above-mentioned writer of flippancies would characterize as a "One, two, three, four, hop, hop, hop" composition, concluded the programme at an unusually early hour.

The third Philharmonic Concert will take place Friday evening, December first, and not on the third, as incorrectly stated last week. F. A. SAN FRANCISCO, November 23, 1882.

At the third Philharmonic Concert, to be given next Friday evening, December 1st, at Platt's Hall, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Brahms's Hungarian Waltzes, and the introduction to Wagner's "Lohengrin" will be the principal orchestral numbers. Fraulein Emma Hoff, from Berlin, will make her first appearance in this city in an aria from Bach's "Odysseus." This lady comes with recommendations from eminent Germans, and more especially from Herr Buch, under whom she studied for some time. Herr Bruno Gortatowsky, the pianist, also makes his debut. He was a pupil in Berlin of the celebrated Raif, and finished at Stuttgart under Lebert and Pruckner. He will play a concerto of Mozart's, accompanied by the full orchestra. Mr. Gustave Hinrichs will, as usual, conduct. Mr. Henry Heyman, who has the entire charge of this enterprise, also takes the leading violin in the orchestra. A rehearsal will be given for subscribers at ten o'clock on the morning of the performance. Box-sheet open at Sherman & Clay's music store.

We have received from M. Gray, 117 Post Street: "May Be," a song by William Toepke; price, 50 cents. "Old Uncle Jim," words by Murdy, music by Tilton; and "The Old Minstrel," words by J. V. Cheney, music by Albert B. Cheney; price, 40 cents. George W. Hagans & Co., 532 Clay Street, have just published: "Sweet Lavene," words by Urmy, music by Reed; price, 35 cents. "Call Me Back Again," composed by W. D. Hendrickson; price, 35 cents. "I'll Call Thee Back Again," words by Johnson, music by F. J. Phelps; price, 35 cents. "Sing the Dear Old Song Again," composed by H. W. Luther; price, 35 cents. "The Spanish Cavalier," composed by W. D. Hendrickson; price, 35 cents; and "The Old and New," scottish, composed by C. H. Reed; price, 35 cents.

Carl Formes, who took six of his young lady pupils to New York last month, in order that they might have better opportunities for engagements, writes back a very encouraging report. Miss McClellan has already secured an engagement as prima donna in Italian opera from Colonel Mapleson, which is a chance not very often given to a young girl.

—MESSRS. MORRIS & KENNEDY ON THURSDAY reopened their art-gallery to the public. They have a number of important pictures which Mr. Morris has just brought from the East and Europe. One, in particular, is a view in the Paris Bois de Boulogne, which attracts much attention.

Two Nights.

The waving boughs above them bending low,
Made deeper darkness in the warm-pulsed night,
And passionately then he kissed her lips again,
Whence clover-scented words came burning forth:
"Ah, me! that love should be so sweet,
And time so brief!"

White-lipped, tear-eyed, he knelt beside her couch,
When for a moment from her fading gaze
Once more into his darkened life there flashed
The old love-look. Then, as her spirit fled,
A wild came backward on the damp night air:
"Ah, God! that sin should be so sweet, Eternity so long!"

A Splendid Banquet.

PRINCESS LOUISE AND HER HUSBAND, the Marquis of Lorne, will return from their British Columbia trip shortly. They have become very popular among the upper and lower classes of the dominion. Their stay has been the occasion of one continual gala, and the people came from far inland to attend the Industrial Exhibition. The chief officers of the civil government, aided by the army officers stationed at Esquimaux, recently gave the vice-regal party a grand banquet at Victoria. The rarest delicacies were prepared for the feast, and hunters were dispatched into the interior, and also far up the coast, in order to procure the choicest land and water game. No expense, of course, was spared to provide the finest wines, but it is needless to remark that but one champagne was chosen, and that was POMMERY. This was due to two reasons: the first being that this champagne is the especial favorite of the English royal household, and second, that it is the king without equal over all other champagnes manufactured. Ye CRYER:
Here's a reward for who'll find Love!
Love is a-straying
Ever since Maying;
Hither and yon, below, above,
All are seeking Love!

Ye HAND-BILL:

Gone astray—between the Maying
And the gathering of the hay,
Love, an urchin ever playing—
Folk are warned against his play.
How may you know him? By the quiver,
By the how he's wont to bear.
First on your left there comes a shiver,
Then a twinge—the arrow's there.
By his eye of pansy color,
Deep as wounds he dealeth free;
If its hue have faded duller,
'Tis not that he weeps for me.
By the smile that curls his mouthlet;
By the mockery of his sigh;
By his breath, a spicy South, let Slip his lips of roses by.
By the devil in his dimple;
By his lies that sound so true;
By his shaft-sting, that no simple
Ever culled will heal for you.
By his beckonings that embolden;
By his quick withdrawals then;
By his flying hair, a golden
Light to lure the feet of men.
By the breast where ne'er a hurt'll
Ranckle neath his kerchief hid—
What? you cry; he wore a kirtle?
Faith! methinks the rascal did!

Here's a reward for who'll find Love!
'Love is a-straying
Ever since Maying;
Hither and yon, below, above,
I am seeking Love.

MASTER CORYDON.

Petticoat Lane.

A Love-knot.

My love and I—when I did love my love,
And my love loved me, ah! so very well—
Wandered together, and our faith to prove,
Cut in a tree the letters F and L.
We so adored each other, he and I,
The very winds low whispered through the trees,
And, breathing soft a tender, little sigh,
Would murmur: "Where are lovers like to these?"
We were to live in heaven while yet on earth;
We were to scorn the gods for very joy;
We challenged all to equal us in mirth,
Or in the arts we learned from Cupid-boy!
We met at dawn, at noon, at fall of eve;
We parted sobbing, but to turn again;
We each the other could not, would not leave—
Pale, wan, and full of Love's enchanting pain.
To-day I chanced to walk—but quite alone—
Married am I, and married, too, is he!
I am the love who loved my love, and grown
Even prettier—so, at least, it seems to me.
And he who loved his love so very well—
Where dwells my love, who loved his love so true?
Oh, long ago chimed out his marriage-bell,
And, just before it, mine had chimed out, too!
Well, I to-day was walking, when the tree
(Which I had quite forgotten) caught my eye.
Romantic still, I leaved what I should see—
Romantic still, I heaved a little sigh.
But soon I gazed upon the sacred spot
Where once our twined initials proved our faith;
The space had closed and formed a rugged knot:
Letters and love had died a natural death.
—Corra Linn Daniels.

Thelga and Ethred.

SESTINA.

[The sestina is the most complicated and difficult of all the old Provencal forms of verse. It is believed that the one below is the only one ever written in America, and the second of its kind in the English language. Mr. Edmund W. Gosse having published the first. There is also a rhyming sestina by Mr. Swinburne.]

Once on a time there dwelt Siehild, a king,
Far to the Northward, in the icy heart
Of barren peaks that lit their heads to kiss,
All passionless, the sun, their semile love;
Rich booty from the merchant seas he won,
And with a despot's sceptre ruled the land.

She who was famed as fairest in the land,
Was Princess Thelga, daughter of the king,
Prized by him more than all the spoils he won.
Gentle and proud, till Ethred came, her heart
Had never felt the stir of nestled love,
Her lips ne'er known the spasm of love's kiss.

And old Siehild had sworn that such a kiss—
By all the treasures of the sea or land—
Should never consecrate his daughter's love
For any suitor save the blustering king
Who ruled the realm adjoining, and whose heart
Chaste Thelga all unwillingly had won.

Hers Ethred, young and powerless, had won,
Unnoted by Siehild, until a kiss
The tyrant caught him stealing; then his heart
O'er-ran with rage that one with goods nor land
Should dare to woo the daughter of a king,
And balk a brother monarch of his love.

"Now, by my ships!" he stormed, "thou say'st thy love

By this unfaithful damsel has been won;
I'll prove you then: If you can tell your king
Of ought, ha, ha! that's sweeter than the kiss
You gave to her, dowered with goods and land,
Her hand is yours—as is, she thinks, her heart!"

"I can!" and Thelga pressed her angered heart
As Ethred spoke. "Then," roared the king,
"your love

Is false if aught's more sweet in all the land!"
"Nay," Ethred said, "I claim that I have won:
Sweeter than that I gave her was the kiss
I gave to me!" "I yield," confessed the king.

A happy heart! the royal largess won
Voluntary Love, in its one kiss,
More than sea or land can give a king.

This standard article is compounded with the greatest care.

Its effects are as wonderful and satisfactory as ever.
It restores gray or faded hair to its youthful color.
It removes all eruptions, itching and dandruff, and the scalp by its use becomes white and clean.
By its tonic properties it restores the capillary glands to their normal vigor, preventing baldness, and making the hair grow thick and strong.

As a dressing nothing has been found so effective or desirable.
Dr. A. A. Hayes, State Assayer of Massachusetts, says of it: "I consider it the best preparation for its intended purpose."

BUCKINGHAM'S DYE,
For the Whiskers.

This elegant preparation may be relied on to change the color of the beard from gray or any other undesirable shade to brown or black, at discretion. It is easily applied, being in one preparation, and quickly and effectually produces a permanent color which will neither rub nor wash off.

Mining Company—Location of works, Virginia City, Storey County, Nevada. Location of principal place of business, San Francisco, California.

Notice is hereby given, that at a meeting of the Directors, held on the eighteenth (18th) day of November, 1882, an assessment (No. 25) of Fifty (50) Cents per share was levied upon the capital stock of the corporation, payable immediately, in United States gold coin, to the Secretary, at the office of the Company, Room No. 29, Nevada Block,
No. 309 Montgomery Street, San Francisco, California.

Any stock upon which this assessment shall remain unpaid on Friday, the 22d day of December, 1882, will be delinquent, and advertised for sale at public auction; and unless payment is made before, will be sold on Thursday, the 17th day of January, 1883, to pay the delinquent assessment, together with costs of advertising and expenses of sale.

THE HIBERNIA SAVINGS AND LOAN SOCIETY, vs. JOHN J. CONLIN, et al., Defendants.

UNDER AND BY VIRTUE OF AN
Order of Sale and Decree of Foreclosure issued out of the Superior Court, Department No. 5, of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, on the 16th day of October, A. D. 1882, in the above-entitled action, wherein The Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, the above-named plaintiff, obtained a judgment and decree of foreclosure against John J. Conlin, John J. Conlin administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Catherine M. Conlin, deceased, John J. Conlin trustee of the estate of Catherine M. Conlin deceased, under her will, Josephine Conlin, William P. Conlin, and Catherine Ann Conlin, defendants, on the 31st day of July, A. D. 1882, which said judgment and decree was, on the 25th day of September, A. D. 1882, recorded in Judgment Book 1, of said Court, at page 670, I am commanded to sell all that certain lot, piece, or parcel of land, situate, lying, and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, and bounded and described as follows:

Commencing at a point on the southeasterly line of Perry Street, distant one hundred and five feet southwesterly from the southwesterly line of Fourth Street; thence southeasterly along said line of Perry Street, twenty-five feet; thence at right angles southeasterly eighty feet; thence at right angles northeasterly twenty-five feet; and thence at right angles northwesterly eighty feet to the point of commencement. The same being part of the parcel of land known on the official map of the City of San Francisco as 100-vara lot No. 173.

Public notice is hereby given that on Monday, the 18th day of December, A. D. 1882, at 12 o'clock, noon, of that day, in front of the Old City Hall, in the city and county of San Francisco, I will, in obedience to said order of sale and decree of foreclosure, sell the above-described property, or so much thereof as may be necessary to raise sufficient to satisfy said judgment, with interest and costs, etc., to the highest and best bidder for gold coin of the United States. THE SLEEPING-CAR—A FARCE.

By W. D. Howells.

I.

SCENE.—One side of a sleeping-car on the Boston and Albany road. The curtains are drawn before most of the berths; from the hooks and rods hang hats, bonnets, bags, band-boxes, umbrellas, and other traveling gear; on the floor are boots of both sexes, set out for THE PORTER to black. THE PORTER is making up the beds in the upper and lower berths adjoining the seats on which a young mother, slender and pretty, with a baby asleep on the seat beside her, and a stout old lady, sit confronting each other—MRS. AGNES ROBERTS and her aunt MARY.

Mrs. Roberts. Do you always take down your back hair, aunty?

Aunt Mary. No, never, child; at least not since I had such a fright about it once, coming on from New York. It's all well enough to take down your back hair if it is yours; but if it isn't, your head is the best place for it. Now, as I buy mine of Madame Pierrot—

Mrs. Roberts. Don't you wish she wouldn't advertise it as human hair? It sounds so pokerish—like human flesh, you know.

Aunt Mary. Why, she couldn't call it inhuman hair, my dear.

Mrs. Roberts (thoughtfully). No—just hair.

Aunt Mary. Then people would think it was for mattresses. But, as I was saying, I took it off that night, and tucked it safely away, as I supposed, in my pocket, and I slept sweetly till about midnight, when I happened to open my eyes, and saw something long and black crawl off my bed and slip under the berth. Such a shriek as I gave, my dear! "A snake! a snake! oh, a snake!" And everybody began talking at once, and some of the gentlemen swearing, and the porter came running with the poker to kill it; and all the while it was that ridiculous switch of mine that had worked out of my pocket. And glad enough I was to grab it up before anybody saw it, and say that I must have been dreaming.

Mrs. Roberts. Why, aunty, how funny! How could you suppose a serpent could get on board a sleeping-car, of all places in the world!

Aunt Mary. That was the perfect absurdity of it.

The Porter. Berths ready now, ladies.

Mrs. Roberts (to THE PORTER, who walks away to the end of the car, and sits down near the door). Oh, thank you. Aunty, do you feel nervous the least bit?

Aunt Mary. Nervous? No. Why?

Mrs. Roberts. Well, I don't know. I suppose I've been worked up a little about meeting Willis, and wondering how he'll look, and all. We can't know each other, of course. It doesn't stand to reason that if he's been out there for twelve years, ever since I was a child, though we've corresponded regularly—at least I have—that he could recognize me; not at the first glance, you know. He'll have a full beard; and then I've got married, and here's the baby. Oh, no! he'll never guess who it is in the world. Photographs really amount to nothing in such a case. I wish we were at home and it was all over. I wish he had written some particulars, instead of telegraphing from Ogden, "Be with you on the 7 A. M., Wednesday."

Aunt Mary. Californians always telegraph, my dear; they never think of writing. It isn't expensive enough, and it doesn't make your blood run cold enough to get a letter, and so they send you one of those miserable yellow dispatches whenever they can—those printed in a long string, if possible, so that you'll be sure to die before you get to the end of it. I suppose your brother has fallen into all those ways, and says "reckon," and "ornary," and "which the same," just like one of Mr. Bret Harte's characters.

Mrs. Roberts. But it isn't exactly our not knowing each other, aunty, that's worrying me; that's something that could be got over in time. What is simply driving me distracted is Willis and Edward meeting there when I'm away from home. Oh, how could I be away! And why couldn't Willis have given us fair warning? I would have hurried from the ends of the earth to meet him. I don't believe poor Edward ever saw a Californian; and he's so quiet and preoccupied, I'm sure he'd never get on with Willis. And if Willis is the least loud, he wouldn't like Edward. Not that I suppose he is loud; but I don't believe he knows anything about literary men. But you can see, aunty, can't you, how very anxious I must be? Don't you see that I ought to have been there when Willis and Edward met, so as to—to—well, to break them to each other, don't you know?

Aunt Mary. Oh, you needn't be troubled about that, Agnes. I dare say they've got on perfectly well together. Very likely they are sitting down to the unwholesome hot supper this instant that the ingenuity of man could invent.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, do you think they are, aunty? Oh, if I could only believe they were sitting down to a hot supper together now, I should be so happy! They'd be sure to get on if they were. There's nothing like eating to make men friendly with each other. Don't you know, at receptions, how they never have anything to say to each other till the escapalod oysters and the chicken salad appear; and then how sweet they are as soon as they've helped the ladies to ice? Oh, thank you, thank you, aunty, for thinking of the hot supper. It's such a relief to my mind! You can understand, can't you, aunty dear, how anxious I must have been to have my only brother and my only—my husband—get on nicely together? My life would be a wreck, simply a wreck, if they didn't. And Willis and I not having seen each other since I was a child makes it all the worse. I do hope they're sitting down to a hot supper.

An angry Voice from the next berth but one. I wish people in sleeping-cars—

A Voice from the berth beyond that. You're mistaken in your premises, sir. This is a waking-car. Ladies, go on, and oblige an eager listener.

[Sensation, and smothered laughter from the other berths.]

Mrs. Roberts (after a space of terrified silence, in a loud whisper to her AUNT). What horrid things! But now we really must go to bed. It was too bad to keep talking. I'd no idea my voice was getting so loud. What berth will you have, aunty? I'd better take the upper one, because—

Aunt Mary (whispering). No, no; I must take that, so that you can be with the baby below.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, how good you are, Aunt Mary! It's too bad; it is, really. I can't let you.

Aunt Mary. Well, then, you must; that's all. You know how that child tosses and kicks about in the night. You never can tell where his head's going to be in the morning, but you'll probably find it at the foot of the bed. I couldn't sleep an instant, my dear, if I thought that boy was in the upper berth, for I'd be sure of his tumbling out over you. Here, let me lay him down. [She lays the baby in the lower berth.] There! Now get in, Agnes—do, and leave me to my struggle with the attraction of gravitation.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, poor aunty, how will you ever manage it? I must help you up.

Aunt Mary. No, my dear; don't be foolish. But you may go and call the porter, if you like. I dare say he's used to it. [MRS. ROBERTS goes and speaks timidly to THE PORTER, who fails at first to understand, then smiles broadly, accepts a quarter with a duck of his head, and comes forward to AUNT MARY'S side.]

Mrs. Roberts. Had he better give you his hand to rest your foot in, while you spring up as if you were mounting horse-back?

Aunt Mary (with disdain). Spring! My dear, I haven't sprung for a quarter of a century. I shall require every fibre in the man's body. His hand, indeed! You get in first, Agnes.

Mrs. Roberts. I will, aunty dear; but—

Aunt Mary (sternly). Agnes, do as I say. [MRS. ROBERTS crouches down on the lower berth.] I don't choose that any member of my family shall witness my contortions. Don't you look.

Mrs. Roberts. No, no, aunty.

Aunt Mary. Now, porter, are you strong?

Porter. I used to be porter at a Saratoga hotel, and carried up de ladies' trunks dere.

Aunt Mary. Then you'll do, I think. Now, then, your knee; now your back. There! And very handsomely done. Thanks.

Mrs. Roberts. Are you really in, Aunt Mary?

Aunt Mary (dryly). Yes. Good-night.

Mrs. Roberts. Good-night, aunty. [After a pause of some minutes.] Aunty!

Aunt Mary. Well, what?

Mrs. Roberts. Do you think it's perfectly safe?

[She rises in her berth, and looks up over the edge of the upper.]

Aunt Mary. I suppose so. It's a well-managed road. They've got the air-brake, I've heard, and the Miller platform, and all those horrid things. What makes you introduce such unpleasant subjects?

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, I don't mean accidents. But, you know, when you turn, it does creak so awfully. I shouldn't mind myself; but the baby—

Aunt Mary. Why, child, do you think I'm going to break through? I couldn't. I'm one of the lightest sleepers in the world.

Mrs. Roberts. Yes, I know you're a light sleeper; but—but it doesn't seem quite the same thing, somehow.

Aunt Mary. But it is; it's quite the same thing, and you can be perfectly easy in your mind, my dear. I should be quite as loath to break through as you would to have me. Good-night.

Mrs. Roberts. Yes; good-night. Aunty!

Aunt Mary. Well?

Mrs. Roberts. You ought to just see him, how he's lying. He's a perfect log. Couldn't you just bend over, and peep down at him a moment?

Aunt Mary. Bend over! It would be the death of me. Good-night.

Mrs. Roberts. Good-night. Did you put the glass into my bag or yours? I feel so very thirsty, and I want to go and get some water. I'm sure I don't know why I should be thirsty. Are you, Aunt Mary? Ah! here it is. Don't disturb yourself, aunty; I've found it. It was in my bag, just where I'd put it myself. But all this trouble about Willis has made me so fidgety that I don't know where anything is. And now I don't know how to manage about the baby while I go after the water. He's sleeping soundly enough now; but if he should happen to get into one of his rolling moods, he might tumble out on the floor. Never mind, aunty; I've thought of something. I'll just barricade him with these bags and shawls. Now, old fellow, you may roll as much as you like. If you should happen to hear him stir, aunty, won't you—Aunty! Oh, dear! She's asleep already; and what shall I do? [While MRS. ROBERTS continues talking, various notes of protest, profane and otherwise, make themselves heard from different berths.] I know. I'll make a bold dash for the water, and be back in an instant, baby. Now, don't you move, you little rogue. [She runs to the water-tank at the end of the car, and then back to her berth.] Now, baby, here's mamma again. Are you all right, mamma's own?

[A shaggy head and bearded face are thrust from the curtains of the next berth.]

The Stranger. Look here, ma'am. I don't want to be disagreeable about this thing, and I hope you won't take any offense; but the fact is, I'm half dead for want of sleep, and if you'll only keep quiet now a little while, I'll promise not to speak above my breath if ever I find you on a sleeping car after you've come straight through from San Francisco, day and night, and not been able to get more than a quarter of your usual allowance of rest—I will, indeed.

Mrs. Roberts. I'm very sorry that I've disturbed you, and I'll try and be more quiet. I didn't suppose I was speaking so loud; but the cars keep up such a rattling that you never can tell how loud you are speaking. Did I understand you to say that you were from California?

The Californian. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. Roberts. San Francisco?

The Californian. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. Roberts. Thanks. It's a terribly long journey—isn't it? I know quite how to feel for you. I've a brother myself coming on. In fact, we expected him before this. [She scans his face as sharply as the lamp-light will allow, and continues, after a brief hesitation.] It's always such a silly question to ask a person, and I suppose San Francisco is a large place, with a great many people always coming and going, so that it would only be one chance in a thousand if you did.

The Californian (patiently). Did what, ma'am?

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, I was just wondering if it was possible—but of course it isn't, and it's very flat to ask—that you'd ever happened to meet my brother there. His name is Willis Campbell.

The Californian (with more interest). Campbell? Campbell? Yes, I know a man of that name. But I disremember his first name. Little, low fellow—pretty chunky?

Mrs. Roberts. I don't know. Do you mean short and stout?

The Californian. Yes, ma'am.

Mrs. Roberts. I'm sure I can't tell. It's a great many years since he went out there, and I've never seen him in all that time. I thought if you did happen to know him—

He's a lawyer.

The Californian. It's quite likely I know him; and in the morning, ma'am—

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, excuse me. I am very sorry to have kept you so long awake with my silly questions.

The Man in the Upper Berth. Don't apologize, madam. I'm not a Californian myself, but I'm an orphan, and away from home, and I thank you, on behalf of all our fellow-passengers, for the mental refreshment that your conversation has afforded us. I could lie here and listen to it all night; but there are invalids in some of these berths, and perhaps on their account it will be as well to defer everything till the morning, as our friend suggests. Allow me to wish you pleasant dreams, madam.

[THE CALIFORNIAN, while MRS. ROBERTS shrinks back under the curtain of her berth in dismay, and stammers some inaudible excuse, slowly emerges full length from his berth.]

The Californian. Don't you mind me, ma'am; I've got everything but my boots and coat on. Now, then, [standing beside the berth, and looking in upon the man in the upper tier,] you, do you know this is a lady you're talking to?

The Upper Berth. By your voice and your shaggy personal appearance I shouldn't have taken you for a lady—no, sir. But the light is very imperfect; you may be a bearded lady.

The Californian. You never mind about my looks. The question is: Do you want your head rapped up against the side of this car?

The Upper Berth. With all the frankness of your own Pacific slope, no.

Mrs. Roberts (hastily re-appearing). Oh, no, no, don't hurt him. He's not to blame. I was wrong to keep on talking. Oh, please don't hurt him!

The Californian (to THE UPPER BERTH). You hear? Well, now, don't you speak another word to that lady tonight. Just go on, ma'am, and free your mind on any little matter you like. I don't want any sleep. How long has your brother been in California?

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, don't let's talk about it now; I don't want to talk about it. I thought—I thought—Good-night. Oh, dear! I didn't suppose I was making so much trouble. I didn't mean to disturb anybody. I—

[MRS. ROBERTS gives way to the excess of her confusion and mortification in a little sob, and then hides her grief behind the curtains of her berth. THE CALIFORNIAN slowly emerges again from his couch, and stands beside it, looking in upon the man in the berth above.]

The Californian. For half a cent I would rap your head up against that wall. Making the lady cry, and making me so mad I can't sleep! Now, see here, you just apologize. You beg that lady's pardon, or I'll have you out of there before you know yourself. [Cries of "Good!" "That's right!" and "Make him show himself!" hail Mrs. ROBERTS's champion, and heads, more or less disheveled, are thrust from every berth. Mrs. ROBERTS remains invisible and silent, and the loud and somewhat complicated respiration of her AUNT makes itself heard in the general hush of expectancy. A remark to the effect that "The old lady seems to enjoy her rest" achieves a facile applause. THE CALIFORNIAN again addresses the culprit.] Come, now, what do you say? I'll give you just one half minute.

Mrs. Roberts (from her shelter). Oh, please, please don't make him say anything. It was very trying in me to keep him awake, and I know he didn't mean any offense. Oh, do let him be!

The Californian. You hear that? You stay quiet the rest of the time; and if that lady chooses to keep us all awake the whole night, don't you say a word, or I'll settle with you in the morning.

[Loud and continued applause, amidst which THE CALIFORNIAN turns from the man in the berth before him, and restores order by marching along the aisle of the car in his stocking feet. The heads vanish behind the curtains. As the laughter subsides, he returns to his berth, and after a stare up and down the darkened, not a sound is heard but the rhythmic clank of the machinery, with now and then a burst of audible slumber from Mrs. ROBERTS's aunt MARY.]

II.

At Worcester, where the train has made the usual stop, THE PORTER, with his lantern on his arm, enters the car, preceding a gentleman somewhat anxiously smiling; his nervous speech contrasts painfully with the business-like impassiveness of THE PORTER, who refuses, with an air of incredulity, to enter into the confidences which the gentleman seems reluctant to bestow.

Mr. Edward Roberts. This is the Governor Marcy, isn't it?

The Porter. Yes, sah.

Mr. Roberts. Came on from Albany, and not from New York?

The Porter. Yes, sah, it did.

Mr. Roberts. Ah! it must be all right. I—

The Porter. Was your wife expecting you to come on board here?

Mr. Roberts. Well, no, not exactly. She was expecting me to meet her at Boston. But I—[struggling to give the situation dignity, but failing, and throwing himself, with self-conscious silliness, upon THE PORTER's mercy.] The fact is, I thought I would surprise her by joining her here.

The Porter (refusing to have any mercy). Oh! How did you expect to find her?

Mr. Roberts. Well—well—I don't know. I didn't consider. [He looks down the aisle in despair at the close-drawn curtains of the berths, and up at the dangling hats, and bags, and bonnets, and down at the chaos of boots of both sexes on the floor.] I don't know how I expected to find her.

[MR. ROBERTS's countenance falls, and he visibly sinks so low in his own esteem and an imaginary public opinion that THE PORTER begins to have a little compassion.]

The Porter. Dey's so many ladies on board I couldn't find her.

Mr. Roberts. Oh, no, of course not. I didn't expect that.

The Porter. Don't like to go routing 'em all up, you know. I wouldn't be allowed to.

Mr. Roberts. I don't ask it; that would be preposterous.

The Porter. What sort of looking lady was she?

Mr. Roberts. Well, I don't know, really. Not very tall, rather slight, blue eyes. I—I don't know what you'd call her nose. And—stop!

Oh, yes, she had a child with her, a little boy. Yes!

The Porter (thoughtfully looking down the aisle). Dey was three ladies had children. I didn't notice whether dey was boys or girls, or what dey was. Didn't have anybody with her?

Mr. Roberts. No, no. Only the child.

The Porter. Well, I don't know what you're going to do, sah. It won't be a great while now till morning, you know. Here comes the conductor. Maybe he'll know what to do.

[MR. ROBERTS makes some futile, inarticulate attempts to prevent THE PORTER from laying the case before THE CONDUCTOR, and then stands guiltily smiling, overwhelmed with the hopeless absurdity of his position.]

The Conductor (entering the car and stopping before THE PORTER, and looking at MR. ROBERTS.) Gentleman want a berth?

The Porter (grinning). Well, no, sah. He's lookin' for his wife.

The Conductor (with suspicion). Is she aboard this car?

Mr. Roberts (striving to propitiate THE CONDUCTOR by a dastardly amiability). Oh, yes, yes. There's no mistake about the car—the Governor Marcy. She telegraphed the name just before you left Albany, so that I could find her at Boston in the morning. Ah!

The Conductor. At Boston? [Sternly.] Then what are you trying to find her at Worcester in the middle of the night for?

Mr. Roberts. Why—I—that is—

The Porter (taking compassion on MR. ROBERTS's inability to continue). Says he wanted to surprise her.

Mr. Roberts. Ha—yes, exactly. A little caprice, you know.

The Conductor. Well, that may all be so. [MR. ROBERTS continues to smile in agonized helplessness against THE CONDUCTOR's injurious tone, which becomes more and more offensively patronizing.] But I can't do anything for you. Here are all these people asleep in their berths, and I can't go round waking them up because you want to surprise your wife.

Mr. Roberts. No, no; of course not. I never thought—

The Conductor. My advice to you is to have a berth made up, and go to bed till we get to Boston, and surprise your wife by telling her what you tried to do.

Mr. Roberts (unable to resent the patronage of this suggestion). Well, I don't know but I will.

The Conductor (going out). The porter will make up the berth for you.

Mr. Roberts (to THE PORTER, who is about to pull down an upper berth over a vacant seat). Ah! Eh—I—don't think I'll trouble you to make it up; it's so near morning now. Just bring me a pillow, and I'll try to get a nap without lying down. [He takes the vacant seat.]

The Porter. All right, sah. [He goes to the end of the car, and returns with a pillow.]

Mr. Roberts. Ah—porter!

The Porter. Yes, sah.

Mr. Roberts. Of course you didn't notice; but you don't think you did notice who was in that berth yonder? [He indicates a certain berth.]

The Porter. Dat's a gentleman in dat berth, I think, sah.

Mr. Roberts (astutely). There's a bonnet hanging from the hook at the top. I'm not sure, but it looks like my wife's bonnet.

The Porter (evidently shaken by this reasoning, but recovering his firmness). Yes, sah. But you can't depend upon de ladies to hang deir bonnets on de right hook. Jes' likely as not dat lady's took de hook at de foot of her berth instead o' de head. Sometimes dey takes both.

Mr. Roberts. Ah! [After a pause.] Porter!

The Porter. Yes, sah.

Mr. Roberts. You wouldn't feel justified in looking?

The Porter. I couldn't sah; I couldn't, indeed.

Mr. Roberts (reaching his left hand toward THE PORTER's, and pressing a half-dollar into his instantly responsive palm). But there's nothing to prevent my looking, if I feel perfectly sure of the bonnet?

The Porter. N-no, sah.

Mr. Roberts. All right.

[THE PORTER retires to the end of the car, and resumes the work of polishing the passengers' boots. After an interval of quiet, MR. ROBERTS rises, and, looking about him with what he feels to be melodramatic stealth, approaches the suspected berth. He unloosens the curtain with a trembling hand, and peers ineffectually in; he advances his head farther and farther into the darkened recess, and then suddenly dodges back.]

THE CALIFORNIAN hanging to his neckcloth with one hand.

THE CALIFORNIAN (savagely). What do you want?

Mr. Roberts (struggling and breathless). I—I—I want my wife.

THE CALIFORNIAN. Want your wife! Have I got your wife?

Mr. Roberts. No—ah—that is—ah, excuse me, I thought you were my wife.

The Californian (getting out of the berth, but at the same time keeping hold of MR. ROBERTS). Thought I was your wife! Do I look like your wife? You can't play that on me, old man. Porter! conductor!

Mr. Roberts (agonized). Oh, I beseech you, my dear sir, don't—don't! I can explain it—I can, indeed. I know it has an ugly look; but if you will allow me two words—only two words—

Mrs. Roberts (suddenly parting the curtain of her berth, and springing into the aisle with her hair wildly disheveled.) Edward!

Mr. Roberts. Oh, Agnes, explain to this gentleman! [Implovingly.] Don't you know me?

A Voice. Make him show you the strawberry on his left arm.

Mrs. Roberts. Edward! Edward! [THE CALIFORNIAN mechanically loses his grip, and they fly into each other's embrace.] Where did you come from?

A Voice. Centre door, left hand, one back.

The Conductor (returning with his lantern). Hello! What's the matter here?

A Voice. Train robbers! Throw up your hands! Tell the express messenger to bring his safe.

[The passengers emerge from their berths in various deshabille and bewilderment.]

The Conductor (to MR. ROBERTS). Have you been making all this row, waking up my passengers?

The Californian. No, sir, he hasn't. I've been making this row. This gentleman was peacefully looking for his wife, and I misunderstood him. You want to say anything to me?

The Conductor (silently taking THE CALIFORNIAN's measure, with his eye, as he stands six feet in his stockings). If I did, I'd get the biggest brakeman I could find to do it for me. I've got nothing to say except that I think you'd all better go back to bed again.

[He goes out, and the passengers disappear one by one, leaving the ROBERTSES and THE CALIFORNIAN alone.]

The Californian (to MR. ROBERTS). Stranger, I'm sorry I got you into this scrape.

Mr. Roberts. Oh, don't speak of it, my dear sir. I'm sure we owe you all sorts of apologies, which I shall be most happy to offer you at my house in Boston, with every needful explanation. [He takes out his card, and gives it to THE CALIFORNIAN, who looks at it, and then looks at MR. ROBERTS curiously.] There's my address, and I'm sure we shall both be glad to have you call.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, yes, indeed. [THE CALIFORNIAN parts the curtains of his berth to re-enter it.] Good-night, sir, and I assure you we shall do nothing more to disturb you—shall we, Edward?

Mr. Roberts. No. And now, dear, I think you'd better go back to your berth.

Mrs. Roberts. I couldn't sleep, and I shall not go back. Is this your place? I will just rest my head on your shoulder, and we must both be perfectly quiet. You've no idea what a nuisance I've been making of myself. The whole car was perfectly furious at me one time, I kept talking so loud. I don't know how I came to do it, but I suppose it was thinking about you and Willis meeting without knowing each other made me nervous, and I couldn't be still. I woke everybody up with my talking, and some of them were quite outrageous in their remarks; but I didn't blame them the least bit, for I should have been just as bad. That California gentleman was perfectly splendid, though. I can tell you, he made them stop. We struck up quite a friendship. I told him I had a brother coming on from California, and he's going to try to think whether he knows Willis. [Groans and inarticulate protests make themselves heard from different berths.] I declare, I've got to talking again! There now, I shall stop, and they won't hear another squeak from me the rest of the night. [She lifts her head from her husband's shoulder.] I wonder if baby will roll out. He does kick so!

And I just sprang up and left him when I heard your voice, without putting anything to keep him in. I must go and have a look at him, or I never can settle down. No, no, don't you go, Edward; you'll be prying into all the wrong berths in the car, you poor thing! You stay here, and I'll be back in half a second. I wonder which is my berth. Ah, that's it; I know the one now. [She makes a sudden dash at a berth, and, pulling open the curtain is confronted by the bearded visage of THE CALIFORNIAN.] Ah! Ow! Ow! Edward! Ah! I—I beg your pardon, sir; excuse me; I didn't know it was you. I came for my baby.

The Californian (solemnly). I haven't got any baby, ma'am.

Mrs. Roberts. No—no—I thought you were my baby.

The Californian. Perhaps I am, ma'am; I've lost so much sleep I could cry, anyway. Do I look like your baby?

Mrs. Roberts. No, you don't. [In distress that overcomes her mortification.] Oh, where is my baby? I left him all uncovered, and he'll take his death of cold, even if he doesn't roll out. Oh, Edward, Edward, help me to find baby!

Mr. Roberts (bustling aimlessly about). Yes, yes; certainly my dear. But don't be alarmed; we shall find him.

The Californian (getting out of his stocking feet). We shall find him, ma'am, if we have to search every berth in this car. Don't you take on. That baby's going to be found if he's aboard the train, now, you bet!

[He looks about, and then tears open the curtains of a berth at random.]

That your baby, ma'am?

Mrs. Roberts (flying upon the infant thus exposed). Oh, baby, baby, baby! I thought I had lost you. Um! um! um!

[She clasps him in her arms, and covers his face and neck with kisses.]

The Californian (as he gets back into his berth, sotto voce). I wish I had been her baby.

Mrs. Roberts (returning with her husband to her seat, and bringing the baby with her.) There! Did you ever see such a sleeper, Edward?

[In her ecstasy she abandons all control of her voice, and joyfully exclaims.]

He has slept all through this excitement without a wink.

A solemn voice from once of the berths. I envy him.

[A laugh follows, in which all the passengers join.]

Mrs. Roberts (in a hoarse whisper, breaking a little with laughter). Oh, my goodness! There I went again. But how funny! I assure you, Edward, that if their remarks had not been about me, I could have really quite enjoyed some of them. I wish there had been somebody here to take them down. And I hope I shall see some of the speakers in the morning before—Edward, I've got an idea!

Mr. Roberts (endeavoring to teach his wife by example to lower her voice, which has risen again). What—what is it, my dear?

Mrs. Roberts. Why, don't you see? How perfectly ridiculous it was of me not to think of it before! though I did think of it once, and hadn't the courage to insist upon it. But of course it is; and it accounts for his being so polite and kind to me through all, and it's the only thing that can. Yes, yes, it must be.

Mr. Roberts (mystified). What?

Mrs. Roberts. Willis.

Mr. Roberts. Who?

Mrs. Roberts. This Californian.

Mr. Roberts. Oh!

Mrs. Roberts. No stranger could have been so patient and—and—attentive; and I know that he recognized me from the first, and he's just kept it up for a joke, so as to surprise us and have a good laugh at us when we get to Boston. Of course it's Willis.

Mr. Roberts (doubtfully). Do you think so, my dear?

Mrs. Roberts. I know it. Didn't you notice how he looked at your card? And I want you to go at once and speak to him, and turn the tables on him.

Mr. Roberts. I—I'd rather not, my dear.

Mrs. Roberts. Why, Edward, what do you mean?

Mr. Roberts. He's very violent. Suppose it shouldn't be Willis?

Mrs. Roberts. Nonsense! It is Willis. Come, let's both go and talk him with it. He can't deny it, after all he's done for me. [She pulls her reluctant husband toward THE CALIFORNIAN's berth, and they each draw a curtain.] Willis!

The Californian (with plaintive endurance). Well, ma'am?

Mrs. Roberts (triumphantly). There! I knew it was you all along. How could you play such a joke on me?

The Californian. I didn't know there'd been any joke; but I suppose there must have been, if you say so. Who am I now, ma'am?

Mrs. Roberts. Your baby, or your husband's wife, or—

Mr. Roberts. How funny you are! You know you're Willis Campbell, my only brother. Now don't try to keep it up any longer, Willis. [Voice from various berths.] "Give us a rest, Willis!" "Joke's too thin, Willis!" "You're played out, Willis!" "Own up, old fellow—own up!"

The Californian (issuing from his berth and walking up and down the aisle, as before, until quiet is restored). I haven't got any sister, and my name ain't Willis, and it ain't Campbell. I'm very sorry, because I'd like to oblige you any way I could.

Mrs. Roberts (in deep mortification). It's I who ought to apologize, and I do most humbly. I don't know what to say; but when I got to thinking about it, and how kind you had been to me, and how sweet you had been under all my interruptions, I felt perfectly sure that you couldn't be a mere stranger, and then the idea struck me that you must be my brother in disguise; and I was so certain of it that I couldn't help just letting you know that we'd found you out, and—

Mr. Roberts (offering a belated and feeble moral support). Yes.

Mrs. Roberts (promptly turning upon him). And you ought to have kept me from making such a simpleton of myself, Edward.

The Californian (soothingly). Well, ma'am, that ain't always so easy. A man may mean well, and yet not be able to carry out his intentions. But it's all right. And I reckon we'd better try to quiet down again, and get what rest we can.

Mrs. Roberts. Why, yes, certainly; and I will try—oh, I will try—not to disturb you again. And if there's anything we can do in reparation after we reach Boston, we shall be so glad to do it.

[They bow themselves away, and return to their seat, while THE CALIFORNIAN re-enters his berth.]

III.

The train stops at Framingham, and THE PORTER comes in with a passenger, whom he shows to a seat opposite MR. and MRS. ROBERTS.

The Porter. You can sit here, sah. We'll be in in about an hour now. Hang up your bag for you, sah?

The Passenger. No, leave it on the seat here.

[THE PORTER goes out, and the ROBERTSES maintain a doleful silence. The bottom of the bag, thrown carelessly on the seat, is toward the ROBERTSES, who regard it listlessly.]

Mrs. Roberts (suddenly clutching her husband's arm, and hissing in his ear). See! [She points to the white lettering on the bag where the name "Willis Campbell, San Francisco," is distinctly legible.] But it can't be; it must be some other Campbell. I can't risk it.

Mr. Roberts. But there's the name. It would be very strange if there were two people from San Francisco of exactly the same name. I will speak.

Mrs. Roberts (as wildly as one can in whisper). No, no; I can't let you. We've made ourselves the laughing-stock of the whole car already with our mistakes, and I can't go on. I would rather perish than ask him. You don't suppose it could be? No, it couldn't. There may be twenty Willis Campbells in San Francisco, and there probably are. Do you think he looks like me? He has a straight nose; but you can't tell anything about the lower part of his face, the heard covers it so; and I can't make out the color of his eyes by this light. But of course it's all nonsense. Still, if it should be! It would be very stupid of us to ride all the way from Framingham to Boston with that name staring one in the eyes. I wish he would turn it away. If it really turned out to be Willis, he would think we were awfully stiff and cold. But I can't help it. I can't go attacking every stranger I see, and accusing him of being my brother. No, no, I can't, and I won't, and that's all about it. [She leans forward and addresses the stranger with sudden sweetness.] Excuse me, sir, but I am very much interested by the name on your bag.

Not that I think you are even acquainted with him, and there are probably a great many of them there; but your coming from the same city and all does seem a little queer, and I hope you won't think me intrusive in speaking to you, because if you should happen, by the thousandth of a chance, to be the right one, I should be so happy.

Campbell. The right what, madam?

Mrs. Roberts. The right Willis Campbell.

Campbell. I hope I'm not the wrong one; though after a week's pull on the railroad, it's pretty hard for a man to tell which Willis Campbell he is. May I ask if your Willis Campbell had friends in Boston?

Mrs. Roberts (eagerly). He had a sister, and a brother-in-law, and a nephew.

Campbell. Name of Roberts?

Mrs. Roberts. Every one.

Campbell. Then you're—

Mrs. Roberts (ecstatically). Agnes!

Campbell. And be—

Mrs. Roberts. Mr. Roberts.

Campbell. And the baby's—

Mrs. Roberts. Asleep!

Campbell. Then I am the right one.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, Willis! Willis! Willis! To think of our meeting in this way! [She kisses and embraces him, while MR. ROBERTS shakes one of his hands which he finds disengaged.] How in the world did it happen?

Campbell. Ah, I found myself a little ahead of time, and I stopped off with an old friend of mine at Framingham; I didn't want to disappoint you when you came to meet this train, or get you up last night at midnight.

Mrs. Roberts. And I was in Albany, and I've been moving heaven and earth to get home before you arrived; and Edward came aboard at Worcester to surprise me, and—Oh, you've never seen the baby! I'll run right and get him this instant, just as he is, and bring him, Edward, you be explaining to Willis—Oh, my goodness! [Looking wildly about.] I don't remember the berth, and I shall be sure to wake up that poor California gentleman again. What shall I do?

Campbell. What California gentleman?

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, somebody we've been stirring up the whole blessed night. First I took him for baby, and then Edward took him for me, and then I took him for baby again, and then we both took him for you.

Campbell. Did he look like any of us?

Mrs. Roberts. Like us? He's eight feet tall, if he's an inch, in his stockings—and he's always in them—and he has a long black beard and mustaches, and he's very lanky, and stoops over a good deal; but he's just as lovely as he can be and live, and he's been as kind and patient as twenty jobs.

Campbell. Speaks in a sort of soft, slow grind?

Mrs. Roberts. Yes.

Campbell. Gentle and deferential to ladies?

Mrs. Roberts. As possible.

Campbell. It's Tom Goodall. I'll have him out of there in half a second. I want you to take him home with you, Agnes. He's the best fellow in the world. Which is his berth?

Mrs. Roberts. Don't ask me, Willis. But if you go for baby, you'll be sure to find him.

Mr. Roberts (timidly indicating a berth). I think that's the one.

Campbell (springing at it, and pulling the curtains open). You old Tom Goodall!

The Californian (appearing). I ain't any Tom Goodall. My name's Abram Sawyer.

Campbell (falling back). Well, sir, you're right. I'm awfully sorry to disturb you; but, from my sister's description here, I felt certain you must be my old friend Tom Goodall.

The Californian. I ain't surprised at it. I'm only surprised I ain't Tom Goodall. I've been a baby twice, and I've been a man's wife once, and once I've been a long-lost brother.

Campbell (laughing). Oh, they've found him. I'm the long-lost brother.

The Californian. Yes, it is kind of curious. But I couldn't help it. I did my best.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, don't speak of it. We are the ones who ought to apologize. But if you only had been somebody, it would have been such a good joke! We could always have had such a laugh over it, don't you see?

The Californian. Yes, ma'am, it would have been funny. But I hope you've enjoyed it as it is.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, very much, thanks to you. Only I can't seem to get reconciled to your not being anybody, after all. You must at least be some one we've heard about, don't you think? It's so strange that you and Willis never even met. Don't you think you have some acquaintances in common?

Campbell. Look here, Agnes, do you always shout at the top of your voice in this way when you converse in a sleeping-car?

Mrs. Roberts. Was I talking loud again? Well, you can't help it if you want to make people hear you.

Campbell. But there must be a lot of them you don't want to hear you. I wonder that the passengers who are not blood relations don't throw things at you—boots, and hand-bags, and language.

Mrs. Roberts. Why, that's what they've been doing—language, at least—and I'm only surprised they're not doing it now.

The Californian (rising). They'd better not, ma'am.

(He patrols the car from end to end, and quells some rising murmurs halting at the rebellious berths as he passes.)

Mrs. Roberts (enraptured by his companionship). Oh, he must be some connection. (She glances through the window.) I do believe that was Newton, or Newtonville, or West Newton, or Newton Centre. I must run and wake up baby, and get him dressed. I shan't want to wait an instant after we get in. Why, we're slowing up! Why, I do believe we're there! Edward, where's there! Only fancy being there already!

Mr. Roberts. Yes, my dear. Only we're not quite there yet. Hadn't we better call your aunt Mary?

Mrs. Roberts. I'd forgotten her.

Campbell. Is Aunt Mary with you?

Mrs. Roberts. To be sure she is. Didn't I tell you? She came on expressly to meet you.

Campbell (starting up impetuously). Which berth is she in?

Mrs. Roberts. Right over baby.

Campbell. And which berth is baby in?

Mrs. Roberts (distractedly). Why, that's just what I can't tell. It was bad enough when they were all filled up, but now since the people have begun to come out of them, and some of them are made into seats, I can't tell.

The Californian. I'll look for you, ma'am. I should like to wake up all the wrong passengers on this car. I'd take a pleasure in it. If you could make sure of any berth that ain't the one, I'll begin on that.

Mrs. Roberts. I can't even be sure of the wrong one. No, no, you mustn't—[The Californian moves away, and pauses in front of one of the berths, looking back inquiringly at Mrs. Roberts.] Oh, don't ask me! I can't tell. [To CAMPBELL.] Isn't he amusing? So like all those Californians that one reads of—so chivalrous and so humorous!

Aunt Mary (thrusting her head from the curtains of the berth before which THE CALIFORNIAN is standing). Go along with you! What do you want?

The Californian. Aunt Mary.

Aunt Mary. Go away. Aunt Mary, indeed!

Mrs. Roberts (running toward her, followed by CAMPBELL and MR. ROBERTS). Why, Aunt Mary, it is you! And here's Willis, and here's Edward.

Aunt Mary. Nonsense! How did they get aboard?

Mrs. Roberts. Edward came on at Worcester, and Willis at Framingham, to surprise me.

Aunt Mary. And a very silly performance. Let them wait till I'm dressed, and then I'll talk to them. Send for the porter. (She withdraws her head behind the curtain, and then thrusts it out again.) And who, pray, may this be? [She indicates THE CALIFORNIAN.]

Mrs. Roberts. Oh, a friend of ours from California, who's been so kind to us all night, and who's going home with us.

Aunt Mary. Another ridiculous surprise, I suppose. But he shall not surprise me. Young man, isn't your name Sawyer?

The Californian. Yes, ma'am.

Aunt Mary. Abram?

The Californian. Abram Sawyer. You're right there, ma'am.

Mrs. Roberts. Oh! oh! I knew it! I knew that he must be somebody belonging to us. Oh, thank you, aunty, for thinking—

Aunt Mary. Don't be absurd, Agnes. Then you're my—

A voice from one of the berths. Lost stepson. Found! Found at last!

[THE CALIFORNIAN looks vainly round, in an endeavor to identify the speaker, and then turns again to AUNT MARY.]

Aunt Mary. Weren't your parents from Bath?

The Californian (eagerly). Both of 'em, ma'am—both of 'em.

The Voice. O my prophetic soul, my uncle!

Aunt Mary. Then you're my old friend Kate Harris's daughter?

The Californian. I might be her son, ma'am, ma'am; but my mother's name was Susan Wakenan.

Aunt Mary (in sharp disgust). Call the porter, please.

(She withdraws her head, and pulls her curtains together; the rest look blankly at one another.)

Campbell. Another failure, and just when we thought we were sure of you. I don't know what we shall do about you, Mr. Sawyer.

The Voice. Adopt him.

Campbell. That is a good idea. We will adopt you. You shall be our adoptive—

The Voice. Baby boy.

A Second Voice. Wife.

A Third Voice. Brother.

A Fourth Voice. Early friend.

A Fifth Voice. Kate Harris's daughter.

Campbell (laying his hand on THE CALIFORNIAN'S shoulder, and breaking into a laugh.) Don't mind them. They don't mean anything. It's just their way. You come home with my sister, and spend Christmas with us, and let us devote the rest of our lives to making your declining years happy.

Voices. "Good for you, Willis!" "We'll all come!" "No ceremony!" "Small and early!"

Campbell (looking round). We appear to have fallen in with a party of dry-goods drummers. It makes a gentleman feel like an intruder. [The train stops; he looks out of the window.] We've arrived. Come, Agnes; come, Roberts; come, Mr. Sawyer—let's be going.

(They gather up their several wraps and bags, and move with great dignity toward the door.)

Aunt Mary (putting out her head). Agnes! If you must forget your aunt, at least remember your child.

Mrs. Roberts (running back in an agony of remorse). Oh, baby, did I forget you?

Campbell. Oh, aunty, did she forget you? [He runs back, and extends his arms to his aunt.] Let me help you down, Aunt Mary.

Aunt Mary. Nonsense, Willis. Send the Porter.

Campbell (turning round and confronting THE PORTER). He was here upon instant. Shall he fetch a step-ladder?

Aunt Mary. He will know what to do. Go away, Willis; go away with that child, Agnes. If I should happen to fall on you—(They retreat; the curtain drops, and her voice is heard behind it addressing THE PORTER.) Give me your hand; now your back; now your knee. So! And very well done. Thanks.—Harper's Christmas.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

A Popular Old Story.

There lived once a planter,
With a son, his only love;
To whom, upon his birthday,
A brand new axe he gave.

The planter had a garding,
All filled with apple trees,
Which for the city market
He was trying for to reeze.

The boy he takes the hatchiet,
Quite jolly and jocund;
And going to the apple trees
He chops them to the grund.

The father called his servants
And ranged them in a row;
"Who has chopped down my apple trees
And killed them root and bow?"

The servants stand amazed,
All drawn up in a line;
Then comes a-running up to him
His young and youthful sine.

"I can not tell a lie, pa-pa."
The youthful boy begun;
"Twas I that chopped the apple trees;
'Twas I, your little son."

Now, who, then, was this fathier,
And who his filial kin?
It was the noble Bushrod,
And young G. Washington.

MORIAL.

Then who's takes a hatchiet
And apple trees chops down,
If he lives long enough will be
A great and pious mown.

Broke.

Broke, broke, broke!
I have squandered the uttermost sou,
And have failed in my efforts to utter
One trivial, last I. O. U.

Oh, well for the infant in arms
That for ducaes he need not fret;
Oh, well for the placid corpse
That he's settled his final deb.

And dun after dun comes in,
Each bringing his little account;
And oh, for the touch of a five-dollar bill,
Or a check for a large amount!

Broke, broke, broke!
My course as a student is run;
I'll back to my childhood's home and act
The rôle of the Prodigal Son.

—A Busted Liar.

Electrical Phenomenon.

The operator sat in a cane-bottom chair,
Clean was his face, and parted his hair
In the middle.
Now and anon he smiled very sweet,
As some young lady his vision would greet,
And a big Italian was out on the street
Playing a fiddle.

He played all the airs that he ever knew—
Some that were ancient, and then a few
That were older.

But the operator's heart was cold as stone;
It couldn't be reached with a big cyclone;
He thought of nothing but himself alone,
And the Italian grew bolder.

Up to the window the Italian went,
And over the sill he gracefully bent,
A bright fantasia playing;
Little dreamed he of the terrible fate
That under the table was lying in wait—
Two small wires, which ran to a plate
On which two coins were laying.

Then there came an unearthly yell,
As on the sidewalk the Italian fell,
Dying a second after.
But the operator sat in his cane-bottom chair,
Gently brushing his flaxen hair,
Looking at space with a vacant stare,
While I was convulsed with laughter.

The Little Banana Peel.

Like a bar of beaten gold
I gleam in the summer's sun;
I am little, I know, but I think I can throw
A man that will weigh a ton.
I send out no challenges bold,
I blow me no vaunting horn,
But foolish is he who treadeth on me;
He'll wish he had ne'er been born.

Like the flower of the field, vain man
Goeth forth at the break of day,
But when he shall feel my grip on his heel
Like the stubble he fadeth away;
For I lift him high up in the air,
With his heels where his head ought to be;
With a down-coming crash he maketh his mash,
And I know he's clear gone upon me.

I am scorned by the man who buys me;
I am modest, and quiet, and meek;
Though my talents are few, yet the work that I do
Has oft made the cellar doors creak.
I am a blood-red republican born,
And a Nihilist fearless I be;
Though the head wear a crown, I would bring its pride down
If it set its proud heel upon me.

LITERARY NOTES.

"Under Green Apple Boughs," by Helen Campbell, first appeared in Our Continent. It is a story the scene of which is laid in Long Island, and into which a variety of characters are introduced. The plot is rather good, and at times quite strong. Howard Pyle's illustrations add much to the volume. Published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; for sale by Billings, Harboure & Co.; price, $1.

Last Christmas time there was published a pretty book entitled "Young Americans in Japan," which attracted considerable attention. It was written by Edward Greely, who has now issued its fellow under the title of "The Wonderful City of Tokio." The volume is charmingly bound and illustrated, being a fitting setting to the interesting narrative. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by C. Beach, 107 Montgomery Street; price, $1.75.

"Mr. Stubb's Brother" is a sequel to the charming "Toby Tyler," which so delighted its juvenile readers a year ago. Both stories first appeared in Harper's Young People and have been published with their original illustrations. The pictures accompanying the present volume are equal in cleverness to the story itself. Pathos and humor are blended in every page. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.00.

The latest number of the "Nature Series" is an essay by George F. Romanes, LL. D., the Zoological Secretary of the Linnean Society in London. It is entitled the "Scientific Evidences of Organic Evolution." It is the reproduction of a lecture delivered before the Edinburgh and Birmingham philosophical institutions, which the late Mr. Darwin persuaded him to issue in book-form. Published by Macmillan & Co., London and New York; for sale by the booksellers; price, 50 cents.

Ernest Ingersoll has long been a contributor to Harper's Magazine and many Eastern journals on the subject of life in the "New West." He has now collected his material and issues it in book-form under the title of "Knocking About the Rockies." Many of the descriptions remind one somewhat of Ross Browne's style, although they do not equal the better portions of that writer's work. The illustrations are, as a rule, well executed. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; for sale by Bancroft.

"From Egypt to Canaan" is a review prepared by J. R. Whitney of six months of the "International Sunday-School Lessons." Published by the American Sunday-School Union, at Philadelphia. The sermon preached by the Rev. H. W. Beecher on October 12th is out in the Plymouth Pulpit, published by Fords, Howard & Hulbert, New York; price 7 cents. "The Right Word in the Right Place" is a little handy-book of synonyms, prepared and published by C. Beach, 107 Montgomery Street; price, 10 cents.

"The Boy Travelers in Egypt and the Holy Land," by Thomas W. Knox, is the last number of the "Far East Series." The author has had long experience with Oriental nations, and hence his descriptions are not those of a mere novice, but of one who has a good acquaintance with what he undertakes to portray. This book will be particularly interesting at this time because of the attention which has just been directed toward the land of the Nile. The illustrations are numerous, and the Egyptian binding very elegant. Published by Harper & Brothers; for sale by Bancroft; price, $3.

Doctor Edmund H. Sears is known on this coast but to the favored few who have chanced to read his books. As a philosopher and religious thinker he has hardly been equaled in his day, and his untimely death in 1876 was a loss to his followers in every religious sect; for he might be said to belong to the "universal church." The Argonaut, in 1879, had one of his many beautiful poems set to music, and published it in the Christmas number of that year. It is entitled "That Glorious Song of Old." The same poem has now been printed in book-form, accompanied by tasteful illustrations made by Alfred Fredericks. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by C. Beach, 107 Montgomery Street; price, $1.50.

The North American Review numbers in its table of contents a symposium on "The Health of American Women," regarded from three distinct points of view, by Doctor Dio Lewis, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Doctor James Read Chadwick. Governor Buren R. Sherman, of Ohio, writes of the "Constitutional Prohibition." General Grant has an article entitled "An Undeserved Stigma." Richard A. Proctor writes of "The Influence of Food on Civilization," discussing, with much learning and force, some of the most interesting sociological problems of the present day and of the near future. Finally, there is a symposium upon the conditions of "Success on the Stage," the contributors being six—John McCullough, Joseph Jefferson, Madame Modjeska, Lawrence Barrett, Maggie Mitchell, and William Warren.

The third edition, revised and corrected, of the translation of "The Odyssey" of Homer, made by S. H. Butcher, of Oxford, and Andrew Lang, the poet, is just out. It is in prose, and proves far superior to any poetical translation ever made. Both authors are thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the epic, and have preserved the picturesque Greek phraseology and expressive adjectives, such as "fair-lying," "fair-tressed," "honey-sweet," "goodly grained," "mountain-bred," "winged words," "dark-prowed," "wide-veined earth," and numerous other expressions, which lend a charm of their own to the music of the original. The notes are many, and are carefully made. The book is prefaced and finished by Mr. Lang's two exquisite sonnets on this subject. Published by Macmillan & Co., London and New York; for sale by the booksellers; price, $1.

Miscellany: The verse of the late Hungarian poet and patriot, Janos Arany, is little known outside the borders of the land he loved, only a little of it having been translated into German. An immense circle of admirers have regarded him as the first of the contemporary Magyar poets. That Tennyson is too great a poet to permit of such subordination to the composer as is necessary in a song put to music, was the opinion of Raff, the late distinguished musician. He said to a friend last spring that neither of his two settings of "Tears, Idle Tears," satisfied him, because, as he declared, "I grew thought-heavy myself in making them." The French translation of Mr. Mallock's "Is Life Worth Living?" has reached a second edition. "Democracy," after being a subject of chuckling and self-righteous praise from the English journals, has just received a snub from the London Standard. This calm critic calls it an "immensely over-praised and over-puffed" book, and one which, "thanks to its pretentious title, has been too much regarded from a purely political point of view," and which contains "some moderately clever, and among the female personages one or two rather delicately touched, sketches of character." Mr. T. B. Aldrich is quoted by the Boston correspondent of the Chicago Tribune as saying that "Mr. Howells never succeeds in portraying a villain. Bartley Hubbard is, after all, the best man in the book. He has kindly impulses; he goes out and buys his wife clothes, which, I am sure, is more than most men would do; and for my part I think he is far above the priggish lawyer or that morbid Halleck." Mr. Thaxter is giving in Boston a new series of readings from Robert Browning's poems. The first edition of Miss Oliver's biography of Maria Edgeworth was exhausted on the day of publication, to the surprise of the delighted publishers. The second edition is nearly ready. It is possible that the quick sale of the books of biography published during the past two years indicates that the evil of too many cheap novels has brought its own cure. A surfeit of jam sometimes taste for good roast beef.

Apropos of Mrs. Price, one of the professional beauties, the Boston Courier quotes from a private letter: "I saw Mrs. Price the other day. She is one of the most lovely women I have ever seen, and for once my anticipations, roused by the photographs I had seen of her, were fully realized. She is neither thin nor stout, tall nor short; but unites all the virtues of each one of these qualities. Her features are not quite classic, but are more full of life and expression than purely classic features ever are. The mouth is very sweet in its expression, and the great deep blue eyes have something childlike and appealing in them. She was dressed in a Jersey of dark olive green, which suited her to perfection, as did her poke bonnet of the same color, and a great bunch of yellow primroses at her waist."

SOCIETY.

DEAR BESS: The barometer of the social atmosphere rises in proportion as the inclinations are festive. The present indications are that ours is in the ascendant with the approach of the holidays and the new year. The much-talked-of Robinson reception seems to have given an impetus to future gayeties, which are being modestly approached by a succession of dinners, luncheons, kettle-drums, concerts, musicales, and receptions.

Following the De Guigné musicale, the Parrott mansion was the scene of a second festivity in the form of a select dinner given to Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Donahue on Tuesday, the twenty-first instant. The repast was all that the culinary art, good service, and good taste could suggest. The guests were Mr. and Mrs. Joseph A. Donahue, Mrs. and Miss McDowell, Mr. Henry McDowell, General and Mrs. Barnes, Major and Mrs. Rathbone, Doctor and Mrs. Duprey, Mr. A. D. Dick, and Mr. E. N. Greenway. Thursday, the twenty-third instant, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Haggin also entertained at dinner twenty guests as a farewell to Mr. and Mrs. A. Haggin, who returned East Saturday, chaperoning Miss Nina Platt. The guests, besides members of the family, consisted of Mr. and Mrs. Sillem, Mr. and Mrs. Bland, Mrs. Breckinridge, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mr. Harry Tevis, Mr. L. Haggin, Mrs. Monroe Saulsbury, Doctor Bowie, Mr. and Mrs. McAfee, Mr. and Mrs. Withington, Mr. and Mrs. Willie Howard, and Mr. W. Jones.

Among the luncheons most noticeable was one given by Mrs. Alpheus Lewis, at the Baldwin, served in a private parlor of the hotel. Among the guests were Mrs. Governor Johnson and daughter, Mrs. John McMullin, Mrs. Wallace and daughter, and Mrs. Marshall, wife of the Attorney-General elect. By the way, Mrs. Marshall proposes chaperoning, besides Miss Nellie, Miss Belle Wallace and Miss Bettie McMullin at the inaugural hall, which promises to be a brilliant affair. A luncheon was given on the same day by Mrs. de la Montanya to the lady participants of her booth at the Authors' Carnival—the pretty milkmaids. After the collation, Mrs. Montanya presented the milk-pails to the young ladies, as a souvenir of both the Carnival and lunch. On Thursday afternoon, the 23d instant, Mrs. Monroe Saulsbury, entertained a number of friends at a three-o'clock lunch. It might almost be termed a kettle-drum, from the fact of the ladies attending in elegant carriage dress, without removing their bonnets, if it were not for the limited number invited and the substantiality of the edibles. Among those present were Mrs. Judge Thornton, the Misses Thornton, Mrs. William M. Gwin, Miss Gwin, Mrs. Glascock, Mrs. Tevis, Mrs. Withington, Mrs. J. C. Flood, Miss Jennie Flood, Mrs. E. J. Coleman, Mrs. R. C. Hooker, Mrs. Breckinridge, Mrs. Henry Norton, and others. Mr. Henry Casanova, on the same evening, dined some of his compatriots, among whom were some of our prominent citizens. Apropos of Italian entertainments, Tuesday evening last Signor Speranza gave a recital of Italian music, which was well attended. A concert is in rehearsal for to-morrow evening, under the auspices of Consul and Countess Lambertenghi, in aid of the Italian sufferers. The leading Italian talent have volunteered, and it promises to be an occasion of much brilliancy.

The concert given on the 23d instant, at the First Congregational Church, complimentary to Mrs. L. P. Howell and Mrs. A. E. Stetson, attracted a large and fashionable attendance. The programme was composed of varied and popular numbers. The Orchestral Union reflected great credit on itself by its intelligent and effective accompaniment, while Mr. Samuel Mayer officiated in masterly style at the organ. One of the interesting features of the evening was the revelation that the pastor, Mr. Barrows, was possessed of a fine tenor voice. Mrs. Charles Shaw (née Towne) accompanied Miss Hattie Rice in a rendition of "Judith," and Mrs. Howell and Mrs. Stetson, the beneficiaries, sang some much-applauded selections from their répertoire.

Great numbers of our French society assembled at Platt's Hall on Sunday, the occasion being a concert under the auspices of the Ligue Française, in aid of the French Library. Although an amateur affair, it was possessed of much artistic merit.

The kettle-drum of Monday at B'nai B'rith Hall, in aid of one of the private charities of the city, was the notable feature of the week. The hall appeared at its best advantage, arrayed in its festive garb. The decorations of flags and greens were as profuse as they were tasteful in their arrangement. A beautiful arbor of smilax in front of the stage was occupied as a floral booth, and was presided over by Miss Bessie Sedgwick, Miss Babcock, Miss Lucas, and several others of our fashionable belles. The bouquets were lovely and tempting enough to add greatly to the coffers of the charity. On the sides of the hall were arranged tables for tea, coffee, and lemonade, waited on by bevy of pretty girls, who relieved one another as the inspiring music of the First Artillery Band induced each in turn to engage in the lively measures of the dance. The gallery seemed a brilliant frame to the fashionable assemblage below. The guests were all in elegant calling costume, while those who officiated were in evening dress. In spite of the arrangements being of so elaborate a description, the total expense was but twenty-five dollars, owing to numerous contributions, while the net receipts were eight hundred and fifty dollars. The hours were from eight to eleven. Among those present were Mrs. McDowell, Mrs. F. F. Low, Mrs. Richard Ogden, Mrs. Montague, Mrs. and Miss Flood, the Blandings, the Eyres, Mr. and Mrs. Sam Wilson, Mrs. Lloyd Tevis, Mrs. Alfred Tuhbs, Mr. and Mrs. Julius Reis, Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Pixley, Mr. Jerome Lincoln, Mr. and Mrs. N. G. Kittle, General and Mrs. A. V. Kautz, Mrs. John Kittle, Mrs. Charles Keeney, Mrs. Jarboe, Mrs. R. C. Hooker, Mr. and Mrs. J. B. Haggin, Mr. and Mrs. L. Gerstle, Mrs. S. O. Hunt, Mr. and Mrs. Freeborn, Mr. and Mrs. de Guigné, Mrs. Easton, Mrs. J. L. Coleman, General and Mrs. W. H. L. Barnes, and Mrs. Atherton.

Under the régime of Mrs. General Stoneman, there is no doubt that social affairs in Sacramento will receive a marked impetus. The lady is eminently fitted, in many ways, as a society leader. She will find a useful lieutenant in Mr. H. Dam, who has received from the general the appointment of Executive Secretary. This young gentleman, who has combined the rôle of a society man with that of a clever writer in this city, will doubtless in his new residence be able to do as much in his social capacity for the Governor's lady as in his official one for the Governor. His native diffidence he must overcome, and assume self-confidence if he have it not.

Before closing, dear Bess, I must give you a brief account of the wedding of one of our San Francisco belles—an heiress—who was recently married in New York. Miss May Crittenden was united to Timothy Hopkins, on last Monday evening, at St. Thomas Church, Rev. Doctor Platt, formerly of Grace Church, officiating. The bridesmaids were Miss Hattie Crocker, Miss Easton, and Miss Mary Miller; the groomsmen, Arthur Lockwood, William M. Newhall, and William Crocker. The bride's dress was of cream-colored satin, elaborately trimmed with point lace, and veil of same, reaching to the bottom of the dress. The garniture was composed of orange blossoms, with a most complete parure of pearls and diamonds, consisting of tiara, necklace, bracelets, ear-rings, and brooch. The ceremony was followed by a reception at Mrs. Hopkins's rooms at the Windsor, which were elaborately decorated with exotics. A reception will be tendered the newly married couple December 28th, at the Hopkins mansion on Nob Hill. Among the guests were Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Huntington, Miss Huntington, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Crocker, Mr. and Mrs. D. O. Mills, Ogden Mills, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Iverson, Mr. and Mrs. James Parsons, Mr. and Miss Livingston, Miss Barrett, Mr. Eugene Dewey, Mrs. Mark Shiley Severance, Cyrus W. Field, David Dudley Field, Mr. and Mrs. Gulliard, and Lloyd Tevis.

Next week, what with the Philharmonic of Friday, the hops at the Presidio and Beresford House the same evening, our society world will be kept on the alert.

I will now abruptly leave the doings of society, and give you a little idea of what people are wearing. Thanks to art and art critics who discuss dress from their standpoint, the subject of personal adornment is being agitated as much as household decoration. Tea gowns have been adopted in England, precluding the use of the corset, though with what permanency and popularity remains to be seen. While the older members have been hesitating on the verge of what to adopt, the styles for children have assumed a decided Kate Greenaway tendency. A quaint costume for garden party is a foulard in red and blue porcelaine shades, trimmed with Russian lace darned in red and blue. The parasol and hat correspond. The Americans and Russians have always been accorded the most brilliant toilettes in the Bois de Boulogne or in the Allée des Acacias—toilettes that a Parisienne would reserve for a dinner or reception. A revival of masculinity in dress has been adopted by some, while the Anglo-mania seems to have seized others (which, by the way, is periodical in France) to the extent of copying their dress, habits, and even bad manners. While the hunt is becoming a popular pastime in France, falconry is being revived in England to a degree which may influence us to its adoption, ever ready as we are to affect anything and everything English. The condition of affairs has become such, that nothing less than a nobleman will do for our girls. Our drives and promenades are filled with all sorts of most uncomfortable and unsuitable turnouts, in preference to our own of light and elegant make. The very air breathes of ritualism, æstheticism and other Anglo-isms; and even exclusiveness and frigidity become good form. We may congratulate ourselves in this respect, being so remote from the great centres as not yet to have become so thoroughly imbued with the sentiment.

Not to allow my vagaries to carry me off, let me return to my subject of dress. A novelty in furs has been introduced, rendering undressed seal desirable, as being possessed of a curious little crinkle, which disappears in its being dyed. Otter and monkey skins are also worn, though expensive. Yellow is the prevailing tone in furs, most probably owing to Oscar Wilde's appearing in a pea-green ulster, lined with yellowish fur. In jewelry the most fashionable is of garnet and turquoise, with heads of Limoges enamel, mounted in an antique silver-setting. Fans, with sticks to correspond in color, are very unique, and those of mother of pearl are susceptible of the loveliest iridescent shades.

Evening wraps are of long Japanese shape and of plush in pale tints, with either trimming of white lambskin fringe, or bordering of white and gray dove feathers. Of dress materials, velvets and plain silks are being revived. Stationery, especially of English origin, is still in tinted shades and of æsthetic design, displacing the daffodil, poppy, corn-flower, and even the lily and sunflower. Wedding papeterie possesses appropriate devices in orange blossoms. Apropos to wedding-cards, a most novel and amusing invitation to a recent wedding was worded: "Mr. and Mrs. — request your presents at the marriage of their daughter."

Well, Bess, the subject of dress being such an ever-varying and endless one, I fear it would take one of more mobility than I am possessed of to do it justice. So, with love, au revoir. DORA.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 28, 1882.

Notes and Gossip.

Miss Ashe, Miss Babcock, and Miss Hubbard have returned from Monterey. Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sontag will return from San Rafael on Monday next, and take up their residence at the Palace for the winter. Mr. and Mrs. John Wadsworth, who have been visiting Monterey, have returned. Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. MacDermott will return from Oakland next week, and take up their residence at the Palace for the winter. H. D. Rideout, of Marysville, went East on Monday last to be gone three or four weeks. Mr. and Mrs. Watt, of San Rafael, have gone to Scotland. Moses Hopkins is visiting in Southern California. Mr. and Mrs. W. Easton, Mrs. O. W. Easton, and Miss L. B. Easton, have returned from Monterey. Miss Hutchinson has also returned from Monterey. Captain George H. Burton, U. S. A., and family, who have been at the Occidental for several weeks, have gone to Los Angeles to spend a part of the winter. Judge Sepulveda, of Los Angeles, is treating himself to a vacation in the City of the Montezumas. The Misses Corbett have returned to the Palace from San Mateo for the winter. The former New York residence of William H. Vanderbilt has been leased to ex-Governor Stanford, at one thousand dollars a month for six months, so good report has it. Mr.

and Mrs. A. N. Towne left here for the East on Saturday last, to remain away until the latter part of the present month or the first of January. R. S. Reid, U. S. N., is at the Baldwin. Lieutenant L. P. Cohn, U. S. N., and Lieutenant David Price, U. S. A., are at the Occidental. Lieutenant Chamberlain, U. S. A., leaves here for the East to-day. Mr. and Mrs. Frank Johnson have returned from their wedding trip. Senator Jones leaves for New York to-day, where Mrs. Jones will meet him, and they will then proceed to Washington; they will occupy the Butler mansion on Capitol Hill, and Miss Julia Sterling, of Napa, will continue to be one of their guests during the winter. Mr. Frank Livingston and daughter arrived from Europe on Thursday; they are at the Palace, where also is stopping Mr. Joe Livingston. Senator Fair will occupy the same apartments at the Arlington that he had last winter. The ladies of the Grand will present their first musicale on the eighth instant. Governor Pitkin, of Colorado, who hopes to be elected to the United States Senate from the Centennial State, is in Los Angeles grooming himself physically for the position. Mrs. Samuel S. Fearon, née Miss Emily W. Torbert, writes her father from China that she and Mr. Fearon will visit San Francisco in January next. Mrs. General Schofield will hereafter receive her friends at Point San José on Saturdays. Quite a large number of ladies and gentlemen of the city joined the ladies and officers at the Presidio last evening in making the second hop of the season a very delightful affair. A number of ladies in this city have received invitations to the hall and cotillion party to be given on the eighth and fifteenth instants. Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Earl and Mrs. C. J. Torbert have returned from Nevada. Lieutenant J. W. Dillenback, U. S. A., was at the Palace on Tuesday and Wednesday last. Miss Grace Eldridge is at present in the East, and will leave for Europe in a few weeks. Colonel and Mrs. Harry I. Thornton have issued cards for a reception at their house on Van Ness Avenue on Wednesday evening next, the sixth instant. In Alameda, on November 29, 1882, at the residence of the bride's sister, Mr. A. J. Greene and Miss Ella C. Megerle were united in marriage in the presence of the families and a few intimate friends. Miss Lisetta Megerle, a sister of the bride, assisted as bridesmaid, and J. W. Hayes aided as groomsmen. Many handsome gifts were bestowed upon the happy pair. After partaking of the wedding breakfast, Mr. and Mrs. Greene started on their wedding trip to Sacramento, the former home of the bride. Mr. and Mrs. N. A. Judd, of Oakland, have taken up their residence at the Baldwin for the winter. A fancy bazaar will be held in the parlors of the Unitarian Church, December 6th, 7th, and 8th, under the auspices of the ladies, assisted by a number of young ladies. An entertainment will be given each evening.

The First Regiment Masquerade.

Attention is at present being turned toward the expected masquerade ball of the First Infantry Regiment. It will take place on the evening of Friday, December 8. Some of our best known citizens are on the committees, and it will undoubtedly be a success. Special arrangements have been made for the tasteful decoration of the Pavilion, and the full regimental band, of nearly forty musicians, will furnish the music for dancing. Six hundred members of the regiment, together with the large number of outside participants, will make a grand march, which will rarely have been equalled in this city. The prizes number twenty, and are costly and elaborate. For club representations there have been offered special awards.

The Waring-Cole Wedding.

The marriage of Master Howard S. Waring, U. S. N., and Miss Lutie Cole, second daughter of ex-Senator and Mrs. Cole, of Los Angeles County, which was announced in the Argonaut some months ago, took place at the home of the bride's parents, at Cahuenga, seven miles from the city of Los Angeles, on Wednesday evening, the twenty-second ultimo, in the presence of the relatives and a few intimate friends of the family of the bride, among whom were Mrs. Whiting, (a sister of Mrs. Cole,) Mr. and Mrs. James Melus, Mr. and Mrs. James Howard, Judge Howard, Mr. and Mrs. Brown, and others. The bride, while a resident of this city, was a great favorite, and was both accomplished and beautiful. Master Waring is at present an officer of the Rodgers, and has been in the service fifteen years, having entered in June, 1867.

One of the Chinese students formerly at Hartford was understood to have been deeply enamored of a girl whom he met in society there, and to have had some expectation of winning her. But he writes back from China that he is involuntarily a husband. He found, on returning home, that his parents had chosen a wife for him. "I tried to break it off," he says, "but without success, as the Chinese consider an engagement of marriage the most sacred contract. If it is once made, it can never be broken. According to the Chinese custom the younger brother can not marry before an elder one. I have two younger brothers who have to wait for me to marry before they can. Therefore I was urged very strongly by my relatives to marry right away, so I consented. Of course, it is not a love affair, but I shall try to do my duty."

Patti, on Monday night, the fifteenth instant, received a letter in the afternoon at the Windsor, written in a bold and clear hand, which stated in concise terms that if she dared to appear that night in "Faust" she would be shot. It frightened her dreadfully, and at first she refused to sing; but eventually Colonel Mapleson overcame her scruples and she reluctantly and fearfully got ready. Inspector Byrnes was called and made the most perfect arrangements in his power. He and two other detectives took the famous prima donna from her apartments to her dressing-room in the Academy of Music, where two more detectives were stationed at the door. Other officers of the law were stationed all over the house, and Patti was guarded as though she were a queen, which was quite right, as she is greater than any possible queen. No one can account for the letter, and the liveliest sympathy is expressed for the little lady who was in bed all the following day from the effects of her fright. Nicolini, I state with acute pangs of surprise and remorse, did not shine to any great extent as a protector, and, indeed, seemed rather more terror-stricken than even Patti.

HAWAII.

Some of the Benefits Accruing from the Reciprocity Treaty.

The visitor to the Hawaiian Islands, upon his arrival at Honolulu, is at once impressed with the evidences of a happy, prosperous community, which abound in all directions. There is a goodly array of shipping moored at the various wharves, and what especially gladdens the visitor's heart, if he hail from the United States, is the fact that most of these vessels are American built, and that many of them sail under the American flag. Being the distributing point to the different islands, the commerce of the place is considerable, a large fleet of steamers and schooners being engaged in the inter-island trade. Along the water-front all is bustle and activity, while the business portion of the city, with its myriad of telephone wires, puts one in mind of a smart go-ahead American city, instead of a lazy, tropical town, such as Honolulu is generally supposed to be. Improvements are the order of the day. Beautiful homes are being constructed to meet the wants of a population increasing in wealth and numbers. Nor is this prosperity confined to Honolulu, as American capital has wrought great changes on the other islands. New plantations have been started, with their large and expensive sugar-mills and other necessary buildings; irrigation schemes on a grand scale have been planned and carried out; new towns have sprung into existence, extensive stores have been opened, wharves have been built, and railroads have been constructed to transport economically the increasing crops of sugar, while the telephone has established itself as one of the planter's necessities. Such, in brief, is the condition of affairs on the Hawaiian Islands—the beneficent fruit of the Reciprocity Treaty. A nation's wants and purchasing power increase with its prosperity, and as the Hawaiian Islands manufacture nothing, but depend entirely upon the outside world for everything, and as, by the terms of the treaty, many American goods are admitted free of duty, this prosperity on their part means more business for our merchants, manufacturers, and farmers. The people of the Hawaiian Islands devote themselves almost exclusively to the cultivation of sugar-cane. As their land is more valuable for this purpose than any other, they raise nothing in the way of hay and feed. The result is they depend upon our farmers for every pound of hay, barley, bran, corn, and oats that they need for their stock. During the year 1881, thousands of bales of hay, and millions of pounds of barley, bran, corn, and oats, together with hundreds of high-grade cattle, horses, sheep, and hogs, were shipped to the islands from San Francisco. Thus an additional and growing market has been created for the productions of our ranches. Our lumber-dealers must appreciate this market, if the millions of feet of rough and dressed lumber, and large quantities of flooring, laths, shingles, pickets, and redwood posts being shipped there are a criterion. Our jobbers of dry goods, boots and shoes, iron and hardware, groceries and provisions, and of other lines of goods, feel the effects of the treaty in increased orders from the merchants there.

With the starting of new plantations come orders for sugar-machinery—of which our machine shops have furnished over one million dollars' worth since 1876. Some sugar-machinery has been imported from Scotland, as a Glasgow manufactory is represented there by a resident agent, who is always ready to draw plans and give estimates of the machinery put up on the plantation. This firm also gives very liberal terms in the way of credit to reliable parties. This of itself is of great consideration to the planter just starting, as it costs him about as much for a sugar-mill as it does the silver-miner for his quartz-mill. Other items, swelling the imports from Great Britain—which are not quite one-fifth of the total imports for the year 1881—are the portable tramway, with its locomotives and cars, and the steam plow. An agent of the manufacturer of these articles has visited the different plantations, and as their use effects a great saving over ox-teams, both in the transportation of the sugar-cane to the mill and in the preparation of the ground for planting, they have been adopted by many of the planters.

Another gratifying feature of the treaty is the manner in which it has benefited our ship-building interest. In the year 1876 there were two regular lines of sailing vessels engaged in the island trade. Now there are five lines of sailing vessels and two lines of steamers, not including lumber vessels sailing from Humboldt Bay, Coos Bay, and Puget Sound. In the inter-island trade there was formerly only one steamer, where now ten steamers are plying. All the additional tonnage was built on this coast, by our ship-builders. There is also a line of sailing vessels from New York and Boston to Honolulu. Two magnificent iron steamers, for the rapidly increasing trade between San Francisco and Honolulu, are being built by Cramp & Sons, of Philadelphia, at a cost of one million dollars. The carrying trade between the Hawaiian Islands and the United States, being principally done in American bottoms, is another source of revenue to American capital. Marine insurance and the furnishing of ship's stores also yield their share of profit.

To show the increase of commerce, since the adoption of the treaty, between the Hawaiian Islands and San Francisco, it is only necessary to state that the arrivals and departures at San Francisco from and to the islands in the year 1876, number ninety; while for the first ten months of the present year they number two hundred and thirty-two. The wealthy islanders spend much of their money in America, as they frequently visit San Francisco and other cities of our country. Our railroads, hotels, and retail merchants profit thereby. Many of their purchases being carried away as personal effects do not figure in our custom-house statistics. Many of their children are educated in our schools. Nor are these the only benefits that our people receive from the treaty. The Reciprocity Treaty has opened an outlet at the Hawaiian Islands for American capital and labor. There has been of late a large immigration thither from the United States. American lawyers and doctors are to be found there practicing their professions. The schools, which are numerous, are filled with American teachers. Americans who have started in business have been successful, and American mechanics have found lucrative employment in their various callings. In fact, American influence predominates in official, mercantile, and newspaper circles. The prime minister of the kingdom, the judges of the supreme court, and many other government officers, are Americans. The great increase in the sugar crop during the past few years has been due to the investment of American capital, which has yielded handsome returns. Three-fourths of the plantations are owned by Americans and those who are in accord with American ideas. Thus it will be seen that the greater portion of the present prosperity of the Hawaiian Islands is enjoyed by our countrymen who have invested or settled there. Much of the money made by these people finds its way back to America for investment, and contributes its share to our revenues. The writer made the acquaintance of an old resident of the islands, an Englishman by birth, on his way coming from Honolulu. This gentleman told him that he had invested considerable money in improved real estate at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. In making a journey overland he had passed through that place, and was much pleased with its appearance. He thought it had a future; and, as he desired to make an investment in some growing city in the United States, on his return he stopped there and made the purchase alluded to. The profits realized by the American people from all these sources will almost offset the loss of revenue sustained by the Government through the operation of the treaty. Even were this not the case, our Government could well afford to pay for American supremacy on these islands.

The Hawaiian Islands, on account of their location, are destined to play an important part in the future commerce of the Pacific. Upon the completion of either of the Isthmus canals, they will lie in the direct route from China to our Atlantic seaboard and Europe. The maritime nation that then controls them will hold the key to the entire commerce of the Pacific. The Kanaka race is fast fading away. When Captain Cook visited these islands in the year 1778, there were over four hundred thousand people upon them. It is doubtful if the natives number forty thousand now. The day is not far distant when this race will become extinct; then, if our supremacy is maintained, the Hawaiian Islands will naturally become an American colony. With the exceeding fertility of its soil and its healthy climate, it is the best sugar country in the world, and here, if our government continue its present policy, will be the homes of thousands of Americans.

With the abrogation of the treaty, all the advantages gained through it will, of course, cease. And does any one imagine that, if the Eastern sugar refiners should succeed in their efforts to abrogate the present treaty, that our sugar would cost us less? It is difficult to understand how the resumption of duties on Hawaiian sugars can reduce the price of the refined article. This can only be done through competing refineries. The Eastern refiners, instead of seeking to abolish the Hawaiian treaty, should direct their efforts in extending this system of reciprocity to Mexico, Central America, the West Indies, Brazil, and to the other sugar-producing countries of this continent. Should such a system be established with these countries, the direct result would be the same benefits to our commerce, only on a more extended scale, that have been experienced since the adoption of the Hawaiian Reciprocity Treaty. For the year 1881 our imports from the Hawaiian Islands amounted to $5,954,990, and our exports to $3,171,852. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1881, our imports from Cuba amounted to $64,647,007, and our exports to only $12,153,059. From Brazil our imports amounted to $52,783,408, and our exports to only $9,252,415. Had our exports to Cuba and Brazil borne the same proportion to the imports that the exports to the Hawaiian Islands did to the imports, the value of our shipments to Cuba would have been about $33,000,000, and to Brazil about $27,000,000—a gain of millions of dollars, equivalent to half the bullion product of the United States for the year 1881, to our commerce.

In view of the threatened loss of a large portion of their Oregon and Mexican trade, through the near completion of other trans-continental railroads, it behooves the merchants of San Francisco to see to it that the our present growing commercial relations with the Hawaiian Islands are extended. Although the present treaty has been of great benefit to our merchants, there is room for improvement. All American goods are not admitted into the Hawaiian Islands free of duty. A considerable number of important articles are excepted, upon which a duty is collected. Among them are beer, fancy metal ware, carriages, ready-made clothing, crockery and glassware, drugs, fire-arms, furniture, hats and caps, jewelry, millinery goods, tinware, and wines. Upon the expiration of the present treaty, a new one should be made, more liberal in its provisions toward the United States, in which the Hawaiian Government should agree to admit all American goods free of duty, and also to make its tariff conformable to ours on all goods from other countries. The benefits derived from the present Reciprocity Treaty would then be increased, as the concessions on the part of the Hawaiian Government would give us the entire trade of the islands, instead of two-thirds, as at present.

They do these things better in France than in London. When the French troops came back from the war with Abdel-Kader the Boulevards were lined from one end to the other with the troops that had remained at home. The great Goldsmith, who was at that time the director of the opera, had the direction of the spectacle. The groups of cripples upon crutches, lame men with their blistered legs bound up in coarse canvas rags, blind men supported between two comrades, the officer with his arm slung on a cactus leaf, the Duke of Orleans himself, who craved compassion by his rope stirrup, having lost the steel one in the heat and fury of the melée—all was got up and combined for picturesque emotion; and the loud sobs and bewailings of the people produced far more effect than the loudest cheering could have done.

To all letters soliciting his subscription to anything Lord Erskine had a regular form of reply, viz: "Sir, I feel much honored by your application to me, and I beg to subscribe"—here the reader had to turn over the leaf—"myself your very obedient servant," etc.

A man who holds his opera-glass in both hands with his elbows sticking out on both sides is preferable to a lady with a big bat at the theatre. You can kick the man.

THE STORY OF THREE WORDS.

One of the editors of this journal possesses the most marvelous faculty of stirring up strife and contention. He can scarcely put pen to paper without raising a howl from somebody or something. When he writes, the office is deluged with angry correspondence. For this reason he is assiduously sat upon, and only occasionally lurks into print under various disguises. When he has accomplished one of these feats he shows signs of uncouth joy, and waits for the shower. It always comes.

Sometimes he fools with the proofs, and by the most minute of changes accomplishes his best designs. For instance, some weeks ago a harmless paragraph was copied from the Critic, stating that "most of Mr. Howells's title were taken from Shakespeare." The Evil Editor saw it. His eyes rolled stealthily around the room. He was unobserved. Taking his pen, he added three words—three little, simple words—yet oh, how fateful! These words were: "Give us examples." Having accomplished his designs, he sent the proof to the printer.

Mark the result. Those three words have set columns on columns of type on end; they have set rivers of ink to flowing; they have set scores and scores of people to ransacking their concordances, and kindly sending to editors information which they already possess. Fortunately, our friend the Critic is getting the most and the worst of it.

The sequel to the Evil Editor's illicit penciling was this: The Critic, amazed at our assumption and contemptuous of our ignorance, took up the gage. It proceeded to dig a literary grave for the Argonaut in the sounding sands of the possibly grand but certainly illiterate Pacific shore, and then covered the corpse with authorities. Dusty tomes, Shakespeares, concordances, and things were piled over our mangled and quill-pierced form. The Critic then erected a simple yet tasteful head-stone bearing the words:

Hic Jacet Argonaut, wiped its nose, and went away.

But from the depths of the tomb there came a faint squeak. The Argonaut was not dead, but slept. Like Joey Ladle, it had taken in knowledge at the pores, and rose like a giant refreshed. It espoused the cause of the Evil Editor, and after privately abusing him, proceeded to publicly defend him. It based its case on the incautious use by the Critic of the word "most." It proved in the most elaborate manner that "most" of Howells's title were not Shakespearean. It proved it by the multiplication table and the rule of three. Having delivered this sockdolger under the Critic's left ear, the Argonaut retired to its corner, and was soothed by its bottle-holder, the Evil Editor.

The Critic attempted to retaliate, but its sparring was wild. Its attention, too, was diverted. The awful three words of the Evil Editor were still working out their malefic task. A Baltimore paper got hold of the matter, and in the peculiar Baltimorean way, carefully misunderstood it. It accused the Critic of charging Howells with stealing his plots from Shakespeare. This the Critic, in a manner tinged with dignified sorrow, denied. The Baltimore paper, however, considering the denial a matter of not very much consequence, set up a straw Critic, attacked it in force, with serried columns, and routed it, horse, foot, and dragoons. There was much inkshed.

The awful boom goes on. The Springfield Republican and some other New England papers have it now. They are inundated with correspondence. Hordes of writers are explaining things which every one knows. The last number of the patient Critic contains some more letters explaining some more things to it which it knows perfectly well, yet which same things it explained to us when we knew them perfectly well, and which things we could not refrain from explaining to our readers, although we knew that they knew them perfectly well.

If he who makes three blades of grass to grow where but one grew before is a benefactor of his kind, what shall be said of him who makes so many words to grow where none grew before? Let him be cast into the outer darkness, where there is wailing and gnashing of teeth. ZULANO.

Harper's Christmas is at last out. It consists of thirty-two large pages, twice the size of those of the weekly. Among the contributors are George William Curtis, W. D. Howells, T. B. Aldrich, Mark Twain, E. C. Stedman, "Uncle Remus," Thomas Hardy, Harriet Prescott Spofford, G. P. Lathrop, Rose Terry Cooke, and Frank D. Millet. The illustrations are all by the following members of the Tile Club of New York City: Frederic Dielman, R. Swain Gifford, C. S. Reinhart, E. A. Abbey, George H. Boughton, Alfred Parsons, Arthur Quartley, W. M. Chase, Frank D. Millet, J. Allen Weir, F. Hopkinson Smith, and Elihu Vedder. The publication is printed in the finest manner, on paper of extra weight and fine quality. The authors represented in its pages are all American but one, and all the artists are Americans. Its flavor is distinctively American, and distinctively original. It is the finest Christmas annual of its kind that we have ever seen. Yet we do not think it will sell as well as will the Christmas numbers of the London Graphic and Illustrated News. Why? For three reasons. 1. Its price is seventy-five cents; theirs fifty; people in America will not pay fair prices for brains. 2. It is printed on fair white paper, and in black ink; they are printed on smudgy paper, yet in tawdry colors; people like coarse colored pictures. 3. It is in exquisite taste; they are in execrable taste; the taste of the masses is execrable. For these reasons, although we wish it well, we fear the sale of Harper's Christmas will not come up to that of its London competitors.

"THE LADY OR THE TIGER?"

A Symposium by Betsy B., Philip Shirley, Boutville, and Zulano.

That story by Frank Stockton in the November Century—"The Lady or the Tiger?"—has excited varied comment, and much discussion. Compressed to its utmost limit the story is this: In olden days, in a semi-barbaric but luxurious kingdom, a handsome youth was condemned to trial to determine his guilt or innocence in presuming to love a beautiful princess, who, however, in return, loved him. The trial was to be by a method peculiar to that kingdom: the accused was permitted to determine his own case by exercising his judgment in opening one of two doors leading from an arena within an amphitheatre, where all such trials occurred. Through a certain door, if luckily opened, came a lovely maiden, whom the accused immediately married, amid the merrily anticipated joy of the people over an innocence proved. Behind the other door crouched a fierce and hungry tiger, ready to spring upon the accused and destroy him, while the multitude observed this punishment of an established guilt with well-sustained emotions—which shall ever be the recompense of the righteous over the unrighteous. Our handsome youth entered the arena, and, turning to salute the king, saw by her father's side his love, the beautiful princess. He knew that by woman's wit and weight of gold she would have possessed herself of the fateful secret: "behind which door crouched the tiger?" She had done more; she knew what lady had been selected as the possible bride, and who then stood behind the other door. Alas! it was a lady of the court, beautiful like the princess; one upon whom the princess had, with quick jealousy, observed her lover cast glances of possible admiration and tenderness; one whom the princess suspected of having a preference for her handsome lover. The king, the court, the multitude, in breathless silence watched the youth; he watched the princess. By slight movement of her hand she designated which door he should open.

With an exercise of unsuspected genius Mr. Stockton leaves the story with the unanswered question, "Was it the lady or the tiger?"

I think she sent him to the tiger. After she became possessed of the secret of the trial, the princess began trying to determine to which door she should direct her lover. If ever her mind became agitated by a sense of duty—though what possible advantage there is in being a princess or a king, if such an one does not escape that most haggard demon of the mind, the "sense of duty," I can not understand—if ever, I say, her mind became thus agitated, she counseled herself in favor of the lady. At all other times the tendency of her mind must have been in favor of the tiger. Observe, I say, that she tried to determine to which door she should direct her lover. Of course she tried in vain, until the last, the very last, for the impulse—it could not be called a decision—that moved her hand, came and possessed her only as her hand moved. In the hours of wretched days and sleepless nights, before the hour of trial, the princess's mind was in constant contemplation of two pictures: one, her lover lost to her and in the arms of a radiant rival. That one fiercely tore and wrenched her heart; she suffered from her own deadly pain. The other picture: her lover's fair body fiercely torn and wrenched in the cruel embrace of the tiger; she suffered for his deadly pain.

To which of two kinds of suffering, of which we are capable, do the best of us give the most consideration—that caused by the wounds inflicted upon ourselves, or upon others? In her wild efforts to finally determine her action in advance, the princess was ever met and baffled by the consideration of these two pictures. She did not lose sight of them even when her lover looked up at her from the arena, but at that instant—the instant the fatal impulse moved her hand—a thousand details were added to one picture; the one which, if she gave her lover to the lady, would be forever hung upon her hed-chamber wall; woven, with all its possibilities of torture, of wrenching and tearing her heart—woven thus into the very curtains of her bed. If she gave her lover to her rival, even his love would turn to common gratitude—that frostiest emotion of the heart. If she gave her lover to the tiger, the colors of that picture would fade away with the stain of his blood in the sand of the arena; there would be no hateful colors woven into her life to constantly remind her of that.

A magnificent tigress of my acquaintance said, the other day, with sudden vehemence, after a long silence of indecision: "My heavens! it was the tiger that princess let go. Not for jealousy, nor any reason except that he was the man who could!"

I consider the blank too eloquent to be filled with words. Yet she who said this has great possibilities of tenderness, I think. She might stroke very tenderly a head laid upon her breast, and kiss it, too, perhaps. Was the princess else than this? BOUTVILLE.

It is a curious comment upon the general judgment of human nature that nine people out of ten who have read the November Century, and pondered over that strangely incomplete story of a barbarous tribunal of chance, will say that the lover of the princess was devoured by the waiting beast. Men say it with a fling at the inherent ferocity of women, and women with flashing eyes and clenched teeth, as if the barbaric instinct were strong in them, and their tongues longed to lap blood with the natural thirst of the primitive creature.

The many seem to think that the first impulse of a jealous woman, whether she be a fair-haired Saxon flower of civilization or a dark-eyed daughter of barbaric royalty, would be to give her lover over to death, however horrible, rather than to the arms of a rival. The jealous man slays the woman who betrays him. The jealous woman forgives the man everything, and wreaks her vengeance on her rival.

This Princess of No-land bitterly hated the beautiful young woman who trembled behind the fateful door, but she had little reason to doubt the love of the young victim in the arena. He was there for love of her alone, and their souls were tuned to such fine accord that he could ask and she could answer a vital question of terrible significance before thousands of gazing yet unseeing eyes. If she could have let the tiger loose upon the lady within the door it would have satisfied the savage instinct. But to give the body of her grand, handsome lover to the fangs of the wild beast, to be torn piecemeal before her eyes, when he was arraigned there for very love of her, could not be the instinct of the woman, were she barbarous or civilized. Her jealousy of the court maiden was but a vague and haunting fear, not deep and active passion which is stronger than death more cruel than the grave. Evidently she had never loved her lover for the glances which she had intercepted, for his trust in her was absolute. When with slight and subtle motion she pointed to the door upon the right, he opened it straight and unhesitatingly. Any man, whatever be his experience or his lack of it, fears the treachery of a jealous woman, and, beyond the face of this story, he did not know of his royal lady-love's suspicions. Besides, such absolute trust is sure to awaken some response, and no woman would have let even a faithless lover go to such a death, with such horror of her in his heart as such a death sentence would give.

Murder is rarely premeditated. When it is, it is generally for cold gain. Such fierce passions as love and jealousy flame into impulse, and the princess made her decision after days and nights of anguished deliberation. She had known what she would answer before her lover questioned her, and she answered as she had decided she would. Furthermore, her rival was hidden behind the padded door, and, in so much, there was safety for the lover, for there is something in the mere sight of a rival which inflames the mind to frenzy. Her days and nights of anguished deliberation could not conjure the misery which she would actually feel in seeing her rival in the flesh wedded triumphantly to the loving or unloving culprit of the arena. For, with her rival out of sight, she could always lay the flattering unction to her soul that the marriage would be but a loveless mockery, and this thought would lead to many more. For if the fierce tiger destroyed the tall, beautiful youth, there was only misery for her; while he might live to hate the bride forced upon him, and turn to her love, as before. It is not probable that the barbaric princess permitted him to live without an arrivée pensée. Barbaric princesses do not stick at putting rivals out of the way; and in her days and nights of anguished deliberation many schemes of relief must have started in her mind—the removal of her rival perhaps more often than any other. To permit him to open the tiger's door would have been to destroy all in a moment. To send him to the lady's door would have left hope still fluttering in her breast; and though jealousy be the master-passion of the human heart, hope always flies triumphantly over everything, and no human being ever willfully destroys it.

The story-teller has woven his tale so cleverly that one can not really discover whether the youth himself still loved the princess when he was arraigned before this awful tribunal. At all events, she loved him with barbarous ardor, but with civilized reason; for we are told that the king was but semi-barbaric, and that his imperious daughter was strikingly like him.

Since, then, her love was a flame fanned by reason and tended by hope; since her decision was the result of long thought, and not an impulse; since her true love sought her eye with unfaltering faith in the cardinal moment of his life; since his marriage might be only a form necessary to the salvation of that life; since her rival was but a dreaded, not an assured one—not immortal at that, and out of sight of her eye as well; since a woman always visits her vengeance upon the other woman rather than upon her recreant lover; since she loved him jealously, it is true, but ardently and well; and since it is the nature of woman to sacrifice herself, heart and body, to save her lover from peril—who will say that the princess's right hand pointed to the tiger's door? In the silent watches of the night, in her terrible communings with herself, she may have given him over to destruction a thousand and a thousand times again. But in that moment of awful suspense, when he stood between life and death before the waiting multitude, even though her decision had been against him—which could not have been so, since she did not change—all the woman in her would have risen against the horror of it, and with her jealousy crushed under her love and despair, her pale hand would point to the lady's door. BETSY B.

The princess shed no tears—tears died hissing in the fire of her semi-barbaric eyes, and fierce, convulsive shudders, during her torturing deliberation, left all her lithe muscles relaxed and exhausted.

Now that she was suffering for the sake of the man who loved her—suffering more because she loved him, and had his fate in her hands, and could not for her life decide it—in her rage that she could so suffer, she longed savagely for vengeance upon the man who could cause her this misery which every nerve in her resisted to the uttermost. And the vengeance was ready to her hand. She knew the tiger as well as the lady behind the fatal doors. She had stood before its cage feeling barbaric kinship with its treacherous beauty. Next to killing her lover herself would be the pleasure of seeing this velvet monster do it. Her mind dwelt with morbid fascination on the combat. How he would fight! She had not the least horror of depriving the man of his life—the motive that would control the Christian woman. Perhaps, too, the recent victims of the king's justice had all chanced upon the hymeneal door.

Had she been wholly barbaric, she could not have had the bitter sense of resistance and defeat in loving him either, which hurt her, being semi-barbaric and a princess. For this, too, she would punish him, since he was in her power. Only, when he felt that hot breath on his throat and looked his death in its savage eyes, would it not be his triumph that she had condemned him because she loved him too well to give him to another woman. Gods of semi-barbarism!

Her decision was made, but made conditionally, since she was a woman—made to depend upon the look in her lover's face when he should ask the momentous question on which his life hung.

She knew his face—knew its every line and change—and thought, sadly, how, when his eyes appealed, there was little in her gift that she felt power to withhold from him. But there was another expression that roused all the mutiny in her perverse nature. It would be difficult to accurately describe this unlucky look; but the element in it, unpopular with the spoiled princess, was the confidence in the certainty of her affection for him. When this was either gravely or laughingly apparent in the face she had studied "for many months," as Mr. Stockton states, the princess felt capable of rendering the man without extraneous aid from any tiger. She knew that if he looked up from the arena with the beseeching eyes whose memory often came to her subduingly, she would give him life, wife, and her own useless love forever. But if he dared—and her hands clenched furiously, and her whole frame grew tense again—to look with confident expectancy that, for the love she bore him, she would tamely resign him to that pitiful weakness, she herself to remain content with his gratitude—and she called this fine, rare virtue bad, semi-barbaric names—if he looked as if he believed she would spare him, she would show him his presumptuous error. Her reveries stopped there.

The poor lover had never plunged into these subtleties. Confident that the princess would discover the secret of the doors, he never dreamed that her mind could hesitate as to his fate. In his crude, masculine breast love was merciful and life was sweet. He would have given the princess to another man to save her delicate amber-colored flesh from a tiger's paws, and taken his chance of her love afterward, perhaps—though that is a step toward three-quarter civilization—and he believed that in so serious an issue the princess would do the same by him. It was, therefore, with perfect trust and in anticipation of speedy matrimony that his eager eyes flashed up to the royal "box," and "without the slightest hesitation," as we read, that he opened the door indicated by the princess, and—

It was the tiger.

Blinded by the sudden light, its first bound was at fault, and the man eluded it only so long as to lift his eyes once more to the face of the woman who had betrayed him—not with despair, but, with the whole great heart of him aroused with the very rapture of distorted devotion, that since she willed it so he could also die for her.

He died hard. He died by double death-warrant: of the king because he had loved the princess, of the princess because she had loved him. PHILIP SHIRLEY.

She was a woman—therefore she was jealous. She was a barbarian—therefore she was cruel. Which is the stronger passion in the female breast, jealousy or cruelty? In her who is civilized it is jealousy—it is stronger even than love. In her who is barbaric, her cruelty runs apace with her jealousy, and sometimes outstrips it.

What should she do? Should she send him to his death rather than see him in the arms of another woman? Or should she test his love for her by sending him to that other woman, and then prolong his suffering by the contempt which, being a woman, she could so well show, to one whose life had been hers to give or take? For to the barbarian nothing could be more galling than to know and feel that his life had been given him by one who pitied him, and that one a woman.

The barbarian mind does not bear with patience the thought of being saved by a woman from any bodily peril—more particularly by the woman whom one loves.

She mused upon this as she sat there. Was her lover a dastard? Would he take his life from her hands, and be content to lose her? If so, then was he unworthy of her—of her, in whose veins ran the blood of kings.

She was a barbarian, and it was not pity which made her resolve to point to the door where lay concealed the lady. It was a desire to test him. She was resolved that if he were unworthy of her she should know it—know it even at the cost of losing him. And the cruelty which was in her made her resolve that when he had his bride he should suffer more a thousand times from his old love's scorn than ever he could have suffered in the jaws of the tiger.

Her lover came. His eyes met hers as he saluted the king. What was there in her eyes that startled him? He saw that she knew behind which door lay the tiger. But he saw something else—he saw that she had determined to point him to the door where was the lady. And in those eyes there was a shadow of contempt which galled his barbaric soul.

What would you? Their loves were stormy, for they were barbarians.

She moved her hand. She pointed to the right. He opened the door.

It was the lady.

What did he do? Had he been of our time, he would have taken the bride that his love had given him to save his life. But he was not of our time. He was a barbarian. And the thought that he would owe his degraded life to a woman, and that woman she whom he loved, stung him to the quick.

He turned, and looked at the princess. If he had been before inclined to falter, the look in her eyes would have determined him. But he did not falter.

He bowed to the maiden before whom he stood, and—he closed the door. Before the wondering gaze of that vast multitude he opened the other door.

There was a roar and a bound—there was a crunching of bones—there was blood upon the thirsty sands of the arena—there was a hideous, mutilated Thing in the jaws of the beast.

He was only a barbarian—yet had he been born later he would have been a loyal knight.

He was only a barbarian—yet in his barbaric way he loved. ZULANO.

P. S.—It is only fair to myself to state that I do not believe any of the foregoing, and that I only wrote it because the editor asked me to do so, in order to "balance" the symposium. I have tried to do justice to the "lady" side. But in my heart of hearts I think she sent him to the tiger—and then wished she hadn't. Z.

A young New Orleans artist, who has just entered Julian's school of painting, at Paris, writes of his fellow-students: "They are very good-natured, full of mirth and wit, but of such a nasty sort as only Paris can create. They never say a serious thing nor utter a refined sentiment. Late one American girl had the courage and nerve to enter the school for men. She drew from nude models of either sex, and bore all the vulgarity and smoke of these Frenchmen, and was soon far ahead of them with her brush. An auburn-haired English girl entered into this crowded room. She worked hard and appeared to hear nothing."

The birth of a young princess in Spain recalls a curious custom of that court. When a prince or princess is born, the epithet "vigorous" is always added to its name. But on one occasion the youthful prince died immediately after his birth. The official announcement was made as follows: "Her Majesty the Queen of Spain has given birth to a vigorous Prince of Asturias, who lived only a few hours."

BULLS AND BEARS.

A Glance at the Private and Public Life of a New York Stock-Jobber.

The social season here is highly unsatisfactory so far. Not only is there great ambiguity as to its indications, but we are positively ignorant as to its very existence; that is, no one knows yet whether the season is under way or not. There have been no great social events, except a few weddings, and there seems to be no outlook for a decisive beginning now. This awful uncertainty is the result, I think, of the Langtry and Patti booms. Every one rushed into town to welcome the famous English-woman, and a week later to be present at the first great opera night. Now, for years the social season in New York has begun with the opera season, and social events have swung regularly into line after the start was made. This year, however, there was a sudden craze for autumn sports and rural festivities about the time the winter gaiety in the city should have been started on its yearly course, and society people kept out of town persistently. Country houses are numerous all round New York. They are very English in scope and intent, and their owners entertain largely. They have never been able to get enough guests at the tail end of the summer season heretofore, but this year they have been unable to accommodate the crowds that flocked in on them. So, on Patti and Langtry nights every one comes in town, and on the following day nearly every one goes out again. Each day, however, adds to the lists of people who are preparing for the winter's war, and diminishes the numbers of the rural contingent.

The season will not be fairly in motion before the first of December, this year. Five years hence the ultra-fashionable will not return much before Christmas. The one—I am afraid the only—benefit that we have derived from our systematic aping of the English, is this fashion of remaining late away from town. Life in the country houses around New York is not so charming as it is in England by any means; but it is still a very jolly way of passing the autumn months. The chief drawback to the enjoyment of suburban visiting here is the presence among the guests of men who are interested in the fluctuations of stocks, and who bring their business into social life. I have just returned from a five-days' visit at a nice old house on the Hudson, near West Point. There was no end of good people there; but the host was a "city" man and had four or five friends from "the street" visiting him. During dinner, which was always a most enjoyable meal, they talked constantly of financial operations, and never hesitated to stop in the middle of a game of billiards to argue over some infernal rumor, good, bad, or indifferent, touching the operations of Jay Gould or his clique. By the bye, a man who is a heavy operator in Wall Street, but hates the shop jargon of the place as much as I do, tells me that Gould is the best man on 'change to know, because he never consents to talk shop in private life. That's the only good thing I know about Gould.

These Wall Street men are very much alike. They all drink too much, and are prone to the use of slang to excess. Those staying at the country house I visited might have been taken for brothers. They all wore very shining high hats, and extremely narrow boots. They did not care for gloves, probably because they hide the diamond ring which every Wall Street man wears. The rings are nearly all alike. They have a flat, wide gold band, with a diamond set in so that the top will be level with the surface of the ring. On either side of the diamond there is usually a small emerald. They were introduced after their adoption by the French, who call them "glove-rings," because the diamond is set so low that the glove slips over it. The bulls and bears object to wearing gloves, though they always carry them; when they are not carried in the hand, they are thrust into the top breast or handkerchief pocket of the coat, so as to be visible, or are tucked between the buttons on the front of the coat. They are always in sight. The Wall Street man smokes constantly, and is guilty of puffing weeds with little gilt or red bands on them. The band is placed on the cigar to indicate its brand, which is usually expensive. The Wall Street man is fond of doing the thing which looks expensive, and hence he wanders about with the highly colored band on his cigar, and wears vast watch chains and fobs. Did I say wanders? It was a mistake; he never wanders, but moves with a brisk and business-like air. If he rises from his seat in Delmonico's to cross the café, he does it with a brisk and breezy swing. If he goes up the aisle of the theatre or opera, it is with the same quick and solid tread. He holds his nose pretty well up in the air, and uses one expression incessantly. This expression is: "No, I'm 'bliged."

He uses the word constantly while talking, even with ladies, and it becomes extremely tiresome, unless you interest yourself by counting the number of times he calls his favorite expression into use. He never walks up to another gentleman—for the Wall Street man, according to the broad American standard, is a gentleman—and greets him with the quiet cordiality that is vaguely described as "proper form." No matter where he meets his friend—be it at wedding, funeral, or dinner; among ladies, gentleman, or beasts—the Wall Street man always yells something that concerns the street. For instance, it will be:

"Oh, eh? U. P. Preferred, eh? Ninety-four. Well, I guess. Little slump, eh? 'Ave cigar?"

"No, 'm 'bliged."

Then the two heads go together, and the most astounding jargon ensues, relative to Northern Pacific Railroad stock.

The other night, at the opera, a tall and dignified man of perhaps sixty winters stood with a friend by the door, when an acquaintance, of perhaps sixty-five winters, came down stairs. As he reached the floor the dignified man caught sight of him, his face blazed with delight, and he yelled:

"Hay, petroleum the golden!"

It was a shout that could be heard throughout the entire length of the corridors, and every man looked around. The majority of them smiled, with great amusement, and the old gentleman at whom the remark was leveled shook his head and grinned, as he cried:

"Say nothing!"

"Shall I lend you a fiver?"

"No, 'm 'bliged."

Evidently he had been caught on the wrong side of the recent swing in the petroleum market, and suffered accordingly.

Wall Street men are good-hearted as a rule, and have a certain sense of justice and honor, which is not very well defined, but much talked about. The men of the Wall Street clan who were at the house I visited—you will perceive a determined attempt on my part to return to this house—talked with great gusto of their achievements, and, I am glad to state, spoke highly of each other, morning, noon, and night. Every other day they had to go down to New York to "look at things," and the host, with many excuses, accompanied them. They always returned in time for dinner, but it was utterly impossible to understand what they said, so filled was their talk with trade terms. They did not shine at night, except at poker. They played to win, every man of them, and an outsider was lost in a cloud of dust in bucking up against them. I know. I tried it. If anything was going on in the day time in the way of impromptu teams or archery matches, the Wall Street men came forward in a solid phalanx, and bet heavily on the result every time. They made pool-tables and won various amounts, from fifty cents to five dollars, from every one, including the ladies. However, they lugged vast quantities of bon-bons up from the city for their fair victims, and offered big odds on the next event to the men, so their popularity was great in spite of their success in winning other people's money. I found that they were men of shallow mental calibre, and thoroughly imbued with the notion that money was all in all. They often spoke of things ethical with a degree of obscurity positively astounding, and seemed to have no conception whatever of anything outside their own particular business. In subjects touching history, philosophy, or politics, they were not only entirely at sea, but admitted their ignorance with a degree of frankness bordering on the boastful. They seemed rather proud of a sentence, which they repeated with gusto forty times a day. It was: "Money makes the world go 'round, dear boy."

I confess that it surprised me to see them push their trade so boldly into private life, and I am sure it was often a great bore, and in every sense tiresome at times. Women treated them with great consideration, and smiled sweetly when they approached; for Wall Street men are far above par in the matrimonial market, and are eagerly bid in. But it was observable that women were easily wearied by them, and avoided long tête-à-têtes, or confidential strolls, rides, or drives. If you meet one Wall Street man, you know them all. I remember one day I was talking to the hostess on the tennis-ground, when the host and his friends came bustling in from town, after "looking at things." They climbed down quickly from the comfortable old "carry-all" depot-wagon, all talking at once about some remarkable coup of one of the monopolists, and gesticulating earnestly. In the course of time the youngest of them—a cleanly built, richly dressed, and stylish-looking man of about thirty-five years—walked briskly over to the hostess, dropped into a camp-chair, tilted his hat back, and said:

"Bill's asked Charlie up."

"Bill" was the host, and "Charlie" a prominent bank director and stock-jobber.

"Yes, I'm very anxious to have him visit us. He's very jolly," answered the hostess, sweetly.

"You're right—he is," said the youngest Wall Street man, impressively. "We were together in the old Twelfth Street school, and I know him like a book. He's the man who connected on Little Hannibal in the St. Jo deal, when the rest of us were asleep, and he had the laugh on us for six months. One of the best fellows that ever lived. Thoroughbred. Always holds up his end of the table, and can be found where you left him every time. Dare-devil, too. When we rowed together in the Dauntless Club two years ago, he pulled a stroke that knocked out every man on the river, and had a reputation for a fighter, too. Nothing ever stumped him. I've seen him walk up to a man on Broadway, when there was a crowd of the boys around, and hit him a clip on the back that would knock him shaky. Then he would hold out his hand, and say: 'Ullo, McAllister, 'ow are you?' The man would wheel around bent on blood. Then Charlie would start back, you know, as if appalled by the mistake, and say: 'By gracious, sir, I beg your pardon. How could I have been so rough? I'm very sorry, by gad!' The man usually felt like killing him, usually came around, and five minutes later Charlie'd be opening wine for him at Del's, and trying to get him boozed. Oh, he's eighteen carat every time."

That was a fair sample of the average Wall Street man's conversation. One other point that surprised me was the intense earnestness with which they talked about their clothes in the presence of ladies. The youngest man was complaining of his frock-coat, which was rather tight, when one of the others said:

"It serves you right, Mac. I'd no more patronize Jim Bell than I would Prouse Cooper. You pay just forty per cent. more for their names. What did he tax you for the coat?"

"Ninety dollars."

"Well, this is just as good, and it cost only fifty. I buy the goods from a friend of mine, who imports them, and then have 'em made up by a feller who used to be with Poole. It's nonsense to pay so much. Don't you think so, Mrs. —?"

"Well—er—yes; I suppose so," answered the lady addressed, doubtfully; and then the Wall Street men fell into a vigorous discussion on the price of clothing. Every man of them used that abominable word "pants," and I am not sure that they didn't use that other verbal abomination, "gents." However, they seem to enjoy life, and are certainly good-natured. Long life to them; but pray preserve me from their companionship, except at intervals of years and years at a time.

FLANEUR.

NEW YORK, November 23, 1882.

By a blunder of the printers in the famous "first column" of the London Times—which has been irreverently described as the "Hatch, Match, and Dispatch Column"—the headings over the lists of births and deaths in the issue of November 3d were transposed, and every one can picture to himself the melancholy record of female mortality which resulted. Probably the person most annoyed, leaving the editor out of the question, was the husband, who found the announcement of his wife's death "of a son," accompanied by the cheerful statement, "All well."

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Silence on Tap.

The latest wonder of the world has been discovered in the Yellowstone Park, by a person named James Carroll, who is said to be a reputable citizen of Helena, Montana. Carroll says that he was in a deep gorge. Around him was a scene of grandeur, towering cliffs and verdant vegetation. He sat down to wait for his friends, who were to follow him into the gorge. Everything was quiet. The stillness was oppressive. He determined to break the silence, but he soon found that he could not make even a crack in it. He called on his friends. He called again, and nearly shouted the top of his head off, but he could not hear the sound of his own voice. A panther was passing. Carroll seized his rifle and fired at the animal. Smoke came out of the rifle, and the panther crawled away wounded and bleeding, but no report came from the rifle; no sound reached Carroll's ears. If Carroll's statement was not substantiated by the evidence of others, we would believe that he was suffering from a temporary deafness, or whisky, or that he had cotton in his ears, but that hypothesis won't work, for his friends followed him into the gorge, and there they all stood and became red in the face, and got sore throats, in their efforts to have vocal communication with each other. But not a sound could they hear. The place was so packed full of silence that they could not hear a pin drop, and they had to use signs and the deaf and dumb alphabet to express their astonishment. They explain that some peculiarity in the atmosphere there makes it a non-conductor of sound. If this is true, and we have no reason to doubt the statement of Carroll and his companions, a long-felt want will be supplied. Companies will be chartered to can this valuable atmosphere, or to saw it off in lengths, pack it in saw-dust and ship it to the busy haunts of men in the East. In families where there is a baby, a barrel of it can be kept in the corner of the bedroom. By turning the faucet, the wail of the infant will be heard no more. Think of the soothing effect of a keg of it turned loose in a ward meeting! A person might squirt a syringe full of Yellowstone Park atmosphere on an organ-grinder, and all his soothing strains in a moment would be but "a melancholy thought condensed to air," or some bold bad man might go to, say, Talmage's church, with a can of silence, and a patent can-opener in his pocket, and the result would be that the sermon of the elegant contortionist would be a voiceless pantomime. We have ordered a keg of it for our own use, and it makes us smile to think of the embarrassment that will clothe, as with a garment, the first man who comes into the office to read us "a little thing he dashed off last night," and finds himself surrounded by the silence of the tomb as he claws around in search of his voice.—Texas Siftings.

The Nose.

The annals of surgery contain many cases where the nose has been cut or torn off, and, being replaced, has grown fast again, recovering its jeopardized functions. One of the earliest (1680) is related by the surgeon (Fioraventi) who happened to be near by when a man's nose, having been cut off, had fallen in the sand. He remarks that he took it up, washed it, replaced it, and that it grew together. Still, this is a little bit hazardous, and in warm weather the nose might refuse to catch on. It would be mortifying in the extreme to have the nose drop off in a dish of ice cream at a large banquet. Not only would it be disagreeable to the owner of the nose, but to those who sat near him. He adds the address of the owner of the repaired nose, and requests any doubter to go and examine for himself. Regnault, in the Gazette Salulaire, 1714, tells of a patient whose nose was bitten off by a smuggler. The owner of the nose wrapped it in a bit of cloth and sought Regnault, who, "although the part was cold, reset it, and it became attached." This is another instance, where, by being sufficiently previous, the nose was secured and handed down to future generations. Yet, as we said before, it is a little bit risky, and a nose of that character can not be relied upon at all times. After a nose has once seceded, it can not be expected to still adhere to the old constitution with such loyalty as prior to that change. Although these cases call for more credulity than most of us have to spare, yet later cases, published in trustworthy journals, would seem to corroborate this. In the Clinical Annals and Medical Gazette, of Heidelberg, 1830, there are sixteen similar cases cited by the surgeon (Doctor Hofacker) who was appointed by the senate to attend professionally the duels of the students. It seems that during these duels it is not uncommon for a student to slice off the nose of his adversary and lay it on the table until the duel is over. After that the surgeon puts it on with mucilage, and it never misses a meal, but keeps right on growing. The wax nose is attractive, but in a warm room it is apt to get excited, and wander down into the mustache, or it may stray away under the collar, and when the proprietor goes to wipe his feature he does not wipe anything but space. A gold nose, that opens on one side and is engraved, with hunter-case and key-wind, is attractive, especially on a bright day. The coin-silver nose is very well in its way, but rather commonplace unless designed to match the tea-service and the knives and forks. In that case, good taste is repaid by admiration and pleasure on the part of the guests. The papier mâché nose is durable and less liable to become cold and disagreeable. It is also lighter, and not liable to season-crack. False noses are made of papier mâché, leather, gold, silver, and wax. These last are fitted to spectacles or springs, and are very difficult to distinguish from a true nose. Tycho Brahe lost his nose in a duel, and wore a golden one, which he attached to his face with cement, which he always carried about. This was a good scheme, as it found him always prepared for accidents. He could, at any moment, repair to a dressing room, or even slide into an alley where he could avoid the prying gaze of a vulgar world, and glue his nose on. Of course, he ran the risk of getting it on crooked, and a little out of line with his other features, but this would naturally only attract attention and fix the minds of those with whom he might be called upon to converse. A man with his nose glued on wrong side up could hold the attention of an audience for hours, when any other man would seem tedious and uninteresting.

The question of the election or appointment of officials is an important one. If it be remembered that this government is neither autocratic nor democratic, but is a republic, it may aid some of our politicians to the solution of problems which now seem difficult. It is apparent that in our general, State, and municipal governments certain great and essential changes are to be made. The experience of the past demonstrates the necessity of a departure from forms and methods which have been long accepted and acquiesced in as impossible of modification. Let us first startle our readers by inquiring whether the election of the President of the United States by the people may not be dispensed with, and a better method be devised for filling the executive office? In a word, what is the necessity of the kind of President that we now have? The President, holding his term of office for either too long or too short a period, is clothed with powers not enjoyed by any of the constitutional monarchs. The quadrennial election is a period of political excitation that calls into active agitation all the passions of partisans, disturbs the legitimate industries of the country, puts a hundred thousand subordinate officials in anxiety for their places, and excites the hopes of ten hundred thousand other ambitious politicians that they may have some gain by the election of the candidate of their party. The mode of nomination by a national party convention does not represent the intelligent judgment of the voting membership. It results from combinations at Washington with the leading party men of State capitals and great commercial cities. The last Republican National Convention is an illustration of all the evils of a national party convention. The senators of the great States, fortified by the power of patronage, combining with the officeholders, securing delegates from the South who would give no electoral vote, disregarding the equity of district representation by massing their forces, undertook, through finesse, strategy, and dishonorable combinations, which involved the promises of the patronage of an administration to be created, to impose General Grant upon the people as presidential candidate, in defiance of their wishes, and in violation of time-honored national traditions. This conspiracy was defeated. It was by accident that it was not successful. It was a danger narrowly escaped, which involved the life of the republic and the permanence of its form of government. This mode of presidential nomination does not choose the great men of the nation, or the best men. Our selections of chief magistrate have been a chapter of curious accidents. On more than one occasion we have consigned our most excellent men to private life, and denied to them the legitimate, well-earned, and well-deserved honors of long, intelligent, faithful, and patriotic public service. On more than one occasion we have dragged up from merited obscurity the most undeserving of men. We recall the senseless campaign of log-cabin and hard-cider that elevated General Harrison from a log-house to the White House, for no better reason than that his latch-string, like all latch-strings of all Western cabins, hung upon the outside of his door. It was a latch-string which, being pulled, opened to the hospitality of cider, which was always plenty and always hard in the West. We recall the election of the rough-riding, ignorant soldier of the Mexican War. We improvised for him a military reputation which he had not earned; mounted him upon a battle-charger which we made to resemble the horse in Wouvernman's pictures—always white; changed his rough and vulgar language of the camp into the polite literature of war; did all this and elected General Taylor President. We drew Franklin Pierce from the obscurity of a village taproom in New England, to clothe him with executive power. Buchanan's election was the result of a successful political intrigue. Abraham Lincoln was sent by the especial providence of a good God to emancipate the slave, save the republic, and give us an opportunity to become worth preserving. Grant was an exhalation of the battle-field. The spiral columns of blue smoke from burning powder took the shape of a divinity, and we invoked it. First we worshiped, then endured, and then, like cannibals, cooked it. Rutherford was an accident—not a deplorable one. We may laugh at lemonade at state banquets, the vanity that bloats at a country fair, and the simplicity that characterized the administration; but national calamities never attend the administration of a President who is content with one term, and looks complacently forward to the time when he shall become the oracle of a village shoe-shop.

The administration of Garfield and Arthur is with us. Its history is not made. But from it we may draw a lesson which demonstrates that our government has not hit upon the best plan for President-making. Our suggestion is this: so amend the Constitution of the United States that the only government officials elected by the people shall be members of Congress. Let the Senate of the United States—elected as now—together with the members of the House of Representatives meet each two years in joint convention, and elect an executive officer, without the power of veto and without the power of appointing a cabinet. He shall nominate the leading officials as now, to be confirmed by the houses in joint convention. There shall not be a hundred thousand officials throughout the nation crawling on their bellies in abject terror of this executive shape. Subordinate officials shall hold office for life or good behavior. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the Senate shall be Secretary of State, because to this body is entrusted the treaty-making power. The chairman of the Finance Committee in the House of Representatives shall be Secretary of the Treasury, because in this body originates all financial bills, and from it comes the money-spending and taxing power of the government. Secretaries of War, Navy, and Interior should be chosen from the Congress with reference to their fitness and qualifications. The Attorney-General should be chosen for his learning in the law. Vacancies on the Supreme Bench should be filled by executive appointment, and when the individual has been once President he should be forever barred from the executive office. This is simple. It is the way we elect the president of a business corporation. The stockholders elect from their body directors or trustees. The trustees choose from their number a president. Then, putting their beads together, they appoint committees and assign to them the detail of work, to be supervised by the directors sitting as a committee of the whole. The people are the stockholders. The members of Congress are the chosen directors, and they elect one of themselves as President. This being our mode of President-making, might we not escape the intrigue of national party conventions; get rid of this curious piece of machinery known as the Electoral College; escape the passions of a Presidential election, the crimes perpetrated in Louisiana, Florida, and California, the perils that threatened us in settlement of the contest between Tilden and Hayes, and the uncomfortable memories arising from a contest that enabled the party which had the Presidential office to wrongfully perpetuate itself. The same general system, with such modifications as will suggest themselves, might be introduced for the election of State administrations. And here we shall be met with the counter-proposition that the Governor should be elected, and to him should be given a larger appointing power, and he should be held to a more strict accountability. There is an argument in this direction which we have not the space to suggest or controvert. In our judgment, it would be better to allow an elected legislature to choose the executive officers of the State for two years—choose the Treasurer, Controller, Surveyor, Secretary, and Attorney. Let the judges under all circumstances be appointed. An elective judiciary is becoming a contemptible thing. It has reached the depths in New York City, and at our last election in San Francisco we nearly touched bottom. We would rather have a judge appointed by the most corrupt President or Governor that it is possible to conceive, than to have him elected by the people at large under the most favorable conditions.

When we come to the consideration of municipal affairs in our great commercial cities, with their cosmopolitan populations, we meet a distinctly different condition of affairs. It is in these cities that our republican form of government is to meet its first strain. It is in the management of municipal affairs that our system is likely to encounter its first failure. So long as there shall continue to gather in our great cities a population so largely alien, criminal, impecunious, and irresponsible, as is now indicated, we are treading upon dangerous ground. Whenever those who have nothing and those who have lost the fear of law, and are not restrained by moral forces, shall outnumber those who have property, are obedient to law, and subject to moral influences, then chaos will ensue, and then the only hope of law, order, and property will rest in the superior authority of State laws and the higher powers of the general Government. The history of the city of New York is suggestive of dangerous future possibilities. The past history and present political condition of San Francisco are pregnant with hints of dangers that will demand all the genius, all the energy, and all the courage of our people to encounter and overcome. We have had sown among us the seeds of a communistic and agrarian doctrine which may yet produce a harvest of perils. Our last election is an advance along the very broad and very straight high-road that leads to the supremacy of the worst elements of politics. In our State politics a Democratic machine failed. General Stoneman was nominated, and the people triumphed. In city politics a Democratic machine triumphed in convention and at the polls. In State politics a Republican machine triumphed in convention, and was beaten by the people at the polls. These contests, triumphs, and defeats will unite the machines. Criminals naturally, mendicants necessarily, and demagogues deliberately, come together when there are spoils to secure and plunder to obtain. There will be no more party politics in San Francisco. It is from this time forth the people against the bosses, with the bosses united. The issue is for the people to preserve what they have and the partisan plunderers to steal what they can get. Hence, as we fear the time is not remotely distant when the combined political villainy of this city will outnumber and outvote the disunited decency of the community, we would take from the public the election of all officers possible. We would think our chances of good government greatly increased by concentrating ourselves upon a mayor. Elect him, give him a large appointing power, and hold him directly responsible for the proper administration of our municipal affairs. Let such commissions as may be created for the performance of public duties be appointed. Let the Attorney, Street Commissioner, Board of Public Works, and such like executive officials be appointed. Let all the judges, from Chief Justice to the lowest judicial position, be appointed. We would give the Mayor the veto power. We would have two Boards of Supervisors, and each should be a check upon the other, and the Mayor a check upon both. The question may be asked: If the citizens of the towns may not be entrusted with an enlarged elective privilege, why the country? Our answer is, that the average voter of the country is a better man and better citizen than the average voter of the great cities. We are not quite enthusiastic over the indiscriminate exercise of this highest prerogative of citizenship. We wish it might be limited to native-born American citizens, and only to such of these as have intelligence, property, and good morals. Popular suffrage, the right of trial by jury, the freedom of the press, and liberty of conscience, are all of them questions to be considered. Their inviolability is invoked by demagogues and criminals in the interest of bad men and bad government. No man without property ought to have any voice in the administration of that department of municipal government that assesses, collects, treasures, and disburses the public money. No immoral or ignorant man should have a voice in legislation, a place upon juries, or vote anywhere. Popular suffrage ought to be subjected to severe limitations. We know how difficult is the accomplishment of such a result; but this shall not restrain us from declaring that in the unrestricted elective privilege, in the unrestrained license of a vicious press, in the right of criminals to be tried by other criminals, demanding the concurrence of twelve minds to convict, in the indulgence of that liberty of conscience which covers double wiving and in the name of religion mantles all sorts of crimes—in all these things lies danger to our republican government. The most immediate danger is in the great cities, like San Francisco; and, should our opinion have weight with any charter-maker, we should take the liberty of saying to him: let as many of our offices as possible be appointive; clothe the Mayor of our city with large power, and hold him to a large responsibility. When the people come to the selection of a city government, let them choose their best man for Mayor, and look to him for the preservation of order and the protection of property.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

We are sincerely anxious to see the Langtry. It is merely vulgar curiosity, the same as it would be to see Jumbo the elephant, or any other spectacle out of the ordinary. Bernhardt came to this country as an actress; Nilsson comes as a singer; Oscar Wilde presented himself as a rare specimen of idiocy. We are curious to see all these various people, and we propose a special pleasure to ourselves in looking upon this beautiful thing that comes to us, stamped as a beautiful thing by the best society of the highest civilization of the world. A professional beauty is something that is to us altogether strange, and, as a novelty, we are sure to enjoy it. As a boy, the writer was always willing to expend his pocket money for spectacles. The side-shows of the circus were sometimes more interesting than the circus itself—the fat woman, and the boa-constrictor, the two-headed calf, and the "What do you call it." Now comes this woman; not an actress, but beautiful; the chère amie—that is, dear friend—of a crown prince. She is accepted in the best society that encircles the virtuous Queen of England because she was the dear friend of her royal prince. She is the one, par excellence, upon whom the critical of the super-critical classes turned their lorgnettes at opera and concert; the one upon whom the gaping, vulgar crowd gaped most vulgarly, as she rode in park or boulevard. This woman of shape and clothes we are curious to see; this woman who has made merchandise of her pretty face; this "lady," stamped and minted as genuine coin in the highest circles of the most refined class of the best civilization of Europe. She is not an actress, and not talented, and she comes to us not with her husband, and matroned by one who is not a wife, to show us her pretty clothes, and her beautiful face, and her shapely limbs, for coin. We shall pay the coin, and go as we would to see a sleek and glossy leopard with shining spots and lithe of limb, or stealthy, crouching panther, or lioness with mane and glowing orbs, or any other cat that would walk its cage with soft and velvety tread. And when we have seen her, we shall gossip about her, and get our money's worth out of her, and speculate about her character, and wonder about her life and her associates, and where her husband is, and why he is not with her, and what her relations were with the Prince of Wales, and whether Mrs. Wales cared, and, if so, how much; and about Mrs. Labouchère, and who she was, and what are her relations to Mr. Labouchère, and how he came to own Truth and to be a member of Parliament, and about Mrs. Labouchère's sister, and Mr. Labouchère's early life. We shall get down among the other bald-heads, near the orchestra, and see how much we can see of this beautiful spectacle, this woman whom we shall have bought and paid for, and about whom we shall, by virtue of that purchase, be entitled to gossip. We are anxious to know what is the standard of beauty for women. We have seen the famous beauties of the ancient world done in marble by the chisel of famous sculptors—the Venus di Medici, the Greek Slave, and Pauline Bonaparte of modern time. We have gazed upon the famous model artists of the Comédie Française and the Opera Comique. We have seen some of the noble and famous women of the world; some notable beauties who wear crowns—ber of Austria, the fair Margherita of Italy, and her majesty the Queen of Belgium. We have seen peasant beauties. We have seen the fair women of our own fair land. But in all our life we never saw a "professional" beauty, and we are most wildly impatient to see this accepted one, so that in later years we may know how to estimate the beauty of women by this stamped standard of an English professional. Society is a queer budget, and does queer things. It has queer conceits. It is savage and inexorable; is gentle and generous; runs to all sorts of extremes, and does all sorts of strange things. It will frown some poor unfortunate victim into the very outer shadows of complete and utter exile. It will shake the dust off its satin boots and draw in its embroidered skirts in fear of contact with some tabooed and suspected erring sister. It will open its great white arms to embrace some popular flaunting hawd, and take to its bare, panting bosom a man or woman whose touch is death, if he or she have been made respectable by genius, wealth, or royal stamp. Society will close its selfish ears and shut up its embroidered purse or bank-book to the cry of distress. It will drive in open barouche past poverty that starves and dies, or, in the frenzy of an aroused sentimentality, it will lavish its gifts most generously. Make it fashionable to give, and society will eat, drink, dress, dance, and pay—and all for sweet charity.

Our two themes run together. Beauty and charity met at the ladies' kettle-drum at B'nai B'rith Hall on Monday evening. It was a kettle-drum under the patronage of San Francisco society dames for the State Women's Hospital. The idea was, as we guess, the inspiration of Mrs. General McDowell and her daughter, who, on charitable things intent, gave society—our best society—an agreeable evening. In anticipation of the coming Langtry, we took a critical view of our young girls and young married women. We are fortified against any unnatural make-up, against paint and powder, sham diamonds, society airs, stage dressing, paid puffs in newspapers, big show-bills, photographs in shop-windows, or colored chromos; and we are prepared to say that Mrs. Langtry will need all the accessories of her reputation and toilet to get more than honorable mention in the sweepstake of prizes for beauty in a fair competition among our society fair-ones in San Francisco. This is as good an opportunity as we shall get to make some society observations that have been this ever so long a time clamoring for utterance. San Francisco ought to be the jolliest, foremost social city in America. Its people ought to have the best time. The kettle-drum on Tuesday night demonstrates what can be accomplished when really genuine sense is brought to bear upon the social problem. We have been, and are, all astray. Vanity and false pride are chargeable with some of our mistakes. Our millionaires have played the very devil with us socially. We recall the swell affairs of the last double decade. Ralston debauched social life by his swell entertainments at Belmont. His house, a palace in extent, his stables, with no end of vehicles, a special train, with hundreds of guests, a banquet fit for a Roman consul, wine in rivers, and all at a cost that would purchase a home for any but three per cent. of his guests. Mr. Sharon succeeding, we recall his more than splendid reception to the Earl and Countess of Dufferin, where champagne, feasting, music, dress, and diamonds made us all think we were earls and countesses at the court of a king. Other splendid entertainments by Senator Sharon might be mentioned. We recall the grand parties given by Milton S. Latham; the splendid receptions given by Major-General McDowell at his military home overlooking the waters of our Golden Gate and our beautiful bay; the gorgeous spectacles and magic beauty of the grounds and mansion at the receptions of D. O. Mills at Milbrae, with the sumptuous within-door entertainment and costly expenditure of everything that could contribute to the pleasure of his guests; the splendid party of Mrs. Hopkins at her palace on Nob Hill; the generous hospitalities of Charles Crocker; the royal banquets of Governor Stanford at his town palaces; the unstinted—and without making invidious comparison, we must declare the more satisfactory—mode of entertaining by the Floods, at their elegant country-seat at Menlo. All these have established a social standard that only those of abnormal wealth can imitate. It is imitated at a distance by us of lesser means, who feel the embarrassment of always taking and never giving, and this imitation is an overstrain. It strains the purse, and does not satisfy the pride of the giver. His comfortable house will not swell to the dimensions of a Nob-hill mansion, or a Menlo, Belmont, or San Mateo villa. His supper from the "Golden Poodle" is costly, but not gorgeous; and when it is mentioned in the Morning Call, among the tin weddings on Tar Flat, the good lady who has schemed, toiled, fretted, and gone to bed with a nervous headache, compares her really delightful evening with the entertainment of a railroad magnate or a bonanza king, and is unbappy, and never gives another. And then those of us down another round—not lower down on the social ladder, but down where the rounds are not golden—give a "party" to a "few friends." Our own kitchen turns out its terrapin; our own cook gets in a hired assistant, and our hired-girl gets a hired help. The mistress goes to the kitchen, the girls of the family are detailed for unaccustomed duty, the house is turned topsy-turvy. To save expense, the wife and girls go shopping among their trunks. We must have champagne punch, lest people should think we voted the prohibition ticket. We must have some macaroon pyramids from the "Golden Poodle" and colored creams and ices, lest people should think we are mean. We must have lots of things for show, lest people should think we are poor; and we must have more music than the house can hold, and then give up the whole space to the dancing brigade. The young girls think the world was created by an infinitely good God as a place to dance in, and the young fellows think girls were created by infinite love as things to dance with. When one gets too old to dance, or has rheumatism, sciatica, or gout, he has a right to bate all young people who dance, and he generally looks down upon the art with great contempt. But the music: we insist that a military band in a dancing-hall or drawing-room, that drowns conversation, and makes everybody wish they had cotton in their ears, is both barbarous and vulgar. We are convinced that the Chinese, after four thousand years of civilization and musical culture, have evolved the very highest order of music. We are certain that the music of the future is the one-stringed fiddle and the gentle tum-tum, with just an electric touch of the brazen gong to give spirit and measure to the music of the squeaking catgut. When Mrs. Olla-Podrida gives her next party, the head of the family will not compromise except upon a Chinese orchestra of the more subdued kind. There shall be a first and second fiddle of one string each, so that while the young people dance the elders may commune. Old age has its rights.

To get back to the kettle-drum. It was splendid. It was select. It was cheap. The supper was tea, coffee, lemonade, cookies, sandwiches, and stuffed-olives. Everything was cheap; tea or coffee, ten cents a cup, with a piece of gratuitous sponge-cake; lemonade, cold of ice and strong of lemon, ten cents; bouquets for boutonnieres, five cents; change invariably made; no cheating or swindling, even in the name of charity; no long dresses—not one in the room; not a single female so ashamed of her large feet as to cover them with a train; short frocks were the rule without exception; diamonds not conspicuous, as diamonds never should be on such occasions. The girls never looked prettier, the matrons never looked comelier, the gentlemen never spent their ten-cent pieces for tea and sponge-cake with a more princely generosity. Now, what was the charm of this real social success? We insist that it was because it was cheap, and because it was select. Everybody paid a dollar. Everybody was on an equality. Plain dressing was the rule. Nobody was over-fed. Nobody got drunk. Nobody went home wondering why Mrs. Jones was invited, or why Mrs. Brown was not. A great many of the very best people came in street-cars and in street costumes. The moral of this recital is in its application. This charitable kettle-drum, given at a public hall for one dollar to each guest, and which left a margin of profit for a most worthy institution, furnished the best people of the best society of San Francisco with an agreeable evening. If this is thus, then why can not a well-to-do person, living in a comfortable and roomy house, give cheap entertainments without subjecting himself to the disgraceful imputation of economy? Why not give cheap parties without macaroon pyramids or that same old candy ship from the "Golden Poodle"?—without oysters and terrapin stews for old bald-heads to stuff themselves with, or champagne for boys to get drunk on, or cigars for them to pack off? Why not tea, coffee, sandwiches, stuffed-olives, and a punch on the sly? Why not a couple of one-stringed fiddles, or, if that is too oriental, say two full-stringed instruments, to be played on a minor key with flute accompaniment? Why not earlier hours—say eight to come and twelve to go? Why not simple street-dresses, instead of this elaborate and costly expenditure that bankrupts husbands and sometimes ruins wives, that they may display trains of costly fabrics and jewels of rare value? Over-dressing is vulgar. To wear expensive gems, unless by the wives and daughters of the undoubted man of wealth, raises the suspicion that they were not honestly come by. It is not kind nor generous for any lady, herself entertaining, to be so over-dressed and over-decked that the poorer clad of her guests should be made to feel uncomfortable. There would be less display of gems and costly jewels, if from their glitter could blaze the story of their getting. Then why not a revolution in society and reform all these sbams, and have a good time? Let all the young folks and nice folks who are well-born and well-bred, who are fond of fun and like a good time, conspire together and give dollar parties, and invite all the millionaires, and all the old dowagers with jewels, and all the large-footed ladies with long trains, give them tea, stuffed-olives, lemonade, and sponge-cake, send them home at twelve o'clock, and if they get mad and won't come to such parties, then strike and refuse to go to theirs. The pretty girls and the common folks have the remedy in their own hands. A millionaire party is impossible. Millionaires can't eat, can't dance, can't dress, can't even promenade with comfort. A party of millionaires without pretty girls or the army and navy fellows, with a full military band and a swell supper, would be a thing to laugh at. There is more substantial and real pleasure at a common-sense gathering with conversation and peanuts, or at a dancing frolic with a fiddle and home sandwiches, than at the most elaborate of our over-strained and swell affairs. Whenever our San Francisco society shall content itself with modest and rational entertainments, that come within the dimensions of our homes, and within the possibilities of the purses of those who are still grinding at the mill, there will be a great deal more social enjoyment than there is now or ever will be, so long as each is straining to rival those of longer purses.

Within the last ten days there have appeared in all the daily papers the detailed particulars of several young girls from the country having been inveigled to a life of shame in this city. Two have been the evident victims of guilty conspiracies; one brought here under promise of marriage, one abducted, and all of them indicate rather the indiscretions of youth than the deliberate wickedness that prompts to a life of guilt. In one or two instances they have been followed and reclaimed by their parents. Our point in this notice is to ask whether it would not be better if the daily papers did not publish the names and particulars in detail of these unfortunate young girls? Must a daily journal, in order to sell, or in order to keep up its reputation for news, do this thing? Would it not be better for the journal, and might it not be better for many of these poor, unfortunate young girls, that their names be not thus paraded, in order that the chance be given them to recover from a false step? May not the feelings of parents be regarded somewhat? It would seem to us that families might be willing to allow this class of news to be published in the Chronicle.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Lord Shelburne could say the most provoking things, and yet seem quite unconscious of their being so. In one of his speeches, alluding to Lord Carlisle, he said: "The noble lord has written a comedy" — "No, a tragedy," interrupted Lord Carlisle. "Oh, I beg pardon; I thought it was a comedy."

It is told of an old Greek professional philosopher that when a wealthy citizen was conducting him through room after room in his house, where every inch of space was occupied by costly ornaments, he turned suddenly and spat in his host's face, explaining, by way of apology, that he was compelled to expectorate, and that he had chosen the only spot that seemed to him mean enough for the purpose.

John Williams, a merchant of Rutledge, Ga., sued a desperado. The defendant entered the store in a furious passion, held out the summons in one hand, clutched a long knife in the other, and said: "Williams, have you sued me?" Williams knew that an immediate "yes" would make him sure of a stab. "Let me get my spectacles, so that I can read the paper," he said. He went behind the counter and came back, not with the glasses, but with an axe across his shoulder. "Yes," he said, "I have sued you." "All right," replied the desperado; "I guess I'll pay the bill."

John Brown, having been sent the other day at Balmoral by the queen in quest of the lady in waiting, who happened to be the Duchess of Athole, suddenly stumbled against her. "Hoot, mum," said J. B., "yer jest the woman I was looking for." The enraged duchess dashed incontinently into the royal presence and exclaimed to her Majesty: "Madam, J. B. has insulted me; he has had the impertinence to call me a woman." To which the queen replied with cutting severity: "And pray, what are you?" All the ladies in waiting and ladies of the hed-chamber have a deadly hatred of John Brown.

Says a writer in the Boston Post: "I recollect an occasion when a young stock actor did something of more than average merit, but had no expectation of a summons before the curtain, and the minute the curtain fell, rushed to his dressing-room to make a quick change of costume. The call becoming imperative, the stage-manager hastened to summon him, and found him with his trousers off. In frantic haste his clothes were hurried upon him, and, half bewildered, he was ushered before the curtain. Following the hearty applause he received, came a burst of laughter. He retired and found that in the confusion his trousers had been put on so that when he faced the audience they didn't."

Reverend Whangdoodle Baxter, of the Austin Blue Light Tabernacle, says the Texas Siftings, called at the house of Jim Webster, one of his flock, to make a pastoral visit. Mrs. Webster was at home, but not desiring to furnish Whangdoodle with the usual square meal, of which he was in pursuit, hid behind a curtain and told her little boy to tell the clergyman that she was not at home. In hiding behind the curtain, however, she unknowingly left her feet exposed to view. "Is your mudder in?" "No, sah, she am done gone out walkin'." "When she comes home, tell her I says de next time she goes out walkin' she should take her feet along wid her, as dey am mighty useful in walkin' any distance."

A young French painter was, not long ago, showing the Shah of Persia his picture of Herodias bringing in the head of John the Baptist. The Shah asked him how many minutes were supposed to have passed since the head was cut off. "Two minutes," said the painter. The Shah then told him that the lips ought to be wide open and of an ashy white. As the artist was unwilling to be convinced, the Shah clapped his hands, and a slave appearing, drew his sword, and, with one tremendous sweep, severed his head from his body. He then pulled out his watch, and two minutes after stooped down, picked up the bleeding head, and, walking to the picture, held the real head by the side of the painted one, and said to the Frenchman: "Monsieur, you can see for yourself that the lips ought to be ashy white and wide apart, and you will learn to believe the Shah in future."

Ex-Congressman Simmons, says the Little Rock Gazette, tells of a pair of feet that must have been objects of great regard in their day. One day a party of men, including Jackson, the man of big feet, were preparing to attend a political harbecue. It was soon discovered that there was no way of conveying Jackson, as all the vehicles were full. "Let me ride that mule over there?" asked Jackson. "There isn't a man in the world that can ride that animal. He'll work to a buggy or plow, but no man can stay on his back." "I'll try him anyway," and the determined man instructed several negroes to catch the mule and hold him. The animal plunged and kicked, but finally Jackson secured a seat in the saddle. Every one expected to see him dashed against the ground; but the mule looked cunningly around, saw the man's feet, and walked peacefully away. He thought he was between a pair of shafts.

"When I was a young man," says a Southerner, "I spent several years in the South, residing for a while at Port Gibson, on the Mississippi River. A great deal of litigation was going on there about that time, and it was not always an easy matter to obtain a jury. One day I was summoned to act in that capacity, and repaired to court to get excused. On my name being called, I informed his honor the judge that I was not a freeholder, and therefore not qualified to serve. 'I am stopping for the time being at this place.' 'You board at the hotel, I presume?' 'I take my meals there, but have rooms at another part of the town, where I lodge.' 'So you keep hachelor's hall?' 'Yes, sir.' 'How long have you lived in that manner?' 'About six months.' 'I think you are qualified,' gravely remarked the judge; 'for I have never known a man to keep hachelor's hall the length of time you name who had not dirt enough in his room for a freeholder. The court does not excuse you.'"

BOYS, HERE IS A CHANCE!

The SOLAR WATCH, a perfect Timekeeper, and a trial subscription to the GOLDEN ARCSOY, A Weekly Paper for Boys and Girls, FOR ONLY 25 CENTS.

The Solar Watch is the latest wonder. It will denote the time accurately AND CAN NEVER GET OUT OF ORDER. It consists of a compass (worth alone more than 50 cents), a dial and indicator. The instrument being pointed due north, the exact time is infallibly given. For Boys it is just as good as a $15 watch; for Travelers it is in some respects better, as it always gives the exact time of the place they are in; for Sportsmen it is valuable and indispensable; for School Teachers it is a valuable addition to their scientific instruments. The Solar Watch can be carried in the vest pocket, is instantly adjusted, and will denote the exact time. Boys, just think of it. A Watch for 25 Cents. Every statement guaranteed or money refunded. This is no humbug, and the Solar Watch will do just what we say. It is NOT A TOY! IT IS A WONDERFUL INSTRUMENT, MADE ON SCIENTIFIC PRINCIPLES, ACCURATE AND RELIABLE. The Compass is absolutely correct, and is enclosed in a beautiful nickel case. It must not be confounded with the so-called magnetic time-pieces, which have been exclusively advertised. The Solar Watch has never been advertised for less than 50 cents, but in order to introduce our elegantly illustrated youth's paper "THE GOLDEN ARCSOY," we will send you the same a trial month and the SOLAR WATCH FREE, if you will send us 25 cents to pay postage and packing charges. Postage stamps taken. Address E. C. KIDGLEY & CO., 10 Barclay St., New York.

DRAMA.

The optimists tell us that everything in this world of woe has its compensation. Yet now and then even the optimist comes across a poser. What compensation can the human creature have for being born in Russia? He is picturesque, and that is all; but there is very little comfort in being picturesque. Comfort! I wonder if they have such a word in the Russian dictionary, to express a condition which does not exist in the Russian land? Every one walks upon dynamite, from the trembling Czar down to his meanest subject. How they keep up the population is a mystery. To judge from as much of Russian literature as has been presented to the English-speaking world in various garbled forms, people have not time to marry and rear children, and grow old comfortably. They are chiefly engaged in saving their lives.

With such a field before him to work upon, it can be imagined that the riotous figure of Mr. Bartley Campbell has given itself full play, and evolved a startling pot-pourri of situations.

If the mission of the melodrama be to excite the emotions, and of the spectacle to satisfy the eye, then has "Siberia" nobly fulfilled its mission. The author's skilled hand understands to a nicety that choicest secret of the craft—working up to a curtain—and he introduces curtains with a hounteous liberality. The consequence is that one comes out limp as a rag after having had one's emotions harrowed seven distinct times for seven distinct causes.

It is true one is not quite sure what it has all been about, but there is a satisfying consciousness that a tremendous amount of something is going on. It has an added interest in that we know that it is a transcript from life. It is, in effect, a materialized telegram; and the tableau of the massacre of the Jews, in itself a most thrilling stage scene, is enhanced by the knowledge that it is a picture of something terribly real.

The exigencies of "Siberia" demand that the massacred Jews come to life, else the play could not go on. One old party bites the dust in order that his suffering survivors may declaim appropriately over his taking off, but the pretty Sara and the afflicted Marie (fancy a Jewess named Marie) and the bearded Stanislas and the beardless Ivan live to wade through leagues of Russian hot water. Miss Georgia Cayvan never looked prettier than in the odd, simple garments of the little Russian Jewess. In the wild whirlpool of incident she has not much to do but be miserable interestingly, a feat which she accomplishes to the entire satisfaction of every looker-on. But Miss Georgia Cayvan has the true dramatic instinct and never misses the opportunity. This d-r-k-eyed, winning little girl, in the tableau where her ready knife has answered the Governor's impertinence, does a most impressive bit of silent acting. She might be a new Charlotte Corday as she stands horror-stricken but justified. Of course, the Governor comes to life again. "Siberia" is not a tragedy, and we have the comfort of knowing throughout that all hands will manage to get through the troubles of the present act, to be on hand for the trials of the next. There are trials enough to go around—nihilism, Judaism, hard work, and cold weather. Perhaps Miss Louise Sylvester as Marie has a harder time than any one else. This young woman is torn from the arms of her lover on her wedding morning, sees her father slain, loses her sister, loses her reason, and quite unaccountably regains it, is almost crushed by the falling ceiling, and is altogether justified in going through the evening in a very lachrymose condition. In fact, a lachrymal wave seems to have swept over this most excellent actress, who used to be so sparkling in soubrette parts. There is a great deal of "Two Orphans" misery divided between the two sisters, and it is quite comforting to see them come out all right at Odessa, well clad, and bound (as all sane Russians should be) for America. There is no explanation given of how every one gets there as right as a trivet, their Siberian rags all shed. But there they all are, fur-trimmed and clean, from Nicolai, who is the most protean of Russians, down to Vera, the flower-girl, who in the person of Miss Mills is a pretty girl as utterly destitute of any dramatic talent as a Christmas doll. This young lady speaks in capitals, like the facetious newspaper primer, and her meaningless declamation is actually droll, it is so very bad. It quite crushes the fun out of Lennox, who has the most honorable intention of being a comedian in the part of Trosky, and who is indeed amusing when regarded in the light of a Nihilist desperado. Indeed, "Siberia," abounding in speaking parts, as it does, is very well played, for Mr. Levick has a rather more grateful part than has heretofore fallen to him, has several telling situations, and a chance to let his fine voice ring out occasionally in those spasmodic explanations which harrow up the feelings of the audience just before the curtain falls, in order to give them some glimmering idea of what has taken place.

As a spectacle "Siberia" is very satisfying. The costumes are all handsome, striking, becoming, and doubtless correct. The supernumeraries are badly trained, and executed some remarkable manoeuvres in their defile before the Governor. At times it seemed imminent that the whole cohort would become a terra-cotta heap in the middle of the stage, but they managed to stumble through without a tragedy, and get out of the way for the ballet, which indeed requires considerable room; for the strains of ballet-dancing have set but lightly upon some of them, and they are, not to put too fine a point upon it, expansive. Cornalba is back again, superbly agile, and as graceful as before, with that rare charm in her especial department of the profession—a pretty face. Following the rule the world over, this ballet is not pretty, but it is good; and there is a little cross-eyed secunda among them who dances with as much expression as if she were a Tagliani. People begin to long for the ballet at this time of year quite as naturally as turkey comes into market, or foregoing house-wives make mince and pumpkin pie.

The scenery in "Siberia" is exceptionally good, even in the more unambitious sets. There is a background of garbled houses and overhanging balconies, a characteristic street scene for the massacre tableau; the courtyard of the palace is a gloomy, wintry, desolate, Russian scene; the church of St. Basil, gloomy with the peculiar religious atmosphere, and the mines of Siberia, a desolate, hopeless waste of long-fallen snow and stunted shrubs, while the inn at Odessa is quite the picture of comfort after the stormy evening. At the Grand Opera House the bloodhounds are playing a successful star engagement in that personal draught, "Uncle Tom's Cabin." These dogs have been so often before the public that extended criticism is useless. They are as well known as come in their great act of pursuit as John McCullough in "Virginius," or Lawrence Barrett in the "Arlie." The leading dog is said to be of old school, and to produce his effects entirely by means of declamatory force; the other two to the more modern school of realism, and to express all the feelings in the gamut by a compression of the lower lip. What a strange instance of the order of succession in theatres it is that their deep-mouthed bay will be superseded by the warbled notes of the Swedish nightingale. Who shall say we are upon the very confines of the outer world when one of the queens of song crosses a continent to sing for us? They are so far away from us ordinarily that it is like reading fairy tales to read the glittering story of their triumphs and successes. Yet here is Christine Nilsson, with a background of romantic history at our threshold. It is better to hear the fair-haired Swede in concert than not to hear her at all; and the quality of the music is assured by the fact that the Mendelssohn Quintet will accompany her. Indeed, the Nilsson season bids fair to be the feature of the winter; for it is not too often that a heaven-endowed woman of genius finds her way to the edge of the Western Sea.

Sometimes it bodes them well when they come, for Modjeska launched from here upon a career of unexampled prosperity. And now we have a new "Adrienne Lecouvreur" breaking the bonds of a strange tongue and making ready to play in English. Our stage would soon be given over to the lesser drama if these ambitious foreigners did not sustain the traditions for us. Besides Modjeska, we have but one actress who plays the nobler rôles, Mary Anderson. Mary Stuart, Elizabeth, and Marie Antoinette would soon fade back into history if it were left to English art to keep them before the eye; and "Adrienne Lecouvreur," one of the most beautiful of plays, is almost unknown in the English tongue. Madame Francesca Ellenreich, who is a great artist, will receive a warm English welcome, as those will not doubt who have seen her as Adrienne Lecouvreur and Maria Stuart.

In "Mary Stuart" she is the very prototype of the hapless queen of history, with her auburn hair, her beautiful face, her commanding mien, her quick impetuous temper, and her beautiful resignation at last. The scene between the rival queens in the park of Fotheringay is one of the strongest in all the range of the drama, and Madame Ellenreich gives it with its fullest effect.

But there is more of the fineness of art in the last act, in which the beautiful queen seems actually transfigured and beyond the reach of earthly things. She makes a new departure from the traditions of the English stage, and goes to her death in royal robes, as befitted a queen, with a crown upon her head, and only a veil of crape attached to it to signify the solemnity of its last wearing. Also, in this scene the sensibilities of a not too religious nation might be shocked by the public administration of the sacrament, for the sorrowing Mary makes confession, and is absolved, and takes bread and wine in the very glare of the footlights. The actress herself has so apt and saint-like a look that it dulls the shock—if there be any—and when she is led to the block, a grand chorus of unsuppressed sobs testifies that the silence of the last half hour in the audience has been the hush of feeling.

What with a great artist at the Baldwin, the great spectacle at the California, and the great dogs at the Grand Opera House, people must easily find amusement; but the Minstrels chose this special week to wake from the lethargy which falls upon them periodically, and the great Emerson and the great Keed have each made a hit during the past week—the one with the "artful dodger," and the other with a side-splitting afterpiece. The afterpiece has always been the Minstrel's weakness. How strange it would be, and how welcome, if this plain little comedian would build it up into a tower of strength. BETSY B.

Mr. Marcus Mayer, agent of Henry E. Abbey, announces Madame Christine Nilsson in four concerts, to take place on Tuesday, December 12, Thursday, December 14, Saturday afternoon, December 16, and Monday, December 18, at the Grand Opera House. Of Madame Nilsson it is needless to speak. Her fame is world-wide. The company supporting her is an excellent one, consisting of Del Puente, the baritone, Miss Hope Glenn, contralto, Mr. Theodore Bjorkstein, and the Mendelssohn Quintet Club of Boston. Season tickets for the four concerts are advertised at $14; single tickets, $2, $3, and $4, according to location. The sale of season tickets commences Monday, December 4, at Sherman & Clay's, for one day only; sale of season tickets, Wednesday, December 5. There have been remarks made about the high price of the tickets. Nilsson, however, is a very expensive attraction. It is not probable that Abbey will make much, if anything, out of his venture, under the most favorable conditions. Yet it is to be hoped that he will succeed, for San Francisco is becoming somewhat lonely of late. It is looked upon as a managerial reef, and we no longer see the stars that we were wont to do. Such being the case, the financial success of the present enterprise is to be desired.

The Busb Street Theatre, under the management of Messrs. Leavitt & Hayman, will reopen Saturday evening, December 23d, with Leavitt's All Star Specialty Company as the opening attraction. The theatre is now undergoing a thorough renovation.

Fraulein Ellenreich played in the "Taming of the Shrew" to a good house on Thanksgiving Day at the Baldwin. To-morrow evening she will appear in the dual characters of Countess Orsina and Emilie Galotte.

Emerson's Minstrels are doing a good business at the Standard Theatre.

Fried Clams.
Beefsteak, Saratoga Potatoes.
Green Peas, Beets.
Roast Turkey, stuffed with Chestnuts.
Lettuce Salad, French Dressing.
Mince Pie. Strawberries and Cream.
Apples, Figs, Guavas, Peaches, Pears, Japanese Persimmons, and Grapes.

ROAST TURKEY, STUFFED WITH CHESTNUTS.—Select a good-sized, tender, fat turkey; singe, draw, and cut off the legs and neck; do not omit to remove the "soul," as they would spoil the taste of the dressing. Wash the inside, and wipe dry. Remove the sinews from half a pound of lean veal, and the strings from half a pound of leaf-lard; chop separately very fine, put in a mortar, season with salt and pepper, and pound vigorously for five minutes. Moisten with a ladleful of broth, and add four dozen chestnuts, peeled and boiled. Fill the breast and body of the turkey, tie both ends with a strong twine and a dressing needle, and roast slowly for two hours. Add a ladleful of broth to the gravy, free it from fat, take the string off, and send the turkey to the table. Serve the gravy separately.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Mrs. Norton's Third Song Recital.

When a singer like Mrs. Norton devotes her genius to knowing, and, still better, to making known, such songs as those written by Rubinstein, Jensen, Gounod, Franz, and their musical equals, the world is not in a very bad way, after all. Indeed, it is in a far better way than it half begins to realize; for, although people in general are quick to appreciate the value of an opportunity which promises to acquaint them with a score or so of good songs, they are mostly insensible to the advantage derived from a vitalized presentation of these same commended lays. And "vitalized presentation" (for all that it is a sounding phrase, and seems to stride pompously across the page with its metaphorical hands in its pockets) carries a meaning in this connection, whose significance is vastly more important than any rhetorical allusion to Mrs. Norton's delightful voice. To breathe the breath of life into a song—to set it pulsing in the air, with its heart and soul as in the beginning—is something quite different from a vocalization of the strain.

Limited as her comprehension of the essence is not limited by its sign in words, is well shown by the success of her German selections. The first of these were three songs by Robert Franz, that Lied composer of sensitive and impassioned feeling. "Es ziehn die braunsden Wellen" is a setting of Heine's words to music, so free, so broad, and so gladly different that a great breath of the "good salt sea" seemed to sweep into the room with the surge of the accompaniment, and the singer's voice set one dreaming of a wild, beautiful strand, whose cliffs and pebbly beach were all in sight. "Es hat die Rose sich beklagt," was impetuously demanded; and the pleasure it afforded serves as the best possible illustration of Mrs. Norton's power to charm, for the reasons above mentioned. She personifies everything, as it were. Perhaps not fifty of her hearers were aware through words that she sang the complaint of a rose over its dying loveliness, and the consolation of a poet who promises lasting spring to the flower in the immortality of his song; yet not the dullest could mistake the ineffable regret that sighed itself out in language we failed to comprehend, or the brightening comfort of those closing cadences. It was clearly a case of grief, delicately assuaged; and this we would have known had the accent been Sanskrit to our ears—provided, of course, that Mrs. Norton were the singer. "Er ist gekommen in Sturm und Regen," completed the Franz numbers. Following these, Gounod's fine aria, "La Reine de Saba," was given, and then four old English ballads of the most delicious quaintness. Perhaps to this little group should be awarded the palm of simplest and entirely irresistible success. To be frank, people do not care to stay "up stairs" all the time—as some one cleverly put it the other day. The high-down songs have a place and a purpose of their own; but once in a while everybody likes to come down to plain unpretention. And what could have been more completely in this line, with its lunny lackadaisical old-fashionedness, than "Near Woodstock Town"? That innocent, childish, reedy little thrill that comes into Mrs. Norton's voice now and then, is just the quality needed to transform such a song into a perfect Kate Greenaway picture of unconventionality. "Phyllida flouts me" was better still; and the poor young fellow in the ludicrously blapish plight of not wanting to care a rap, yet caring awfully, stepped in from the seventeenth century, and stood revealed before us in all his ridiculous dejection. "My Heart's in the Highlands," and "Drink to me only with thine eyes," were both warmly acknowledged and heartily appreciated.

"Où voulez-vous aller?" was the gem of three songs by Gounod, in the matter of interpretation, at least; and the swing of that one little balancing phrase, which everybody will remember, was the motion, in music, of a small, wild bird, a-tilt on a blooming spray.

If it were not for the suggestiveness of her singing, and the rare faculty possessed by Mrs. Norton of presenting the spirit of a composition rather than the composition itself, success would less frequently crown her efforts. Noticeably would this be so in songs after the Jensen style, where intensity of feeling is, as a rule, largely dependent for its expression upon richness and fullness of tone. Yet in the three songs by this writer, "Lehn' deine Wang," and "O lass dich halten, gold'ne Stunde," a beautiful and artistic appreciation of the sentiment was so purely predominant, that, despite a lack of force, the true feeling of the compositions was emphasized rather than diminished. In a like manner the concluding Rubinstein songs owed their fascination to this exquisite realism with which Mrs. Norton infuses all her selections. The "Evening Song," "Gold rolls here beneath me," and "O, when she sings," were received with unmixed delight.

Mrs. Carmichael-Carr's accompaniments were faultless and wholly artistic, as usual, and her solo selections all of interest. These were "Zwei Sonaten" by Scarlatti, a gavotte by Scgambati, a nocturne in A major by Field, "Neapolitanischer Mandolinenspieler" by Reinecke, and the Chopin nocturne in D flat major. Slight nervousness seemed to exercise a depressing effect upon this brave little pianistess herself; but all she does is so conscientious that she is always sure of an appreciative bearing.

The large and critical audience which assembled on this occasion—Friday evening of last week—testified to the high approval accorded these recitals; and, apart from the pleasure they give, their influence upon the musical taste of our city is for the best in every particular. F. A.

A PUBLIC TEST OF THE QUALITIES OF MAGNESO-CALCITE, a new patent fire-proof material for lining boxes, safes, vaults, and buildings, was held on the sand-lot near the new City Hall Monday forenoon, in the presence of a number of insurance men, fire experts, and other interested persons. A pile of about a cord of pitch-pine wood was prepared, and five gallons of tar poured over it. A small iron chest, with a 1½-inch lining of magnesio-calcite, was placed in the centre of the pile, and the mass set fire to. After the chest had been kept at a red heat for an hour, it was taken from the fire, cooled with water, and opened, and the contents, consisting of papers and circulars, were found in a perfect state of preservation, being not at all discolored, only slightly warm and having a trifling smell of smoke. A small bond and note case, made of thin Russia iron, and lined with ½ inch of magnesio-calcite, was also placed in the fire, and kept at a red heat for about a quarter of an hour, and when opened the papers contained in it were found intact, they being perfectly cool, and but slightly discolored by smoke.

— IF ANY ONE HAS EVER CHANCED TO READ the dreadful parody entitled, "I dreamt I dwelt at Madame Toussand's," written by Tom Hood, and illustrated by Cruikshank, he can readily realize the poet's feelings by visiting the startling and realistic Wax Works now on exhibition by Mr. Kohler, at 771 Market Street. Some of the figures are vividly life-like, and several intensely dramatic situations are represented by means of the waxen figures. With the figures there is also exhibited an "Electric Boy" and a phonograph.

— THE SERIES OF "PAPERS FOR THE UGLY Girls," in "Harper's Bazar," some time since, proved popular enough to be issued in a book known to the lady readers of this paper. The writer, Mrs. Power, will lecture at Fidelity Hall, next Tuesday, on "Good Looks, and How to Improve Them"—a topic which, in lively vein, gives the hints of the best physicians and artists of New York and Paris for training the figure, the hair, and complexion. It is not a health lecture, and does not dabble in cosmetics; but treats of legitimate methods of improving the looks, in use from the time of Medea to this of Mrs. Langtry.

— REDDING'S RUSSIA SALVE IS THE MOST WONDERFUL healing medium in the world. Try it.

— "ROUGH ON RATS." CLEARS OUT RATS, MICE, flies, roaches, bed-bugs, ants, vermin, chipmunks, etc.

— LYNN, MASS., ALWAYS WAS A GOOD PLACE for health, but it has become a modern Bethesda since Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of 233 Western Avenue, made her great discovery of the Vegetable Compound, or panacea for the principal ills that afflict the fair creation. This differs, however, from the ancient scene of marvelous cures in this important particular: The healing agent, with all its virtues, can be sent to order by express or mail all over the world.

— "MOTHER SWAN'S WORM SYRUP" FOR FEVERISHNESS, restlessness, worms, constipation. 25c.

— WHEREVER COUGHS, COLDS, AND CONSUMPTION exist, Ayer's Cherry Pectoral ought to be known and used. There never existed a sentiment so universal among all classes in favor of any other medicine as is entertained the world over in regard to Ayer's Cherry Pectoral. The humblest patient in the pioneer's cabin, and the proudest dame in the metropolis, alike use it, appreciate it, and speak its praises.

— LADY READERS OF THE ARGONAUT WILL REMEMBER that the place to buy colognes, perfumery, toilet soaps, brushes, sponges, cosmetics, etc., is at the elegant and well-stocked store of James G. Steele & Co., Chemists and Apothecaries, 635 Market Street, Palace Hotel, San Francisco.

OPEN EVENINGS.

THREE EXQUISITE BOOKS!

Longfellow Birthday Book.

With a fine portrait and 12 illustrations. Beautifully bound. Cloth, $1; limp calf or sealskin, $3.50.

Emerson Birthday Book.

With a new portrait and 12 illustrations. Tastefully bound. Cloth, $1; flexible calf or sealskin, $3.50.

Whittier Birthday Book.

With a fine portrait and 12 illustrations. Elegantly bound. Cloth, $1; flexible calf or sealskin, $3.50.

These three little volumes are gems of books. On the left-hand pages are choice extracts from the writings of Longfellow, Emerson, and Whittier, for each day of the year.

On the right-hand pages, under the several dates, are interesting memoranda—birthdays of famous persons are indicated, the occurrence of noteworthy events which the writers have commemorated; and there are blank spaces for the autographs of friends on their birthdays, and for any memoranda which the owner of the book wishes to record for special days.

These little books are a happy combination of gift-book and autograph album, and on account of their tastefulness, literary attractiveness, and illustrations, are worthy of a place in every intelligent household.

N. B.—These books are charming and appropriate gifts for birthdays.

110 MONTGOMERY STREET

CHICAGO NOVELETTES.

By the "Tribune" Novelist.

"Pass the cake."

These words, spoken in imperious tones by Rosalind McGuire, floated diagonally across the parlor to where Pansy Perkins was seated on a fauteuil conversing with George W. Simpson. Pansy was looking even lovelier than usual, the gaslight, softened and made less garish by the tinted shades through which it came, bringing out in all its beauty the peachy complexion for which the Perkinses, of Perkinsville, had long been noted.

"Were you ever in Marietta, Ohio?" she asked, handing her face as she spoke so close to that of George that a little vagrant tress of her sunny hair swept across his forehead, making him feel as if he had suddenly taken hold of the handles of an electrical machine.

"No," he replied, "I never was in Marietta, but I have an aunt who used to live in Cleveland."

"How strange," said Pansy. "My father once knew a man who had been in Cleveland."

And so they chatted on, unmindful of the fact that just across the room there sat a woman, beautiful, but with cold feet, whose eyes were never taken from them, and in whose heart the fires of jealousy were raging in all their lurid fierceness. Rosalind McGuire loved George W. Simpson with all the passionate fervor of a high-born woman, whose heart, attacked in vain by countless suitors, suddenly pours out unbidden all the hidden treasures of its love. Such a love is terrible in its intensity, and only those who have seen a three-hase hit made in the ninth inning can realize the agony to which a woman, loving thus, is subjected when she sees the object of her passion bending tenderly over another, and whispering words that can never be recalled. The sight of George W. Simpson making love to a girl who didn't have an invisible net to her name was more than Rosalind could bear, and she went into the supper-room.

"Put some oysters near that hole in the wall," she said to a waiter, pointing with her jeweled hand to the portiere through which she had just passed. The man did as he was told.

In a moment George and Pansy entered the room. "Would you like some oysters?" he said.

"Oh, yes," replied Pansy. "I think they are just lovely."

George placed before her a platter of Sèvres ware, on which the mollusks were heaped; and as the first one disappeared with a dull thud, Rosalind smiled with a cold, Boston smile, and felt that her hour of triumph was at hand.

When the oysters were gone, Pansy looked up with a glad smile.

"You are very kind, Mr. Simpson," she said, "and I shall not soon forget this night."

But the happy look had faded from the man's face, and the riant mouth was quivering with pain.

"My heart is broken," he said softly, to himself, as he reached for a biscuit; "but it is better so than after I had told my love. If she eats that way at a party, what kind of a record would she get at home?"

"Ah! what, indeed?"—From "Sylvie Smitherson's Soiree," by Joseph Medill.

The Trotting-horse Reporter.

"Good-day, gentlemen."

A very nice-looking young man stood in the doorway of the editorial room, and gazed in a benign way at the occupants of the apartment.

"Would it be possible for me to sell you a story?" he continued.

"What kind of a tale have you ground out?" asked the horse reporter.

"The story," said the visitor, "is one in which the triumph of love is depicted, and—"

"It isn't one of those 'and as Ethel stood there in the soft moonlight, her lithe figure sharply outlined against the western sky, there was a loud crash in Coastchiff Castle, and the girl knew that her mother had dropped the doughnut-jar' kind of stories, is it—because they won't do," said the horse reporter.

"There is nothing at all about doughnuts in this story," replied the visitor, rather haughtily, "but if you like I can read a portion of it."

"All right."

"Where shall I begin?"

"Anywhere," replied the horse reporter. "Suppose you give us the last sentence of it."

"I should hardly think—"

"Oh, never mind about that. We do all the thinking for young authors that come up here."

The visitor seated himself and read as follows:

"For answer Gladys' beautiful eyes dropped, but she gave him both her hands; and there, under the heavy-fruited trees, the golden bees flying all about them, and the air filled with their dreamy monotone, he drew her up to his breast, and, raising her long ringlets to his lips, kissed them reverently."

"That's the last sentence, is it?" asked the horse reporter.

"Yes, sir."

"I should hope it was. It makes me tired to read about such ducks."

"Why, I don't see"—hegan the author.

"Of course, you don't. Probably you were the hero of the novel. Did you ever hear of Thompson's colt?"

The visitor admitted his ignorance concerning that historical animal.

"Well, Thompson's colt," continued the horse reporter, "was such an eternal idiot that he swam across the river to get a drink. Now, that fellow in your story is a dead match for him."

"I don't understand."

"Probably not. It is not expected of literary people. But I will tell you. This young fellow in your story is out under an apple tree holding a girl's hands, isn't he?"

"Yes."

"And, according to the story, he raised her long ringlets to his lips, and kissed them reverently. That right?"

"Certainly."

"Now, what do you think of a young man that would go nibbling around a girl's back-hair when she had her face with her? Such stories do not possess the fidelity to nature that should ever characterize the work of genius. No, my genial imbecile, you can not get the weight of this powerful journal on the side of any such young man as your story depicts. We were once young and up to the apple-tree racket ourselves."—Chicago Tribune.

Ladies and all sufferers from neuralgia, hysteria, and kindred complaints, will find it without an equal.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY RELIEF OF

Fever and Ague, Intermittent Fever, Chill Fever, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical or Bilious Fever, etc., and indeed all the affections which arise from malarious, marsh, or miasmatic poisons.

Has been widely used during the last twenty-five years, in the treatment of these distressing diseases, and with such unvarying success that it has gained the reputation of being infallible. The shakes, or chills, once broken by it, do not return, until the disease is counteracted again. This has made it an accepted remedy, and the Ayer's Ague Cure eradicates the noxious poison from the system, and leaves the patient as well as before the attack. It thoroughly expels the disease, so that no Liver Complaints, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dysentery, or Debility follow the cure. Indeed, where Disorders of the Liver and Bowels have occurred from Miasmatic Poison, it removes the cause of them, and they disappear. Not only is it an effectual cure, but, if taken occasionally by patients exposed to malaria, it will expel the poison and protect them from attack. Travelers and temporary residents in Fever and Ague localities are thus enabled to defy the disease. The General Debility which is so apt to ensue from continued exposure to Malaria and Miasm, has no speedier remedy.

For Liver Complaints, it is an excellent remedy.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

The untold miseries that result from indiscretions in early life may be alleviated and cured. Those who doubt this assertion should peruse the new medical work published by the Peabody Medical Institute, Boston, Mass.

Exhausted Vitality, Nervous and Physical Debility, Premature Decline in Man, or Vitality impaired by too close application to business, may be restored, and manhood regained.

Two hundred and fifty-eighth edition, revised and enlarged, just published. It is a standard medical work, the best in the English language, written by a physician of great experience, to whom was awarded a gold and jeweled medal by the National Medical Association. It contains beautiful and very expensive engravings, 300 pages, more than 125 valuable prescriptions for all forms of diseases, acute and chronic, the result of many years of extensive and successful practice, any one of which is worth ten times the price of the book. Bound in beautiful French cloth, embossed, full gilt. Price, only $1.25, by mail, securely sealed, postpaid, on receipt of price. Illustrated sample, 6 cents. Send now.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is beyond all comparison the most extraordinary work on Physiology ever published. There is nothing whatever that the married or single can either require or wish to know but what is fully explained.—London Lancet.

THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR SELF-PRESERVATION.

Is a marvel of art and beauty, warranted to be a better medical book in every sense than can be obtained elsewhere for double the price, or the money will be refunded in every instance.—Author.

N. B.—YOUNG AND MIDDLE-AGED MEN can save much time, suffering, and expense by reading the Science of Life, or conferring with the author, who may be consulted on all diseases requiring skill and experience. Address

McWILLIAMS AND THE BURGLAR ALARM.

By Mark Twain.

The conversation drifted smoothly and pleasantly along from weather to crops, from crops to literature, from literature to scandal, from scandal to religion; then took a random jump, and landed on the subject of burglar alarms. And now for the first time Mr. McWilliams showed feeling. Whenever I perceive this sign on this man's dial, I comprehend it, and lapse into silence, and give him opportunity to unload his heart. Said he, with but ill-controlled emotion:

"I do not go one single cent on burglar alarms, Mr. Twain—not a single cent—and I will tell you why. When we were finishing our house, we found we had a little cash left over, on account of the plumber not knowing it. I was for enlightening the heathen with it, for I was always unaccountably down on the heathen somehow; but Mrs. McWilliams said no, let's have a burglar alarm. I agreed to this compromise. I will explain that whenever I want a thing, and Mrs. McWilliams wants another thing, and we decided upon the thing that Mrs. McWilliams wants—as we always do—she calls that a compromise. Very well; the man came up from New York and put in the alarm, and charged three hundred and twenty-five dollars for it, and said we could sleep without uneasiness now. So we did for a while—say a month. Then one night we smelled smoke, and I was advised to get up and see what the matter was. I lit a candle, and started toward the stairs, and met a burglar coming out of a room with a hasket of tinware, which he had mistaken for solid silver in the dark. He was smoking a pipe. I said, 'My friend, we do not allow smoking in this room.' He said he was a stranger, and could not be expected to know the rules of the house; said he had been in many houses just as good as this one, and it had never been objected to before. He added that as far as his experience went, such rules had never been considered to apply to burglars anyway.

"I said: 'Smoke along, then, if it is the custom, though I think that the conceding of a privilege to a burglar which is denied to a hishop is a conspicuous sign of the looseness of the times. But waiving all that, what business have you to be entering this house in this furtive and clandestine way, without ringing the burglar alarm?'

"He looked confused and ashamed, and said, with embarrassment: 'I beg a thousand pardons. I did not know you had a burglar alarm, else I would have rung it. I beg you will not mention it where my parents may hear of it, for they are old and feeble, and such a seemingly wanton breach of the hallowed conventionalities of our Christian civilization might all too rudely sunder the frail bridge which hangs darkling between the pale and evanescent present and the solemn great deeps of the eternities. May I trouble you for a match?'

"I said: 'Your sentiments do you honor, but if you will allow me to say it, metaphor is not your best hold. Spare your thigh; this kind light only on the box, and seldom there in fact, if my experience may be trusted. But to return to business; how did you get in here?'

"'Through a second-story window.'

"It was even so. I redeemed the tinware at pawnbroker's rates, less cost of advertising, bade the burglar good-night, closed the window after him, and retired to headquarters to report. Next morning we sent for the burglar-alarm man, and he came up and explained that the reason the alarm did not 'go off' was that no part of the house but the first floor was attached to the alarm. This was simply idiotic; one might as well have no armor at all in battle as to have it only on his legs. The expert now put the whole second story on the alarm, charged three hundred dollars for it, and went his way. By and by, one night I found a burglar in the third story, about to start down a ladder with a lot of miscellaneous property.

"My first impulse was to crack his head with a billiard-cue; but my second was to refrain from this attention, because he was between me and the cue-rack. The second impulse was plainly the soundest; so I refrained, and proceeded to compromise. I redeemed the property at former rates, after deducting ten per cent. for the use of ladder, it being my ladder, and next day we sent down for the expert once more, and had the third story attached to the alarm, for three hundred dollars.

"By this time the 'annunciator' had grown to formidable dimensions. It had forty-seven tags on it, marked with the names of the various rooms and chimneys, and it occupied the space of an ordinary wardrobe. The gong was the size of a wash-bowl, and was placed above the head of our bed. There was a wire from the house to the coachman's quarters in the stable, and a noble gong alongside his pillow.

"We should have been comfortable now, but for one defect. Every morning at five the cook opened the kitchen-door, in the way of business, and rip went that gong! The first time this happened I thought the last day was come sure. I didn't think it in bed—no, but out of it—for the first effect of that frightful gong is to hurl you across the house, and slam you against the wall, and then curl you up, and squirm you like a spider on a stove-lid, till somebody shuts that kitchen-door. In solid fact, there is no clamor that is even comparable to the dire clamor which that gong makes. Well, this catastrophe happened every morning regularly at five o'clock, and lost us three hours' sleep; for, mind you, when that thing wakes you, it doesn't merely wake you in spots; it wakes you all over, conscience and all, and you are good for eighteen hours of wide-awakeness subsequently—eighteen hours of the very most inconceivable wide-awakeness that you ever experienced in your life. A stranger died on our hands one time, and we vacated and left him in our room over night. Did that stranger wait for the general judgment? No, sir; he got up at five the next morning in the most prompt and unostentatious way. I knew he would; I knew it might well. He collected his life-insurance, and lived happy ever after, for there was plenty of proof as to the perfect squareness of his death.

"Well, we were gradually fading away toward a better land, on account of our daily loss of sleep; so we finally had the expert up again, and he ran a wire to the outside of our door, and placed a switch there, whereby Thomas, the butler, could take off and put on the alarm; but Thomas always made one little mistake—he switched the alarm off at night when he went to bed, and switched it on again at daybreak in the morning, just in time for the cook to open the kitchen-door, and enable that gong to slam us across the house, sometimes breaking a window with one or the other of us. At the end of a week we recognized that this switch business was a delusion and a snare. We also discovered that a band of burglars had been lodging in the house the whole time—not exactly to steal, for there wasn't much left now, but to hide from the police; for they were hot pressed, and they shrewdly judged that the detectives would never think of a tripe of burglars taking sanctuary in a house notoriously protected by the most imposing and elaborate burglar-alarm in America.

"Sent down for the expert again, and this time he struck a most dazzling idea—he fixed the thing so that opening the kitchen-door would take off the alarm. It was a noble idea, and he charged accordingly. But you already foresee the result. I switched on the alarm every night at bed-time, no longer trusting to Thomas's frail memory; and as soon as the lights were out, the burglars walked in at the kitchen-door, thus taking the alarm off without waiting for the cook to do it in the morning. You see how aggravatingly we were situated. For months we couldn't have any company. Not a spare bed in the house; all occupied by burglars.

"Finally, I got up a cure of my own. The expert answered the call, and ran another under-ground wire to the stable, and established a switch there, so that the coachman could put on and take off the alarm. That worked first-rate, and a season of peace ensued, during which we got to inviting company once more and enjoying life.

"But by and by the irrepressible alarm invented a new kink. One winter's night we were flung out of bed by the sudden music of that awful gong, and when we hobbled to the annunciator, turned up the gas, and saw the word 'Nursery' exposed, Mrs. McWilliams fainted dead away, and I came precious near doing the same thing myself. I seized my shot-gun, and stood timing the coachman while that appalling buzzing went on. I knew that his gong had flung him out too, and that he would be along with his gun as soon as he could jump into his clothes. When I judged that the time was ripe, I crept to the room next the nursery, glanced through the window, and saw the dim outline of the coachman in the yard below, standing at a present-arms and waiting for a chance. Then I hopped into the nursery and fired, and in the same instant the coachman fired at the red flash of my gun. Both of us were successful: I crippled a nurse, and he shot off all my back hair. We turned up the gas, and telephoned for a surgeon. There was not a sign of a burglar, and no window had been raised. One glass was absent, but that was where the coachman's charge had come through. Here was a fine mystery—a burglar-alarm 'going off' at midnight of its own accord, and not a burglar in the neighborhood!

"The expert answered the usual call, and explained that it was a 'false alarm.' Said it was easily fixed. So he overhauled the nursery window, charged a remunerative figure for it, and departed.

"What we suffered from false alarms for the next three years no stylographic pen can describe. During the first few months I always flew with my gun to the room indicated, and the coachman always sallied forth with his battery to support me. But there was never anything to shoot at—windows all tight and secure. We always sent down for the expert next day, and he fixed those particular windows so they would keep quiet a week or so, and always remembered to send us a bill about like this:

"At length a perfectly natural thing came about—after we had answered three or four hundred false alarms—to wit, we stopped answering them. Yes, I simply rose up calmly, when slammed across the house by the alarm, calmly inspected the annunciator, took note of the room indicated, and then calmly disconnected that room from the alarm, and went back to bed as if nothing had happened. Moreover, I left that room off permanently, and did not send for the expert. Well, it goes without saying that in the course of time all the rooms were taken off, and the entire machine was out of service.

"It was at this unprotected time that the heaviest calamity of all happened. The burglars walked in one night and carried off the burglar alarm—yes, sir, every hide and hair of it; ripped it out, tooth and toe-nail, springs, bells, gongs, hattery, and all. They took a hundred and fifty miles of copper wire. They just cleaned her out, bag and baggage, and never left us a vestige of her to swear at—swear hy, I mean.

"We had a time of it to get her back; but we accomplished it finally, for money. Then the alarm firm said that what we needed now was to have her put in right—with their new patent springs in the windows to make false alarms impossible, and their new patent clock attachment, to take off and put on the alarm morning and night without human assistance. That seemed a good scheme. They promised to have the whole thing finished in ten days. They began work, and we left for the summer. They worked a couple of days, then they left for the summer. After which the burglars moved in, and began their summer vacation. When we returned in the fall the house was as empty as a beer closet in premises where painters have been at work. We refurnished, and then sent down to hurry up the expert. He came up, and finished the job, and said: 'Now, this clock is set to put on the alarm every night at ten, and take it off every morning at five-forty-five. All you've got to do is to wind her up every week, and then leave her alone; she will take care of the alarm herself.'

"After that we had a most tranquil season during three months. The hill was prodigious, of course, and I had said I would not pay it until the new machinery had proved itself to be flawless. So I paid the bill, and the very next day the alarm went to huzzling like ten thousand hee swarms at ten o'clock in the morning. I turned the hands around twelve hours, according to instructions, and this took off the alarm. But there was another hitch at night, and I had to set her ahead twelve hours once more to get her to put the alarm on again. That sort of nonsense went on a week or two; then the expert came up and put in a new clock. But it was always a failure. His clocks all had the same perverse defect—they would put the alarm on in the day-time, and they would not put it on at night; and if you forced it on yourself, they would take it off the minute your hack was turned.

"Now, there is the history of that burglar alarm—everything just as it happened; nothing extenuated, and naught set down in malice. Yes, sir; and when I had slept nine years with burglars, and maintained an expensive burglar alarm the whole time—for their protection, not mine, and at my sole cost—for not a d—d cent could I ever get them to contribute—I just said to Mrs. McWilliams that I had had enough of that kind of pie. So, with her full consent, I took the whole thing out, and traded it off for a dog, and shot the dog. I don't know what you think about it, Mr. Twain; but I think those things are made solely in the interest of the burglars. Yes, sir, a burglar alarm combines in its person all that is objectionable about a fire, a riot, and a harem, and at the same time has none of the compensating advantages, of one sort or another, that customarily belong with that combination. Good-bye; I get off here."

So saying, Mr. McWilliams gathered up his satchel and umbrella, and bowed himself out of the train.—Harper's Christmas.

New York, it is asserted, must have more clubs. Hundreds of gentlemen want to join clubs, but in all the desirable organizations the maximum has been reached. Most applicants have to wait two years before their names are voted upon. The Union League is reported to have one thousand applicants on its lists, and not a single vacancy. It has a magnificent house, and is very particular as to whom it admits. It does not appear to care much for financial standing as a qualification for membership, and while many of its members are enormously wealthy, there are others, and not a few, who are comparatively poor. It is thought that the new Knickerbocker club-house, now almost finished, will be a finer establishment than even that of the League.

Æstheticism has run its race in England. A London letter to the Liverpool Mercury thus records its downfall: "Everybody is remarking, and few people fail to be astonished at the sudden disappearance of the æsthetes from good society. The movement seems to have worn itself out completely, so far as dress is concerned. The erstwhile fashionable colors, the whilom remarkable shapes, the strange and affected attitudes, are things of the past. It is vulgar now to wear sage-green; it is no longer elegant to be limp; and those peculiar garments, designed, like the robe of Vivian, rather to express the figure than conceal, have been rendered obsolete by the hideous and graceless crinole. In the very homes where it was necessary to be either Japanese English, or at least 'quaint,' to find a footing, the set against 'mere eccentricity.'"

ADELAIDE NEILSON.

Some Particulars Concerning her Early Home and Parentage.

Amelia E. Barr contributes an interesting sketch to the December number of Lippincott's Magazine concerning the early childhood of the lamented Neilson. It will probably clear up a good deal of doubt that has existed about her origin. The writer says: "Many a year had elapsed since I had felt the clear, cutting air from Romhold's Moor and Otley Chevier in my face, and trod the narrow streets of Guiseley village. But Guiseley was Guiseley yet. The great moors and hills and the winding Aire were just the same. The Yorkshire homes, with their delightsome 'best kitchens,' reveling in warmth, and comfort, and color, were unchanged; the hearts of their owners were young as ever. The parlor into which we were taken, I saw at a glance, was a shrine dedicated to the fair Neilson's memory. Pictures of her in every character and mood covered the walls; and these walls were remarkable in a little village like Guiseley, and in a cottage whose rent could hardly be more than twenty pounds a year. In a few moments Mrs. Bland came to us. She is still a handsome woman, about fifty years of age, with manners singularly dramatic and demonstrative. There was no difficulty in introducing the object of our visit. The poor, heart-broken mother could talk of only one thing—the child who had perished in the very zenith of her beauty and fame. I began to ask her about her youth, and she brought me a little colored daguerrotype taken when the actress was in her eleventh year. The face was exquisite; not even the disfiguring style of the dress, and the wide muslin pantalettes down to the ankles, could injure its beauty. But even in this early picture there was that inexplicable shadow of early death or sorrow which few or none of the best likenesses of Miss Neilson are without."

"I'll show you the very hat she wore with it," said the fond mother, going up stairs, and returning with a pretty round flat of fancy Tuscan straw, having a faded blue satin ribbon tied round it. A dainty little hat it was, and I took it in my hand with a very curious sensation; in fact, I think we were all crying softly over it."

I asked the mother then if the future actress had displayed any histrionic talent in her childhood.

"When she was four years old she was inventing and acting characters," she answered. "She seemed to seize on any peculiarity people had, and not only did she try to imitate them, but often invented a new manner for them, trying to realize her ideal in all sorts of queer ways. When she was five years old she had formed her own opinion of what a ghost ought to be like, and how it ought to walk and act, and she begged me often to let her be a ghost."

"Was it from yourself she inherited this dramatic instinct?"

After a moment's hesitation, she answered:

"Her father was an actor."

"I heard she was born in Leeds."

"Nobody but myself knows where she was born," she answered, with trifle of irritation. "I have told no one, and I don't mean to. Then, with a smile at my friend, 'I think we may say she was a Guiseley girl, Mrs. B—'."

"Did Miss Neilson know her own father?"

"No. Let me show you her grandfather and grandmother—my parents." She took from a drawer two strong, rugged faces in photograph—faces of the purest Yorkshire type—the man having a kind of ministerial look, which I remarked upon at once.

"Yes; he was a Wesleyan local preacher," said Mrs. Bland.

"And one of t' strictest Methodists as was ever known," added my friend. "He was always ready for t' Methodist Chapel, he was."

Mrs. Bland was silent, and a singular expression flitted over her face. I thought back thirty years or more: a stern, religious father, a lovely, impulsive girl, a handsome actor, a first absorbing generous passion—these were the elements out of which had sprung the beautiful and gifted child.

Then we examined some of her needle-work, and some souvenirs of her theatrical life—theatre-hills printed on white satin for royalty, bouquets from princes and princesses, etc.—and, finally, photographs of her last resting-place. The mother's remembrances of her daughter's professional career were told with fast-flowing tears, and sometimes hysterical sobs. "She came to see me as often as she could," she said; "and, oh, how sweet, and kind, and good she was! Once, when we were riding together, we found a great patch of blue-bells; the ground was as blue as the sky for quite a bit with them. 'Stop, mother!' she cried; 'I must go to those flowers!' and she got out, and knelt down beside them, and stooped and kissed them. Then, gathering a handful, she said: 'O happy, innocent flowers! O happy, innocent flowers!' and the tears rolled down her cheeks. I could not understand her at all; and I said something—I have forgotten what now. 'Mother,' she answered, 'I have stood up to my knees in flowers on the stage, and never felt so happy as I did kneeling there by those blue-bells—those happy, innocent flowers, that God has just fresh made.'"

This little incident, combined with the mother's passionate tears and the sweet face of Juliet looking down upon them, made an impression upon me that can not be translated into words. A little afterward, pointing to the gay walls, she said: "They were done at her request. She wrote to me, when I took this cottage: 'Do make the walls white and bright, and have everything as cheery as possible. Never mind the expense. I am coming very soon to see you, and shall want to find you in a pretty home.' But she never came! She never came!" the poor soul continued, passionately; and then she plunged into the subject of the apparently inexplicable will of the kind daughter and wealthy artist. Her strictures upon the conduct of the noble residuary legatees I should think it unjust to repeat; nor am I able to agree altogether with the opinion that many express as to the unnatural conduct of Miss Neilson or the injustice of her heir. Mrs. Bland said positively that Miss Neilson was on the point of marriage with him—a fact warranting her disposition of the bulk of her wealth; and the annuity left to her mother is, in a village like Guiseley, a most comfortable income.

"Well," I said, as we drove away, "Miss Neilson seems to have had a happy and tender-cared-for childhood. I heard a whisper of something different."

"I'll be bound you heard none so far from t' truth. Mrs. Bland was a dressmaker, and made a bit of money for herself; and when Lizzie Ann was a little one she took a pride in dressing her up. Plenty said she dressed her more like a circus lass than should hev been. Bland was never a man to make brass or to save it. They were often at a pretty pass for a bit to eat. Lizzie Ann worked in t' Greenbottom Mills then; but even as a mill-hand she was a strange one; she never was seen to lake (play) with t' other lads and lasses. When she were a slip of a thing she was always reading. I can mind her often coming to our shop for a pound of sugar, or the like of that, and heing so taken up with t' reading on t' paper bags as never was."

"The reading on the paper bags?"

"Yes. The hags we hought then for wrapping up goods had always a bit of poetry or a description of some foreign place on them; and often she'd say to me: 'Give me this other hit of paper too, Mrs. B—?' And I'd say: 'For sure, and welcome, Lizzie Ann.' Eh! but I can see her yet, half leaning over t' counter, and that taken up with some hit of paper she forgot everything, till I'd say: 'Why, Lizzie Ann, niver! Art thou here yet? Thou'd better be framing home with thy parcel, or thy mother will be fratching at thee; and serve thee right, too.' Then she'd go her ways quick enough, but with a kind of yonderly look in her eyes."

"Was it not strange she left her half-brother nothing?"

My friend straightened her lips queerly: "There's a why for ivery wherefore. There's nobody in Guiseley will blame her. It's an ill hild 'files its own nest, and Lizzie Ann said little to any one about things iverybody knew she had to put up with. I think she did better by her home than many another would hev done. She looked over a deal, I tell you."

"Was she long in the mill?"

"Not so long. She went to be a nurse at Mrs. John P—'s; you remember her; for sure, you must."

"For sure, I do. Let us go and see her." In a few minutes we stopped at one of those lovely, comfortable Yorkshire homes, set deep in shady, sweet old gardens. Mrs. P— had been a helle when I saw her last; she was now a handsome matron. After some private recollections and chatter, I told her where I had been; and I hear her daughter lived with you before her theatrical debut," I said.

"Poor girl! Yes, she nursed my youngest daughter. She was a good, bright, loving soul as ever lived. It was from this house she ran away when her home had become impossible to her. At the time her mother was away—I forget where—probably making dresses for some family, and her step-father—well, we won't name him. From what she told me, I knew it was not right for her to enter his house again. She came to me one night weeping bitterly. 'I am going away,' she said, 'far away, and no one will hear of me again unless they hear something wonderful of me.' I begged her to wait till her mother came back. 'What for?' she asked, sadly: 'it is no use. I must go; I feel it.' The next day she was missing, and nobody did hear of her again till she took London by storm as Juliet. I remember the day she came back here to see her mother. The whole village was out to welcome her; and Doctor H—, you know, took his own carriage and drove her from the train."

"And, eh! but she was dressed! T' queen herself couldn't hev been grander. T' mill lads and lasses stood watching for her, and many a rough welcome—rough but hearty—she got. I'll niver believe that any one said an unkind word of her that day—niver!"

"She could not have had much money when she went away?"

"Very little, and very few clothes. I really did not believe she was going, or I would have helped her."

"She got into London without a sixpence," said my friend. "Poor lass! And she slept t' first night there on a hench in Hyde Park. There, now, to think of that. A kind-hearted policeman saw her crying, and fetched her home to his wife; and the woman took to her honny face and ways, and got her some coarse sewing to do—very coarse it was, and badly paid; but she managed to live until she got a place in some little theatre, just to go on and off like. But Lizzie Ann needed only that. If she got one foot on t' stair, she was bound to get t' top of it, that was she."

With Miss Neilson's public career I need not meddle; it is well known. But the incidents of her childhood, revealed to me in such an unexpected, truthful, and kindly manner, are surely worth repeating, although they are but another variation on the old story of genius triumphing over adverse circumstances. Those inclined to blame her, must visit Guiseley for the key to what seems unkind in her conduct, and perhaps they may then stand with a fresh admiration and sorrow by the grave of one who died so early and so sadly—

The gifted and the beautiful.

A French lady, calling herself by the extraordinary title of the Baroness of Saint-Estrapade, has come off first best in an argument with the Parisian police magistrates. The baroness, it seems, had heard that, in order to protect furs from the ravages of moths, no better place of storage could be devised than an empty spirit-cask. Procuring such a receptacle she stored her cloak in it, and when the cold weather came on and she had to go out, the fumes of the alcohol acting with the cold benumbed her and made her giddy, so that in her mantle muffling up her face she staggered helplessly all over the pavement until she was rescued by a scandalized policeman. Her servant deposed as to the purchase of the cask and its employment as a wardrobe, and as she adroitly urged that the policeman's testimony that the smell of alcohol at fifteen paces was corroborative evidence, she was discharged, though the magistrate did not fail to remark that if every lady accused of intoxication upon the public street made this defense conviction would be impossible.

Mr. Henry Irving recently gave a dinner-party, to which he invited many professional talkers and Mr. Stanley, of Africa. The professionals each arrived with a copious assortment of impromptus. Their suppressed feelings may be imagined when Mr. Stanley commenced talking of his travels with the soup, and continued without one single flash of silence until the party broke up.

CORRESPONDENCE.

The "Argonaut" Criticised.

[The following communication was sent us by a valued friend—an exile to the country where he cultivates poetry and the vine, a Cincinnati who plows, a Catiline set free from daily contact with unsuccessful politics, which he loathes—loathes because unsuccessful. How naturally we despise grapes that are out of our reach; and so our friend becomes a poet, and, being alone in the country, naturally thinks his poetry is good, because it is his. We accept it for publication, and will from time to time print, and thus indicate that we think it good. We withhold his name, lest those who do not know him should be less generous and less appreciative than we or he. We print his political opinions anonymously, because we think they are not good—at least, that part of them which suggests Sheridan for President. Sheridan is an Irishman and Roman Catholic, one remove from alien birth. He is a soldier, and a good one. We would prefer Sheridan to Sherman, Sherman to Grant, and Grant to any other soldier, but we would prefer any respectable and honorable civilian to any soldier who ever breathed to battle-smoke. We would not vote for a Romanist in religion under any possible circumstances that could arise. With deliberation, we declare that in our opinion it would imperil the life of our republic to place in the Presidential chair an ambitious and competent soldier, who believes that he owes to the Pope of Rome a higher allegiance than is due to the laws, constitution, courts, and institutions of the United States of America. We know that a great many most excellent citizens, men of Protestant beliefs, and men of no beliefs, think this an unreasonable position to take, and seriously criticise us for taking it. We are not alarmists over Romanism; we believe that free schools, a free press, and a free ballot will beat bigotry and ignorance; we believe in the future of America, and in an Americanism that will survive the present foreign inundation, survive the present naturalization laws, survive the Holy Roman Catholic Apostolic Church, and survive the Democratic party. But no Phil Sheridan for President, no soldier, no Romanist. We would keep them all from Washington—a thousand miles away.—EDS.]

EDITORS ARGONAUT: What your journal appears to need most is some good original poetry. I enclose a couple of specimens of the required commodity. But now that you have them, do not jam them into solid type, and stick them away into some obscure corner, as if verse were a thing you are ashamed to publish, and consider it only for a dump-hole. I know of no reason, when a fellow has labored and sweat to get his thought into a metrical shape, why it is not as worthy of leads and prominence as if he had wrought it into an editorial, or diluted it into slipshod prose generally. If you haven't a proof-reader, get one; if you have one already, kill him, and get another. The errors that find their way into your paper are stupid and damnable.

I need not tell you that I am pleased with the turn the elections took. I was one of the fellows that contributed to the result by not voting. You probably voted the Democratic ticket, for all of your prohibitionist proclivities; but I had just enough compunction left not to stab Republica myself, though I was willing to see others rescue her from her violators by doing so. Don't get wrong on the presidential issue, as you are inclined to. Blaine can never be President; his candidacy would arouse too many antagonisms. There is but one man in the nation with whom the Republicans can win, and that is Phil Sheridan. You are opposed to him, I know; I'm not. He has been my choice for years. He is a statesman as well as a soldier. Study his career at New Orleans and his utterances regarding the French in Mexico. No other man probed the situation so dexterously and thoroughly. His name would arouse all the enthusiasm of war times, and sweep the country like a whirlwind. Pause! Reflect!

In re Zulano.

EDITORS ARGONAUT: I want to protest, whether or not my protestations have any effect, against the arrant nonsense of the miserable fool, Zulano, whoever the devil he may be. That the Argonaut, which claims to be so essentially American, to respect and uphold the dignity of American labor against the mean flings and affected contempt of a certain class, both at home and abroad, should even indirectly endorse by publication the effusions of this man with his pretentious affectation of superiority to the "common herd," and wholly contemptible assumption of familiarity with what he calls the "better classes," whoever they may be, is matter of surprise. His scornful allusion to the "peasants" of this country is too mean and ignoble to pass unnoticed, when made through the columns of a paper supposed to represent the great mass of American working-men, who have made our country what it is, and whose ranks never yet produced either the foreign peasant or that equally foreign production, the tuft-hunter or scyphonaut, whose life is passed in toadying to the aristocracy, and of which latter class Zulano is evidently a bright, shining example.

The Hamilton Church.

[This communication concerning the "Hamiltonian Church" is our fault. We were imprudent enough to wonder what a "Hamiltonian" church could be like, and to promise to print if explained. The Reverend Clarence Fowler explains, and the explanation is entirely satisfactory to us. We think it is a very nice church, and hope it will do a great deal of good, and that it will prosper, and that the three hundred and fifty like societies will multiply among our fifty-three millions of American citizens, and produce happy results. When all these Christians become intelligent enough to agree upon one creed and one formula of faith, honest enough to live up to it, and love one another well enough not to quarrel among themselves, and earnest enough to preach to the poor and humble, even when called to a more fashionable congregation with a larger salary, we shall become a great deal more interested in churches than we now are.—EDS.]

On April 9, 1882, Lauretine Hamilton, of the Independent Church, Oakland, fell dead in his own pulpit. June 2, his friends organized under the name of Hamilton Church. June 5, they called Clarence Fowler, the Unitarian minister of San José. In the Unitarian denomination there are three hundred and fifty societies of like faith with Hamilton Church, whose position I hope to make "so plain that the way-faring man, though he be scientific, may not err therein." Doctor Döllinger and his fellow-reformers of the mother church called the Catholicism for which they stood "old Catholicism"—i. e., Catholicism as it was previous to what they judged to be its corruptions. So the Unitarians stand for old Christianity, or for Christianity as it was prior to Trinitarianism, not one of whose doctrines was formulated before A. D. 325. The Jews were sternly Unitarian as to the nature of God. The Old Testament—their scriptures—knows nothing of the compounded personality of God. Christ and the Apostles were Jewish born and bred. Paul, the chief Apostle, said: "I am a Pharisee, and the son of a Pharisee." Jesus and Paul fulfilled the Law and the Prophets by love to God and love to man. Thus does Hamilton Church belong to the root, Judaism; to the trunk, Christ; and to the branches, the Apostles. It is of Unitarianism in distinction from Trinitarianism, whose doctrines are the tri-personality of God, the deity of Jesus, salvation through the merits of Christ, Adam's fall, and eternal punishment. Hamilton Church holds the simple personality of God, that Jesus was a man, that men are saved through their own merits, that Adam rose, and that his descendants shall continue to rise till wrong-doing and punishment shall cease. Sharply opposed to these two sets of ideas are, yet let their holders be brothers in the synthesis of the spirit. There are divisions of doctrines, but Christ is not divided. Hamilton Church will have no quarrel. Let each church hold its own ideas. The spirit of Truth will settle doctrinal questions. Emphasizing love to Christ, Hamilton Church advocates union of Protestants. There are but two parties—Romanists, or the only orthodox, and Protestants, who are the heretics, or free choosers. Let all Protestants be one. Hamilton Church calls the churches to rivalry of love and service of man, claiming for itself the privilege of Paul, who said: "This I contend unto thee, that after the way they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, and herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward man."

CLARENCE FOWLER,
Minister of Hamilton Church.

LINCOLN AND DAVIS.

Some Unwritten History of the Civil War.

The war had ended many years ago, and the comrades of the Army of the Cumberland had met in Detroit to commemorate one of its battles. Gathered among them was a gray-haired veteran, who had fought in Mexico, stood by Anderson at Sumter and Moultrie in 1861; won two stars during the rebellion, and who now held the rank of colonel of infantry in the regulars, with the thanks of Congress stowed away with his various commissions, up from a second-lieutenant to that of major-general. His wounds, his gallantry, and the number of engagements in which he had defended our flag, never once passed his lips, but bits of rebellion history were often upon them. I heard him say that Jeff Davis was one of the most brilliant men in Mexico, and had proved himself a statesman of rare ability. "Nevertheless," said he, "he made a fool of himself at the most desperate time of his life." "Jeff Davis had a will and determination, added to his ability, that far outstripped any man in the South." "This," continued the speaker, "prolonged the war years after we all knew it was useless to fight. His sole aim in life was to found a republic that would cherish human bondage and make the sale of mankind legal. He did not abhor the slave-pen, nor did he think the whipping-post unjust; yet, withal, his mind often yielded to lofty aspirations upon Southern republicanism. In some articles drafted by his own hand the Confederate Constitution excelled our own. If he could have abandoned the 'lost cause,' and carried with him some of the noble and virtuous ideas of his life into other lands verging upon anarchy, (that border on our land of freedom,) his life might not have been counted lost, and his service as a statesman would have proved beneficial to mankind.

"During the last disastrous days of the rebellion, he could have made honorable terms, stopped the effusion of blood, and saved the nation millions of its immense debt. His stubborn will stood in the way of a bright future for himself and his people. Just before the fatal Sunday, when he was called from divine service to flee from the land he loved so well, he was called upon by the wisest of his Cabinet to end the strife and make the best of a losing game. Besought by his most successful and gallant generals, he would not give up a cause he well knew was useless. President Lincoln had returned from City Point to Washington firmly convinced that the dawn of better days would soon take the place of war. What, then, after it was closed, should be done with the cruel instigators of such a useless strife? The red-handed of a successful party in Congress might demand 'an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth,' but this was what our kind-hearted President most desired to avoid. To save those who would surrender their arms under articles of capitulation and return in peace to their homes, there was no question about; but there was one who must suffer death on a 'sour apple tree.' Old and young north of the historic line called for vengeance on his head.

"To save this life, rid himself of this man, and spare the nation a stigma similar to that cast upon Mexico on the execution of Maximilian, caused Lincoln days of serious thought. He had never proposed to his Cabinet his own scheme, for fear the call for vengeance would be too strong for him to combat. To let a traitor go never for once entered the mind of Lincoln. But where should he go, and where was it best to send him? Mexico opened a wide door and called upon us to drive out the French, who threatened to over-run their land. Although it looked to the outsider as if Jeff Davis had been instrumental in inviting Napoleon III. to invade Mexico, such was not the fact. Mr. Lincoln was aware of this when he proposed to Jeff Davis that Mexico would prove a safe and prosperous haven.

"That such a hint was given and refused, there seems no doubt. Mr. Lincoln had hardly returned from the army when he sought the service of a secret agent to carry his verbal message of advice to Davis. That he found the proper person and dispatched him in search of Jeff Davis, there seems no question. From Richmond to Gaston and Raleigh he went, and at last caught up with him at Charlottesville, N. C., surrounded by a remnant of his fleeing Cabinet. The agent's instructions were to deal with Mr. Davis, and with him alone. It was more personal advice than national diplomacy that brought this meeting about, and so it was considered by the interested parties. Upon this understanding our agent divulged the message he had so carefully guarded. Although Mr. Davis was laboring under great nervous excitement, and much cast down by the defeat of his once proud army, he listened attentively and kindly to the messenger, who bore him perhaps, at that dark hour, some hope for a brighter future.

"Our agent pointed out to him that General Magruder, with his army on the Rio Grande, had not yet surrendered, and was not likely to for some time. He explained the past anarchy of Mexico, its helplessness, and its dependence upon us to drive the French from their soil. The prosperity, wealth, and glory of a new nation with a new ruler were unfolded to this desperate man. If he would go there, and free Mexico, and build up a republic on his own, then would our arms be stayed until an ex-Confederate army could be mustered, equipped, and provisioned on the banks of the Rio Grande, which the combined power of Maximilian and Mexico could not resist. Future dependence upon our part was neither expressed nor implied. Whether Mr. Davis should pronounce himself independent, or coalesce with the Mexicans, was left to his own judgment. Mr. Lincoln's message was: 'Go; go quickly; and you will not be obstructed in your going. Go! Liberate this nation from decay, and make it as proud to the world as you now find States once possessed by these people.' These were the words of a kind message to a broken-hearted man. They were to redeem a land and people, long since gone to decay for the want of some hand that could guide their ship of State. Did ever ruler on the verge of despair, fleeing from the land of his birth, pursued by his foe, receive such a noble message of kindness from one who held in his power the weapons of vengeance?

"We all know that Mr. Davis did not go to Mexico. He dispatched our agent with a few words of thanks and a simple 'No.' That he has oftentimes regretted it, there seems no shadow of doubt. Did he dream that, after all, the tide of war might once more come back to the Confederate arms, or was it the same obstinate will that held him spell-bound to his 'lost cause'?"

Our hero of the Army of the Cumberland had told his story, and none of us could deny it. The annexation of Mexico, by fair or foul means, has been so long before the United States that the aspirants in bringing it about can not be counted. We may count it as certain that the last two Administrations were much inclined to take up the subject in earnest. The proper means to accomplish this end has not yet been brought before the public; but whenever the popular question is promulgated, the parties who inaugurate it may rely upon success and enthusiastic reception. There can be found in the ranks of either political party but few men of prominence who do not desire the accomplishment of this object. Have not all parties in the country been more or less inclined toward annexation? Mexico and South America demand the greatest attention from those who further this object; yet annexationists do not confine themselves alone to these southern latitudes. During the time that Charles Sumner and President Grant were preparing our declaration of rights to be presented before the Geneva Conference, did not Senator Sumner propose that the British flag should be withdrawn from North America? Did he imagine the Canadas would establish a republic of their own, or did he think they would fall to us in case of war with England? American capital and American railways will no doubt hasten this object, and sooner convince the better class of Mexicans that annexation will be advantageous for us both. The foreign policy of the Garfield administration has not yet been told, nor has his Secretary of State yet given the Committee on Foreign Affairs a full outline of what was proposed for Chile and Peru. The Convention of American Republics, proposed by Mr. Blaine, would sooner or later have learned that our declaration of rights for the American continent would be enforced peaceably, if it could, but forcibly, if it must. No Administration desires to wear the old clothes of another; so we are left in doubt whether this one, with a new party at its back, may declare for extension of our domain. D.

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1882.

VANITY FAIR.

A new style of brass "fire dogs" represents two charming women of the sixteenth century, their coquettish heads emerging from wide ruffs, every fold and jewel of which is beautifully molded. The pair stand nearly three feet from the ground, supported by a guard and fender of heavy brass work, and create a very imposing effect under a high chimney mantel.

Among the amusements in some of the Paris salons is to bet upon the color of the cravats, waistcoats, mustaches, and dresses of those entering the room. One youth is stated to have lost four hundred dollars on dark mustaches. There was a run on blondes. A French country pastime is snail-races. At the summit of an inclined board is placed a very ripe pear, and at the bottom are put in line snails, which climb up the board to reach the fruit. Bets are heavy.

The typical woman wore at a ball at Nice, recently, a pair of cream-colored silk boots with red heels, over which were laid outer heels of gilt open-work through which the red showed, thus combining the yellow and red tints of the flowers in her dress. With such boots on, it was not surprising that the typical woman walked into the affections of a correspondent of the Whitehall Review, who gave her gown such a description that O. W. tore his hair in sheer despair of ever equaling it.

You have no idea how intensely perplexing to mankind is the question of neckties—whether with a dress evening suit it is proper to wear a white or a black tie, or whether one or the other should be worn exclusively. A man of fashion—a diner-out, a swell, so to speak—says that the rule should be observed thus: Always a black tie when no ladies are to be present; always a white tie when the occasion includes ladies. White silk with square ends, black with fringed ends, are newest styles of evening ties.

A cynical bachelor has noted the fact that among the large number of married people who depart with each other for Europe, a small proportion return together. He exultantly declares that no tempers can stand perpetual intimacy combined with the discomforts of travel. But more experienced persons assure him that his ignorance is like that of a blind man talking of colors. Temper has nothing to do with it. It is merely the air of Paris, which agrees with married ladies and bachelors better than with married men.

Hunting is just now the great fashion in France, and the costume of those who follow the hounds varies according to the particular hunt. Thus, the colors of the Duc d'Aumale being blue and gold, the gentlemen who follow the Chantilly hounds wear a blue cloth coat with gold buttons, and collar and lappels of blue velvet; the waistcoat and cap are also blue, and the breeches white. At Bonnelles, where the Duchess of Uzès reigns supreme, the uniform is a red coat with light blue lappels, covered with gold and silver braid, which is also to be seen on the blue breeches and waistcoat. The black cap is ornamented with the same gold and silver braid. The duchess is about to become a partner in a well-known French racing-stable.

Men are becoming very luxurious in New York, says an Eastern journal, and their dressing-rooms, sitting-rooms, wardrobes, and repositories for personal belongings display tastes more costly than those of women. Underwear of the softest, richest knitted silk; dozens of South American pajamas, for night and dressing-room wear, of China crepe, soft twilled Chinese silk, cashmere, flannel bound with satin and embroidered, and all in the daintiest, most delicate tints and colors, such as ivory, pale blue, pink, buff, or violet. The pajama consists of drawers and loose blouse jacket with sailor collar. Chinese crepe or silk pajamas, enriched with hand embroidery, are made for the wedding outfits of fashionable men, who will have a dozen of white, a dozen trimmed with color, and a dozen of various delicate colors embroidered in white. These elegant gentlemen have for smoking companions the gate of a country house, in nickel or silver, with chain rings instead of bars, to hold cigars upright, and side-lights representing gate-lamps, but holding candles, and post pedestals to form match-holders. As for the expensive ash-trays, and liquor-sets, and pipe-racks, and dressing-cases, and the like, space and time would both fail in their enumeration. It may be mentioned that among the personal properties of one young gentleman in New York city are three hundred and seventy odd silk, satin, and knitted neck-ties, and upward of fifty walking-sticks.

One of the most prominent and beautiful society leaders of New York appeared not long since at the opera with a huge crimson parrot fastened among her bandeaux and braids. Another young lady, who has just arrived from Paris, and must therefore be looked upon as authority, wore a coronet of humming birds around her head. Another innovation is the almost universal abandonment of gloves, except for full dress, when very loose ones are worn. Just as fashion has decreed that the lords of creation must resume their lavender kids, with heavy stitchings of black, which have been so long dispensed with, the ladies are laying gloves aside, and in almost every opera-box may be seen small white hands, crossed one over the other, with the rays of light flashing and playing over brilliantly jeweled fingers. The lady who is said to have introduced this fashion is Mrs. McCreery, a handsome Californian, who has resided for nearly fifteen years in London and Paris, and who is now in New York on a visit. She appeared in a proscenium box at the opera in a marvelous costume of cardinal red and cream color, with Niagaras of delicate lace overflowing the front, and no gloves whatever, either on her hands or carried in them.

The Paris Voltaire has introduced an ingenious novelty into French journalism. One of its contributors, signing "Toison d'Or," an ancient herald, is passing in review the titles of nobility found so plentifully just now in French society. This has been going on for months, and the example has proved contagious among other contributors to the journal, one of whom has undertaken a little campaign of his own against the Sagans and the Greffulhes, whose names are so often mentioned in connection with the visits of the Prince of Wales to Paris. Here, indeed, the Voltaire does not endeavor to prove that they have no right to their titles, but only that the titles are almost as new as everything else in their houses, and that the prince for once must have waived in their favor his well-known penchant for good blood. "Who is this princess who exchanges the title of prince with the heir of England? She is the sister, daughter, and granddaughter of cloth manufacturers for the army. I see no harm in it; and I think that the cloth, if it were good, quite entitled the maker to the dignity of baron, which he received under the Restoration. As to M. Vicomte Greffulhes, his origin is more original still. The founder of this family was a small shopman in a house at Amsterdam. His master one day had an inspiration of genius. He bought up all the herrings on the Dutch boats as they came into the Zuyder Zee, and sent his shopman to manage the affair. It was done; but, before returning, the young fellow found means to buy up, on his own account, all the herring-barrels in Amsterdam. The first speculator could command his own price for herrings; but, as the last could command his for barrels, the other had to consent to a transaction which was the foundation of the immense fortune of the Greffulhes. The family afterward settled in France, and the government of the Restoration, anxious, no doubt, to import brains as well as blood into the order of nobility, gave it its title of 'Count.'"

"Langtry," says Clara Belle, "has grown thin since the familiar portraits, exposing taper arms and a boneless bosom, were made, and she made no exhibition of those things, nor is she likely to during her American tour. She is a large-jointed woman, with big hands, and her elbows are larger than the parts of her arms between them and the shoulders, as was plainly disclosed by the tight sleeves of her costumes. No; she will bare no such arms as she now possesses, believe me. Only one of her dresses was low, and that exposed only a wedge of skin down the centre of her breast. This garment was of a rich, warm-toned yellow satin, simple in style, and fitting perfectly. The waist was heart-shaped, coming low down on the shoulders, and beneath the frill of point-lace, which circumscribed the fleshy area to the narrow limits already described, was only a piece of lightly twisted satin following its outlines. The corsage simply carried the line below the waist, and ended in small points. It has been suggested that economical women, with a turn for doing over their dresses, might learn a lesson from Langtry's clothes. She does not cut, snip, and spoil good stuff with shirrs, puffs, and bias bends, as is the fashion with American dress-makers. However, this plainness is artful instead of saving in her, for it suits her individuality. Simplicity is her strong point. She wore no earrings nor finger-rings, though on her wrists were bracelets set with magnificent emeralds. In all of her dressing she was careful to show the outlines of her waist, which is slender, and, to my mind rather out of proportion with her broad shoulders and ample hips. The idea suggested by her figure was not of fleshy roundness at the two wide parts mentioned, but of a big-boned frame not smoothly filled out. This impression was strengthened by the visible action of her shoulder-blades under the thin covering and above the top of her corset, as well as by the meagreness of her bosom. I fancied that she was about seven-eighths bone, and when she smiled, with her extensive mouth and white teeth, the unpleasant thought came to me that she was exposing the whole front of her skull, which might any minute drop out, leaving her head a shapeless lot of hair and skin. Having expressed that horrid idea, I must not fail to do the woman justice by saying that, as an entirety, she is about as wholesome, healthy, looking a creature as one could wish to see. She walks with a stride that indicated a sturdy pedestrian. Together, she had more out-door breeziness than one expects in a dainty, drawing-room pet."

SOCIETY.

The Grand Hotel Musicales.

The first of the series of musicales promised by the ladies of the Grand Hotel took place last evening in the billiard parlors of that hotel, and was entertaining and satisfactory far beyond expectation, and drew to the improvised music hall a large and brilliant gathering of ladies and gentlemen. The selections given, both vocal and instrumental, were of a high and satisfactory character, and their superb rendition betrayed evidences of excellent taste, unexpected artistic skill, and careful training. The most delightful of the eight-hand pieces was the "Serenade," the second movement, in particular, eliciting from the critical audience emphatic demonstrations of approval. The instrumental gem of the evening was the piano duet, "La Radiuse," by Mesdames Barnard and Thorn, which brought forth a pronounced encore, to which the two ladies responded by playing the "Boccherini Minuet," in performing which the execution of Mrs. Thorn revived among many present memories of 1871-2, for in those years residents of the Grand and visitors at the Sharon residence, on Sutter Street, regarded the then girl-player as a musical prodigy. Madame Eberton sang several songs very sweetly. The ladies who entertained so charmingly displayed costumes that would have invited attention even if they had draped less fair and less beautifully molded forms: Mrs. Frank Barnard wore a short costume of cream-colored satin brocade, with a profusion of white satin bows and Spanish lace; corsage bouquet of white crushed roses; ornaments, diamonds. Madame F. Eberton wore a black satin (made by Worth), princess train, elaborately trimmed with Chantilly lace and flounces of same; bouquet du corsage of crimson poppies; ornaments, diamonds. Mrs. S. F. Thorn wore a cream-white Ottoman robe, trimmed with Ottoman bows and plaitings of lace, and overdress of Spanish lace; bouquet du corsage of variegated roses; ornaments, diamonds. Among the invited guests, a majority of whom were present, there were most of the residents of the Palace and Grand Hotels; also the following:

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Allen, Mr. William Alvord, Colonel and Mrs. Atherton, Miss Florence Atherton, the Misses Adams, Governor and Mrs. H. G. Blaisdel, Doctor and Mrs. Brigham, the Misses Polton, Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Blanding, Miss Lucy Brooks, Miss Effie Brown, Lieutenant and Mrs. Brice, Mr. and Mrs. Lane Booker, Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Baker, Doctor and Mrs. C. B. Currier, Mr. and Mrs. H. N. Cook, the Misses Sophie and Tot Cutter, John Crochet, Captain and Mrs. George Coffin, Colonel and Mrs. Peter Donohue, Miss Mamie Donohue, Mr. and Mrs. Walter E. Dean, Hon. and Mrs. O. P. Evans, Miss Elam, Mrs. Robert A. Elam, Colonel Eyre and family, Colonel and Mrs. J. D. Fry, Mr. and Mrs. William Freeborn, Senator and Mrs. James G. Fair, Mr. and Mrs. Adam Grant, Mr. Alfred Godeffroy, Miss Kate Gwinne, Dr. and Mrs. Hammond, Miss George Hammond, Colonel and Mrs. Ed. R. Hamilton, Miss Nettie Hamilton, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Hall, Ralph C. Harrison and family, Colonel and Mrs. J. P. Jackson, Governor and Mrs. J. A. Johnson, Miss Ada Johnson, Doctor and Mrs. Keneey, Miss Kate Kellogg, the Misses Livingston, Governor and Mrs. F. F. Low, Miss Low, Mr. and Mrs. C. L. McCoy, Misses May and Maud Miller, Mr. and Mrs. Newlands, Messrs. Newhall, Commodore R. L. Ogden and family, Miss Laura Pike, Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Pond, Miss George Richards, Mr. and Mrs. R. F. Rogers, Mr. and Mrs. John Ledrich, Miss Ledrich, Hon. William Sharon, Mr. Fred. Sbaron, Mr. George Shannon, Mr. and Mrs. John F. Swift, Senator and Mrs. W. W. Traynor, Mr. and Mrs. C. J. Torbert, Miss Sheda Torbert, Ramon Ulloa, Mr. and Mrs. Vignier and family, Mrs. William F. Wallace, Miss Cora Wallace, Mr. and Mrs. Chester Williams, Miss Kate Woods, Miss Rose Wilkins, Mr. Kentaro Yanagiya, Commodore and Mrs. Thomas S. Phelps, Captain and Mrs. Cook, Chief-Engineer Davis, U. S. N., Colonel and Mrs. J. C. Kelton, Major-General and Mrs. J. M. Schofield, Colonel and Mrs. C. Sutherland, Colonel and Mrs. Rufus Saxton, Major and Mrs. William A. Jones, Captain J. W. Dillenback, Lieutenant Otto Hein and some others.

After the performance the fair entertainers were warmly congratulated on their delightful success, and dancing then commenced, and was kept up until about midnight.

The Nilsson Concerts.

The sale of tickets for the Nilsson concerts has been almost unprecedented. The proceeds from Monday's sale of season tickets amounted to six thousand dollars. The sale of single tickets on Wednesday and Thursday footed up respectively to six thousand and five thousand dollars; making in all for the three days over seventeen thousand dollars. The following ladies and gentlemen have purchased stage boxes: W. T. Coleman, J. C. Flood, James A. Robinson, Hon. J. G. Fair, Mrs. Maria Coleman, Mrs. John Parrott, Joseph M. Nougues, and W. T. Dunphy. Among those who have purchased mezzanine boxes, are N. G. Kittle, Henry Janin, Mrs. Gros, Mrs. W. G. Hobart, Mrs. Easton, and others.

A Dejeuner at the Park.

The dejeuner given by Mr. Henry Janin to Mrs. General McDowell and daughter, at the Golden Gate Park Casino, was one of those charming little affairs which are really more agreeable than more pretentious banquet. The company, consisting of only eight persons, sat down at twelve o'clock to a most riche menu. The decoration was something unique, the table being completely covered with a bed of flowers. The guests arrived in a four-in-hand drag, and previous to breakfasting took a spin to the beach, for a stimulating appetizer of sea air.

The Thornton Reception.

The most notable event of the week was the Thornton reception on Wednesday evening. There has been a flutter of expectancy among our Southern element since the invitations of Mrs. Bessie Thornton were issued. The floors were all canvased; the floral decorations, almost wholly of smilax, were tasteful in the extreme. One pretty feature, a huge bell of flowers suspended between the folding doors, was unique as it was effective. The music, by Ballenberg, was excellent, and the supper all that could be desired. Among those present were Miss Minnie Mizner, the Misses Eyre, the Misses Blanding, Miss Bowie, Miss Hull, Misses Thornton, Miss Burling, Miss May Smith, Miss Lillie Hastings, Miss Helen Wheeler, Miss Belle Wallace, Misses Tottie and Sophie Cutter, (chaperoned by Mrs. James Robinson), Mrs. Blanding, Mrs. Breckinridge, and only a few other married ladies, as it was almost entirely a young people's affair. Among the gentlemen present were Messrs. Mizner, Ballenberg, Perry, Kerven, Dam, Harry Tevis, Ben Burling, Walter Ashe, Wheeler, Weller, Balfour, Parker, Marshall, White, Wilson, Bowie, Beasley, Tait, Baily, Hein, Marsh, Dillenback, and Hunter. A very pleasant feature of the reception was the presence of the mother of the host, Mrs. Thornton, eighty-three years of age, who not only danced and was as lively as a cricket throughout the evening, but who did not retire until she had said au revoir to the last guest, which was not until after the appearance of our celestial visitor, who still takes his daily pathway across the starry sky.

Notes and Gossip.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Wetherbee, of Fruit Vale, Alameda County, have taken up their residence at the Palace for the winter. Evan J. Coleman went to Los Angeles on Saturday. Judge J. B. Southard went to Tucson on Sunday last; Mrs. Southard leaves next week to join her husband. Colonel Charles F. Crocker left here for Texas on Monday last, accompanied by his brother, George Crocker, John Benson, Colonel Gray, and Henry Scott; the party will not return till about the end of the month, when Charles Crocker, who has been absent from the city in Europe and elsewhere since June last, will return, leaving Mrs. Crocker and Miss Hattie Crocker and her brother William in New York for the winter. Hon. Alexander Caldwell, late United States Senator from Kansas, and Mrs. Caldwell arrived here a few days ago. Mrs. E. B. Crocker, who is spending the winter at the Palace, has gone to Sacramento for a short time. C. B. Scofield, U. S. A., has been in the city most of the week. Robert Potts, U. S. N., was at the Baldwin on Sunday and Monday last. Mr. and Mrs. Bliz Paxton have gone East, to remain with Mrs. Paxton's parents until after the holidays. Mr. and Mrs. George A. Low, who have been summering at San Rafael since May last, will return to the city to-day. The many friends of Miss Louise Dearborn will be pleased to know that she has returned from Australia, and is at her old home at the Palace. Mr. and Mrs. L. L. Baker went down to Monterey on the second instant, to stay a few days. Captain and Mrs. N. T. Smith have returned from Menlo, and occupy their new residence on the corner of Jackson and Octavia streets. Col. Heywood, of the Marine Corps, who has been stationed at Mare Island for several years, has been detached, and ordered East. Miss Kittie Woods went up to the Navy Yard on a visit on Saturday last. Mr. and Mrs. W. H. Bogardus, who were married in this city on the twenty-ninth ultimo, and who subsequently went to Monterey on their bridal trip, returned on the second instant. Mr. and Mrs. Jerome Stanford and family, who have been visiting Monterey, have returned to Warm Springs. Lieutenant Terrett, U. S. A., who has been stationed in Nevada for a long time, is visiting in this city. Master Howard S. Waring, U. S. N., and Mrs. Waring, (nee Miss Lurie Cole), who were married in Los Angeles two weeks ago, have arrived in St. Louis, where they will remain for some time. Doctor and Mrs. R. Beverly Cole have taken up their residence at the Ralston House for the winter. Consul and Madame de Mean leave for Monterey shortly, to remain until near the holidays. Captain and Mrs. Henry Metcalfe have returned to Benicia. Major and Mrs. Winthrop have left the Palace, and taken up their quarters at the Presidio. Miss Florence McKune has returned to Sacramento. Mrs. John T. Fall has returned from Ceyenne. Miss Kitty Van Voorhis, of Sacramento, is visiting in Oakland. Mr. and Mrs. Frank McCormick have taken up their residence at the Palace for the winter. Mrs. S. W. Holladay and the Misses Holladay, who have been in the East and in Europe for nearly a year, returned home just in time to enjoy their Thanksgiving dinner. Mrs. J. H. Jewett has returned to the Grand from Monterey. Mrs. Maury, of the Palace, accompanied her husband, Captain Maury, on his trip to Japan and China, on Tuesday last. Mrs. E. P. Buckingham has taken up her residence at the Grand for the winter. Mrs. J. W. Simonon will return from New York to-day. General Stoneman, probably taking note of the action of the governor-elect of Pennsylvania, desires that there be no military display on the day of his inauguration. Mr. and Mrs. William S. Phelps and Miss Phelps are spending the week at Monterey. Mrs. Forbes and her daughter will winter at the Grand. Governor Pacheco is at present at Jacksonville, Florida, whither he went with Mrs. Pacheco on Tuesday last, and where he will remain until after the holidays; but Mrs. Pacheco, being in very bad health, will spend the winter at Jacksonville and at other points upon the St. John's River; Miss Mabel Pacheco, who was so greatly admired in Washington last winter, will return to the national capital with her father, and remain until the approach of the Lenten season, with its penitential frowns, when she will again join her mother in the sunny South. The marriage of Miss Bessie Grattan, a young society lady of this city, and Mr. Ernest Diehlman, late Minister to Colombia, is set for an early day, the wedding to take place at St. John's Church, Washington, and a reception to follow at the residence of Senator and Mrs. Jones, on Capitol Hill, where Mrs. Grattan and her daughter are now stopping as guests. William E. Brown, who went East some two months ago, is on his way home by the new southern route, and will return about Christmas. Captain William M. Wherry, U. S. A., chief of General Schofield's staff, arrived here from the East on Thursday last; Captain Wherry has been a member of General Schofield's staff for twenty years. Mrs. Charles F. Crocker and Mrs. Easton went to Monterey on Monday last to stay a week or two. The next regular monthly social of the Olympic Club will be held on Friday evening next, the fifteenth instant. The wedding of Mr. C. Russ and Miss Teresa Knipe, daughter of Captain Knipe, took place last evening at the residence of the bride's father on Greenwich Street. The young ladies of Mills's Seminary will give a musicale on Friday evening next, the fifteenth instant. The officers of the United States steamer Wachusett gave a german at the Navy Yard on Thursday evening last, which proved to be a very delightful affair, and drew together, besides the officers of the Yard and their ladies, quite a number of San Francisco society people. On Thursday evening next, the fourteenth instant, a social and literary entertainment will be held by the officers and ladies of Mare Island at the residence of Mrs. Captain Boyd. The announcement of an engagement of marriage between Mr. H. M. A. Miller and Miss Julia Adams, both of Oakland, is authorized. Mrs. ex-Senator Stewart is still visiting her sister, Mrs. Woods, in Alexandria, and watching the repairs progress on her famous mansion on Dupont Circle; it will not be ready for occupancy, however, until April or May next, as the damage done by fire and water is of a more serious and extensive character than has generally been thought. Arthur Page, who left here some six or seven weeks ago with his two unmarried sisters, for Philadelphia, returned on Tuesday last; the Misses Page will remain in the Quaker City during the next few months; Mrs. Page, their mother, has taken a house at San Rafael for the winter. Mrs. Colonel E. E. Eyre and daughters give a tea this evening, from three until nine o'clock, at their residence on Sutter Street. The third regular Presidio hop will take place on Friday evening next, the fifteenth instant. Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. MacDermott have closed up their Oakland chateau for the winter, and are delightfully quartered at the Palace, where they will remain until the fogs are less regular in their visitations. The Princess Louise and the Marquis de Lorne are expected to arrive here from the north on Monday or Tuesday next, and apartments at the Palace have already been provided for the distinguished visitors, who will shortly afterward leave for southern California. The invitations are already out for the Hopkins reception on the 28th instant, on the return of the newly-married couple from the East. Mrs. H. M. Wiggins, of Alameda, will return home from the East to-morrow. W. R. A. Moore, U. S. N., is at the Palace; also J. W. Dillenback, U. S. A. Mr. and Mrs. George W. Hooper are at Monterey. Miss Pratt, of Oakland, is also visiting Monterey. Hon. Paul Shirley has been visiting General Stoneman at San Gabriel. Miss Lulu Glassell, of Los Angeles, who has been visiting in this city, returned home on Sunday last. General Backus and Major Kinney have returned from Los Angeles. Captain Randol, U. S. A., is at the Pico House, Los Angeles. Governor Perkins is to be made the recipient of a banquet at the Baldwin on Tuesday evening, the 19th instant, at which Governor-elect Stoneman has been invited to attend; all of the officers of the National Guard who participate will be present in full uniforms, and it is the intention of the prime movers in the matter to make this honor to the retiring executive a brilliant and delightful affair. Miss Porter, of Oakland, is visiting in Sacramento. Mr. William S. Hopkins and family have taken a permanent residence in Detroit, Michigan. The Misses Tyrell, of Sacramento, have been spending a few weeks in this city; as the guests of Mrs. Thomas Findley, at 217 Pine Street. Colonel Horace Fletcher leaves for Japan on the steamer which sails on Saturday next, the sixteenth instant. Mrs. John Corning soon leaves for Honolulu. Mrs. Adam Grant is contemplating a visit to Honolulu. Miss Allie Hawes is at the Navy Yard, but will return on Monday next in company with Miss Tolson. Rear-Admiral George B. Balch, so long in command of the Asiatic squadron, is to be retired, and succeeded by Rear-Admiral Aaron K. Hughes. Lieutenant-Colonel H. C. Hasbrouck, U. S. A., so well known in San Francisco society circles, and Mrs. Hasbrouck, his bride, were given a reception at West Point on the evening of the twenty-eighth ultimo, and there were three other brides present—Mrs. Lieutenant Young, Mrs. Lieutenant French, and Mrs. Lieutenant Edgerton. Mr. and Mrs. D. Ogden Mills were entertained at the Livingston residence on the Hudson, on Thanksgiving Day evening.

MUSICAL NOTES.

The Zech and Philharmonic Concerts.

To borrow the words of a contributor to one of the late periodicals, Mr. Frederick Zech "does not need to pray, like the mechanic in the story, that Providence 'will give him a good conceit of himself.'" At least, his Thanksgiving Day programme led one to strongly suspect that this may be the case; for, besides being prefaced by a panegyric sketch of Mr. Zech's musical career and achievements, the programme was made up of that gentleman's compositions with an exclusiveness which was as suggestive as it was absolute. It is only natural, however, to suppose that no one but the composer would have had patience to prepare these works with the fidelity shown in their presentation. As a conductor, Mr. Zech is demonstrative, fantastical, and lacking in repose; and as a result of these qualities the effects he invokes from his orchestra often have the appearance of an abruptness they do not really possess. But, forgetting these characteristics, and remembering only Mr. Zech's degree of control, as exhibited in the accuracy and unanimity of the playing, one finds much to sincerely commend. Marks of painstaking preparation, careful training, and untiring rehearsal, were apparent everywhere. The success of the afternoon was unquestionably due in a large measure to the conscientious work of the orchestra. This, of course, amounts to saying that the interest of the compositions themselves did not outweigh the manner of their presentation. And it must be confessed that one carried away, as the prevailing impression created by the concert as a whole, the feeling that the value of Mr. Zech's ideas was exceeded by the excellence of their mechanical execution.

This sentence pronounced itself at the very outset, in the Concert Overture. While the structure and instrumentation of the overture would possibly meet the approval of the "leading masters in Europe," and while effective scoring was not infrequently revealed, and well-contrasted modulations not lacking, still nothing new, nothing fresh, nothing strikingly coherent appeared. The Theme, (with variations and fugue,) which followed as the second number, was far more melodious and satisfying; and the larghetto from the C major Symphony, was intelligible at all points, and beautiful at many. The accompanying Menuetto was not without grace and rhythm, and the concluding Fest-marsch possessed a vigor of its own, which, however, certain passages allotted to the brass rather unfortunately emphasized. Of the Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra, one is not inspired to speak at length. An unresponsive instrument, probable nervousness, and playing devoid of clearness, brilliancy, or individuality, did little toward establishing Mr. Zech's claims to virtuosity. In common with all the work of this truly talented young man, the Concerto has merits not to be ignored; but they are of so conventional and prosaic a nature that enthusiasm refuses to be aroused. The Romanza and Menuetto for piano alone, in point of rendition, constituted the least successful number of the programme. A large audience greeted Mr. Zech, and he was warmly applauded.

The Philharmonic programme for last week offered as its piece de resistance Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. This charmingly humorous and graceful work was given with unusual spirit and fluency. From beginning to end it is a gush and outburst of light-hearted ecstasy; and the absence of an adagio seems only fitting and appropriate. The allegretto scherzando, the most innocent and mischievous morceau imaginable, was so well done as to be re-demanded. The allegro vivace was also admirable, but the menuetto decidedly unstable. Of two Hungarian Dances, by Brahms, the second was noticeably good, and the interpretation of "Oberon" on Mr. Hinrich's part was such as deserved better treatment at the hands of his players. The brass and reeds are apt to jar so inopportunistically that delicate passages are greatly endangered by their intonations; but the strings (especially the first violins) were beautifully reliable on Friday. Bargiel's overture to "Medea," given for the first time, was grandiose, and not particularly interesting.

A vocal number, the "Penelope Aria," from Bruch's "Odysseus," was contributed by Fraulein Emma Hopf, who possesses a heavy mezzo voice, of a distinctively German type. This lady's compass is limited, her upper and lower tones being weak and thin in comparison with those of the medium register. She is inclined to sing flat, is stolid and unemotional in manner, and her selection (though well suited to her voice and rather sombre style) seemed unfortunate for a first appearance. Nevertheless, Fraulein Hopf shows a good school and careful training. She scorns any approach to tremolo, and the quality of feeling in certain of her tones leads one to believe that she is capable of greater things than we have yet seen.

Mozart's Concerto in C minor for piano, with orchestra, was played on this occasion by Herr Bruno Gortatowsky. A slight distrust of Herr Gortatowsky's artistic capabilities arose with the appearance of his notes upon the rack; and, as he was closely confined to them during his entire performance, it goes without saying that his playing was necessarily mechanical and unfinished. With a determined touch and a commendable resolution to "come out even," (indicated by an unflinching accent, and an unobtruded rush of scale and arpeggio,) Herr Gortatowsky disposed of the Concerto in C minor as summary a manner as possible; and though he "has execution," as the phrase goes, his audience was led to fear that as a pianist he possesses little besides.

The fourth Philharmonic Concert takes place January fifth.

Rondeau.

If hearts are dust, heart's loves remain,
And somewhere far above the plane
Of earthly thought, beyond the sea
That bounds this Life, they will meet thee,
And hold thee face to face again.

And when is done Life's restless reign,
If I hereafter but regain Heart's love, why should I troubled be
If hearts are dust?

By Love's indissoluble chain,
I know the grave does not detain
Heart's love. The very faith in me
Is pledge of an eternity,
Where I shall find heart's love again,
If hearts are dust.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1882.

JAMES T. WHITE.

The following paragraph is from the Washington Sunday Herald of November 26. It will be read by San Franciscans with interest: "Mrs. M. H. De Young, wife of the proprietor of the San Francisco Chronicle, made a short visit to Washington last week, accompanied by her mother, Mrs. M. Dean. Mrs. De Young is one of the brightest and prettiest of San Francisco society ladies, and in her handsome residence, on the summit of California Street, will dispense a most charming hospitality to a large circle of friends and visitors from other States and countries. Mr. De Young is the owner of the leading journal of the coast.

"The art that conceals art," as the thief remarked when he slid an expensive oil painting under his coat.

NEW YORK TOWN-TALK.

How Gotham Society Amuses Itself, and what it Gossips about.

Religion is at a very low ebb in New York nowadays. No one seems to know the reason, but the fact is undeniable and much deplored by the very small contingent which is still devout and pious. There are many magnificent churches, but almost none of them is full even on the Sundays that are blessed with good weather. The preachers of the town rail against the departure of New Yorkers from the paths of rectitude and virtue, the enthusiasts rave about it, and the sensationalists predict destruction and chaos. Still the city moves on and people calmly stay away from the temples of devotion, and manifest not the faintest interest in vital religion. If you press a man for the reason of his indifference to the established forms of Christianity, which were issues of absorbing interest to him years ago, when the church was a mighty power in the city, he will probably say that his preacher has ceased to interest him. This is about the only complaint we hear. It is not that atheists and men of similar modes of belief have increased in numbers, but simply that the great body of men who formerly went to church go to church no more, because the preachers do not attract them. There is foundation for the assertion that the preachers are not so influential as they were. It has become unfashionable to be "impassioned," and preachers must perforce be cold. The keen, clear-cut, dignified, and logical style of Doctor John Hall is taken as a model by a great many clergymen, and their following falls off accordingly. The men who went out into the streets years ago, and yelled the principles of their faith with the enthusiasm of entire belief, drew large congregations together, because they appealed directly to the heart. The men who to-day deliver chunks of rhetorical dissertations to the remnants of the large congregations the churches once boasted of, fail of their purpose, because they never touch the heart. The fact is, the preachers lack earnest conviction themselves, and hence fail to convince their hearers. The churches are too cold, too severe, too stilted, and too artificial to hold the people together.

Society people were the first to give up the church by following the European custom of holding Sunday night receptions. Then the churches began to abandon evening service, substituting the afternoon. It was hoped thus to hold society people in the flock, but the plan failed because there was too much devotion within a few hours' time. All the fashionable churches now have Sunday-school at half past nine o'clock, morning service at ten, and afternoon service at half past three. This gives the Christians an opportunity to enjoy themselves as they please in the evening. The majority of well-to-do New Yorkers rise Sunday at about half past nine o'clock. By the time a leisurely breakfast is finished, they usually decide that it is too late for church, and agree to go to afternoon service. After a heavy dinner, beginning at two o'clock, they find it an awful bore to dress for church, so the thing slips by until evening, when they assume the most elaborate toilettes imaginable and skip gayly off to some Sunday night reception. The evening of the holy day has become very fashionable for all people except young society girls, who are not allowed to appear at the quietest "Sunday evenings." Of late there has been a movement to monopolize Sunday afternoon as well as the evening for social pleasures, instead of religious duties, by the introduction of four o'clock teas. I am glad to say that the innovation has not been received rapturously by society men, who very much prefer the club window or a quiet spin up the road to a depressing tea.

If there ever was an infernally tiresome and altogether nonsensical social bugbear, it is the afternoon tea. There is nothing to attract a man to them, except the presence of a lot of girls who are under the vigilant eyes of a dozen chaperones, and crowded together like dolls in a show-window. No man cares to talk to a girl when there are three other girls on either side of her, criticising every word. And drinking tea from a thimble cup, with a constant rush of people hitting your elbow apologetically, and the thermometer at two thousand in the shade, lacks that sensation of ease and languor which is dear to the heart of the modern New Yorker. Since the time of Adam, the soul of man rejoices when he can lug his favorite fairy off into a secluded corner and commune with her alone. I am of the opinion that the same sort of thing jibes in with the general desires of the feminine soul as well. At any rate, I know that when mamma swoops down upon the two souls aforementioned in the act of secluded communion, both souls go forth in deep and earnest longings for the early demise of mamma. But teas are not popular with men, and Sunday teas are voted a profound bore.

The Liederkranz Society had a jollification meeting night before last, which did not terminate until yesterday was pretty well advanced. It was the celebration in honor of the new building just finished for the club. It is a superb structure; vast, rich, and comfortable in design, and a credit to the city's architectural standing. No wonder the Liederkranz feels jubilant. It is in a financial condition as good as any club in the city, and undisturbed by internal dissensions of any sort. The members are the jolliest of jolly Germans, and the entertainments of the club thoroughly enjoyable. The club was founded in 1847 by Doctor Herman Ludwig and a musician named Krauskoff, who called two hundred Germans together at a small hotel called the Shakespeare, in William Street. After vigorous urging, exactly twenty-five of the two hundred agreed to give twenty-five cents apiece for the foundation of the singing society. From that time on it grew wonderfully, until now it ranks with the great singing societies of the world. Steinway, the piano man, is president now, and Theodore Thomas leads them when they sing on state occasions. The most attractive of the apartments in the new building is the wine-room. It is lighted during the day by four huge windows, which are studies in stained glass, and at night dimly illuminated by mediæval chandeliers of hammered silver. The ceiling is of carved oak, and richly ornamented wainscoting runs around the sides. The whole room presents a thoroughly charming appearance, and is as homelike and cozy as any private dining-room in town. Sunday nights the members will assemble here and drink, and smoke, and discuss metaphysics until dawn, surrounded by all that makes the German nature joyful. Besides this room, there is an immense concert hall, a suit of parlors for lady visitors, billiard-rooms, bowling alley, smoking-rooms, and a library of one thousand five hundred volumes. The Liederkranz is a big success.

The very fresh young man who is known as the "jeunesse dorée" is becoming such an intolerable nuisance around the doors of our theatres that the papers are beginning to remonstrate with him editorially. Citizens are also publishing indignant letters, and ladies complain bitterly of the presence of these very young young men. There is a wide-spread belief that they are bold, bad, and dangerous men, who spend fortunes in riotous spees with actresses every night, and live in an atmosphere of sensuous ease, hissing champagne, and wicked cigarette smoke. They usually have a rather haggard appearance, which is put down at once as the result of the previous night's debauch, and they always wear the blasé and supercilious air of men to whom the joys and pleasures of life begin to pall. They have fallen into the habit of honoring ladies with a dull, meaningless stare through the single glass, and this it is which has led to the outbreak on the part of the public. If ever there was a basely deceptive being, it is this much-abused young man. I know him to quite a large extent, and can testify that he is the most harmless of silly and imbecile young men. He always wears a dress suit, an immensely high collar, a pair of sharp-toed boots, and the single glass, and he smokes cigarettes incessantly, and affects an English drawl. His mind is a shallow as his boots are tight, and I am convinced that his haggard look is solely the result of insufficient eating and the effects consequent on prolonged exposure to the night air at stage doors. The youth never has enough money to pay fares for two, and in nine cases out of ten never spoke to an actress in his life. He invests all of his income in tickets, and picks up enough stage-slang to encourage the belief among his admirers—if he has any—that he is intimate with the "perfesh." But he is a delusion, and a harmless one at that; and it lifts him into an undeserved prominence when he is discussed in the papers.

The Authors' Club is not a success, principally because all the authors are satisfactorily clubbed already. If the dim echoes of the great hullabaloo that was made when this ambitious club was started have not reached San Francisco by this time, it is not the fault of the club's promulgators. It was begun with great enthusiasm at a dinner of a number of "literary fellers" up-town one night, and carried on valiantly at a meeting the following week. It was decided to limit the membership to fifty. Everybody talked of it for a while, and it was called an immense success before it had fairly started. After everybody had decided that it was an immense success, it failed to go on any further. Mighty efforts were made by a chosen few, who were connected with the Evening Post to a greater or less degree, but the Authors' Club wouldn't go, and it is gradually being abandoned. No wonder. It would take half a fortune apiece for fifty men to support a club in New York, and I am acquainted with very few authors who can afford to part with half their fortunes for any such convivial purpose.

Was there ever a more painful fall than that of John Tobin, ex-millionaire? Two days ago he was arrested for being drunk and disorderly, and without visible means of support—as a vagrant and a tramp unfit to be at large. He was dragged into the First Precinct Police Station by two officers, and thrown into a corner, where he lay all night, like a heap of dirty rags. The next morning he went before a magistrate and asked to be sent to prison; but the magistrate descended from the bench, took the tattered and broken-down man into his private room, and, after offering some assistance, sent him away. He wandered off, and is supposed to be still in the streets. This is the man who, only a few years ago, was President of the Hudson River Railroad, and a capitalist whose operations on the Stock Exchange were on a scale only equaled by such men as Gould, Vanderbilt, and Sage. He was a wholesale wine and liquor merchant before he went on Wall Street, and it was in this business that he contracted a love for liquor that has proved an awful curse. He was never a great schemer or a clever manipulator of stocks, but was a gambler, pure and simple. There is no doubt whatever that his fortune at one time considerably exceeded five millions of dollars. He made a good chunk of it by his early investment in Harlem stock, which he bought at nine, and held firmly till it reached the enormous figure of two hundred and eighty-five. He hit Commodore Vanderbilt heavily in this deal, and the old man tried hard to punish him. Tobin was famous for his nerve. He took terrific risks without a twitch, and often recovered steep losses by a wild flyer that made him dear to the hearts of Wall Street men. But toward the last he lost his grip, and sank steadily, until he is now at the very bottom. One would think that some one would go to his assistance—some man who made thousands in a deal with him during his prosperous days, or some fellow who had won a fortune from him at the many poker games he lost. No one will assist him, though. He will go as other fallen millionaires have gone, until he drops in his tracks and gives rise to leading editorials on the "Vicissitudes of Life."

NEW YORK, December 1, 1882.

FLANEUR.

The cold and frozen truth is—and, without fear of General Rosecrans, and the Jesuit fathers who have a lot for sale on Market Street, we record it—San Francisco is not in pressing need of a new post-office. The present building is a very good one. It is sufficiently capacious for the present business, and, as the lot is a large one, can be added to, if necessary. It is conveniently located, and is as nearly central to the business community as is the New York Post-office to New York. If, for architectural adornment, we must have a new edifice, let it be erected upon the site of the present one. Property-owners in this section of the town will not look with indifference upon a "job" put up to take the post-office away from them.

An Arkansas editor, in retiring from the editorial control of a newspaper, said: "It is with a feeling of sadness that we retire from the active control of this paper; but we leave our journal with a gentleman who is abler than we are, financially, to handle it. The gentleman is well known in this community. He is the sheriff."

EDITORIAL NOTES.

The Civil Service Reform Association of California is composed of some of our most intelligent and public-spirited citizens. The associations throughout the nation embrace the best and most patriotic men of the nation. The suggested reform embodies two ideas: First, preliminary investigation as to the fitness of all applicants for subordinate political positions, and, second, retention of place until removed for cause, thus giving stability in the small offices of the Government after they are filled by persons possessing proper qualifications. Mr. Frank Newlands in his address to the Board of Freeholders stated intelligently the embarrassments that grow out of our present mode of appointments. In San Francisco the municipal government employs one thousand clerks and deputies; in the general and State governments there are nearly or quite as many more. With bosses to manage, this becomes an active, aggressive, and meddlesome force in politics. There must of necessity be two such forces; that which is in and that which is out, and between them a never-ending strife. The effective worker in the successful force is entitled, by virtue of his effectiveness, to the reward of place. He may be the more effective because he is an idler, an inebriate, a criminal, and an associate of criminals; hence, men of this kind find employment when the competent, industrious, educated, and moral men do not. Civil service examination is not a literary one, but varies with the duties to be discharged, and is test of the applicant's ability to perform the work to which he is to be assigned, being educational, practical, or physical, as the case may require. The public mind should be relieved of the impression—and it is a prevailing misapprehension—that the test is purely theoretical, and one which only scholars can meet. To illustrate: A deputy is wanted in the Internal Revenue office to gauge liquors; a cashier is wanted in the Custom House; a bookkeeper in the Sub-treasurer's office; an assayer in the Mint; a pavier or stone-cutter in the Street Department; one who understands the value of real estate in the Assessor's office; a gardener at the Park. One needs to know the rules of fluid measurement, another figures and accounts, another bookkeeping, another chemistry, another must be skillful in the use of the chisel and rammer, and another values property. One office may demand a person skilled in languages or mechanics, another demands special learning, and another physical strength and mechanical experience. As now, and under our present system, any serviceable politician is deemed fit for any position. Change is constant. Anxiety is experienced by those in place lest they lose it, and anxiety is manifested by outsiders to get in. Demoralization of the public service will be suggested to thoughtful minds by all these ideas without elaboration. The superiority of men elected under civil service rules over those whom machine politics brings to the performance of public duties must be apparent to all thoughtful persons. Our charter-makers will be wise, we think, if they will heed the suggestions submitted to them by Messrs. Newlands, Crane, and others, who have given this matter consideration.

The Fruit and Flower Mission received on Thanksgiving Day the following note:

"Herewith, please find twenty dollars. I trust that it will be the means of making at least a few individuals happy. If not too much trouble, I shall thank you to acknowledge receipt through the Argonaut."

It was signed with the initials "M. R.—M. F." This note was sent us by Mrs. Theodore Smith, Honorary President of the Flower Mission, accompanied by one from herself in which, among other pleasant things, she says: "Many others responded most generously to your appeal. All the 'needed carriages came, and money was given, including a 'check from a gentleman for fifty dollars, besides many 'twenty-dollar gold pieces, which, the senders informed me, 'were called forth by your article in the Argonaut.' The initials and handwriting of the 'M. R.—M. F.' note look familiar to us, and, if we are not mistaken, we have to acknowledge a former donation sent through the Argonaut for a charitable purpose. This is the time for kindly acts of charity, these coming Christmas holidays, when those who have homes and plenty gather their little ones together for the gifts of the Christmas tree, the feast and frolic of the Christmas eve and day, when friends greet friends with gifts, and when the Christian world meets and thanks God for the gracious gift of his only Son. The Christmas week and the Christmas day, the New Year's day and the New Year's week, are times when pagan and Christian festivities come together; when the worshippers of the golden calf, the worldly ones, when those who sacrifice at the altar of the unknown God, and when the unreligious ones, in common with Christian men and women, find their hearts filled with kindly emotions and overflowing with sympathy for their kind. This is the time when it is the duty of every generous person, prompted by generous sentiments, to look around for some object upon which generosity may expend itself, such as some old companion distanced in the race of life and left behind, some poor relation, some neighbor, some tired, weary one, some faithful servant; and then remember the utterly friendless ones, the sick, the poor, the stranger. It is such as these that these young ladies of fashionable society who compose the Fruit and Flower Mission make it their duty to look up and relieve. Proud poverty hides. It is the duty of these girls to hunt it down, find it out, and, with gentle touch of sympathy, make it willing to be lifted up to hope and new endeavor. Destitute sick ones despair. It is the labor of these girls to cheer them with the desire of new life that comes into the sick room with the sunlight of young, cheerful, and tender faces. The purple beauty of clustering grapes has oftentimes more healing qualities than a whole drug-store of medicines. The touch of gentle hands, the soft expression of bright eyes, and the soothing influence of kind voices, work miracles in the sick room and among the poor, where sometimes even prayers fail. We wish the young ladies of the Fruit and Flower Mission a merry Christmas and a happy New Year, with bounteous gifts and plenty of checks and twenty-dollar gold pieces. To 'M. R.—M. F.' we wish a long life for generous and bountiful gifts.

A new London fashion in champagne is to mix sweet and dry wines in the one glass, a kind of high-toned 'alf-and-alf. It is about as idiotic a fashion as could be imagined.

CENONE.

"She is not dead, she is not wed! But she loves me now, and she loved me then!"

It was in the fall of the year that Cenone Webster came back among us, ten days before Cassius Heron returned with his bride.

"How is she looking?" I asked Rob when he said he had seen her. I do not think a woman would be likely to ask another question first.

"Very well, very well," he replied, so enthusiastically that I at once surmised she had made much of him. "She is thinner than she used to be, and paler, but still she's vastly improved. Got more style about her, you know, and—and all that."

All of which was delightfully satisfactory. She came to see me at once, waiving ceremony in favor of Baby Mildred's extreme youth, and she took me for my first drive out. I watched her closely—a slight, erect shape, guiding with slender, steady hands Rob's Brown Bat. I could not quite make her out. Her face had lost a something of childish fullness that had been incongruous with her type, and her gorgeous coloring was all gone, but in place of these was a sweeter and more spiritual beauty, traced in fine lines of thought and feeling. We drove as far as I dared. Cenone's eyes dwelt wistfully on the landscape—the orange groves, whose trees might have been cut from veritable emeralds, so vividly the new growth caught the light outside their deeper green. I think she did not miss the gleam of one bunch of gay chrysanthemums, blooming in humble door-yards by the way, nor lose the vagabond grace of a single straying trail, where vineyards were taking on a burnish of bronze, like a dash of golden dust, from the opulent road. "The fairest land under the sun," she said, softly, as her gaze roamed to the dear, brown hills.

Of old, Cenone had not been always liked. She had seen too clearly, and had shown too clearly that she saw the weaknesses of her kind. But now, some sort of witchery seemed hers. Women chanted her praises, where they once had clamored against her as indifferent, and haughty, and hard. As for the men, it did appear that she need only give them one long uplifted look from her dark eyes to win their very souls. She seemed, too, to delight in her power, as if she had but recently discovered its possession; and she gave the same ready, gentle smile to all, whether a sun-burned little urchin, scampering home from robbing an orchard, a blue-blossomed laborer from the fields, a sober-minded man of business, or a simpering young exquisite. She rode and drove, danced and talked, all with a vivacity and grace that made her charming. At some seasons pleasure jaunts are epidemic here, and Miss Webster was absent on an outing for some days after Cassius Heron came back. On the evening they were thrown together I had spoken to the bride—a pretty woman enough, in whose face I found an unaccountable familiarity. She passed on with our hostess, leaving me beside her husband. He was so silent that I turned to him with quizzical intent; his eyes were fixed on a lively group just out of earshot.

"Who is the divinity in blue?" he said.

"What, surely you have not forgotten Cenone Webster!" I cried, not at all forgetful how rumor ran that on hearing she was coming back, he had hastened away and taken himself a wife, as defense against the exercise of her old dominion over him.

"Miss Webster is a girl not easily to be forgotten, but she was so pensive, and this young lady's circle appears so merrily diverted, that I failed to associate the two. I suppose she has gained sprightliness at the expense of spirituality."

I did not fail to mark the significance of his tone, and drew my own inferences from it.

"No doubt you wish it might be so," I said, a bit spitefully, I own, "but don't form conclusions until you have met her. And, oh, may I be there to see!" Half an hour later some one beside me, maladroit, was presenting Cassius Heron to Miss Webster. He was embarrassed and constrained. He was awkward. Men always are awkward under such conditions. Cenone was calm and unruffled as a cloudless summer morning. She raised her brows the least bit in the world.

"Present us! Why, we were boys together!" That silly speech tided over the little contretemps better than ought else could have done.

"You have changed," said Cassius Heron.

"Yes; like Undine, I have found my soul."

She raised her eyes to his. I never saw a smile like hers. It was not a muscular contraction, like most smiles, but a lighting up to radiance of her whole sweet little face. It always made me think of the line about Astarte, "With love in her luminous eyes." I watched the two while they talked—a long time it seemed to me. I wondered if it seemed long to Cassius Heron's wife. Cenone appeared a passive companion, breaking off now and then to fling a word into general conversation; but Cassius Heron was completely absorbed. I could understand that. I knew of old how this girl could hold her listener entranced, while a looker-on would call her abstracted and indifferent. And that was the beginning of the second chapter. From that time on it was evident to me that Cassius still cared for Cenone more than for his wife. I decided that she did not know of his old-time infatuation for Cenone. Surely no other woman was ever so free from jealousy. She was perfectly captivated by Cenone, who, indeed, showed her courteous and thoughtful consideration. Mrs. Heron seemed to delight in bringing the other two together. She gave her husband no peace until he brought her to board in the same house with us; and then Cenone must be with her at hours rational and irrational. After the Herons had been with us a while, I solved the mystery of Mrs. Heron's familiar face. Seen at some angles, and under some conditions, she was a fair reflection of what Cenone had been when Cassius Heron first knew her. Not like the Cenone of to-day. No one could be like her now; so gay, so brilliant, she took one's breath; so sweet, so winning, that her power frightened me, and withal, so perfectly enigmatical.

"Do you suppose that had anything to do with his marrying her?" I said one day, when Rob and I had been discussing this likeness of Mrs. Heron to Cenone.

"Quien sabe?" (Of all earthly expressions, I think that Spanish evasion the most tantalizing.) "Quien sabe? You can't always tell, you know. Men are queer cattle."

As I said, Cenone gave the impression of caring for no one in particular. No doubt she made each individual man think he was the especial object of her favor, for in all this foolish world, no other creature is so unmitigated a fool as man—excepting always woman. But to lookers-on in Vienna she seemed to care to be pleasant, rather than of whom she pleased. Only I, who had known her so well all these years—I saw that day after day Cassius Heron's madness grew deeper and deeper, and marveled at the blindness of his wife. Cenone saw his plight, of course. She drew him on from one day to another, with the subtle intoxication of her words, and her eyes, and her mere presence. I had not known the girl had it in her. Women had rather been in the habit of thinking her a girl of infinite cleverness and capacity, but without the charm of fascination for men. Now, I felt grateful to date for Rob's stolid insusceptibility, seeing the uncharacteristic want of principle in this deliberate encouragement of Cassius Heron. But it was not at all fair sailing, even for him. I came in one day to find him at the piano, singing something. I caught only part of the refrain:

"—till these lips are clay,
Never more to see thee, while night follows the day."

Nothing could be more unlike Miss Webster's usual slow grace than the one spring she made from her chair to his side. She stood with her hands crushed against her breast, a world of passion in her eyes, her face as ghastly as it will be when she lies in her grave. Cassius Heron looked up to her in amazement.

"Never dare to sing that again," she said, hoarsely. "Go away—go at once."

"But I don't know what you mean," he said, his beautiful velvety eyes swimming with tears. Actually the man could scarce help shedding them. She stamped her foot with a sort of fury.

"Go now!"

And some of the peculiarities she showed made me think she did not care for Cassius Heron. Once, at nightfall, she came in where I was singing Baby Mildred to sleep with "Don't be sorrowful, darling."

"Oh, Portia, hush!" she cried; "I can not bear to hear that. I heard it once—" She slipped away into the darkness; her voice had broken, I thought I heard her sob. And the next day, meeting him apart, I just hummed the song and asked Cassius Heron if he knew it. He had never heard it before. Some scents she could not endure—lilies of the valley, and attar of rose—and, while she loved chrysanthemums, and praised their hardy courage, the little white ones she would never touch. These whims, and her flirtations with a married man, saved me from idolatry of Cenone, for in all else I thought her perfect.

We made a party to the long beach at Oldport, when Rupert Beaucampion came down for a day. It was too late in the season, and the air was very chill for this our southern country; but we were bent on showing Mrs. Heron and Mr. Beaucampion the picturesque beauty of the Point of Rocks. We drove up across the mesa, to go down the road from the cliff. At the beginning of the grade we looked away, where at the left lay a lonely, lovely little bight, than which there can be nothing more romantic among the friths and lochs of Scotland. It was all perfect—the shallows, the broad patches of tulle, three or four sail-boats floating lazily in the still straits, and great, white masses of spray that the waves hurled up at the cliff over at the Point. The hamlet lay at our feet shut in by close hills, bare and brown, the chute down to the lighter, the warehouses, the wharf, the tramway, and boats fast to the piles. All Mr. Beaucampion's insistence could not prevent Cenone taking an oar, to help pull out to where the breeze caught our sails.

"But I like to row," she said, "and I've had no opportunity for—lo! these many months. Soyez tranquille, and look at the fish-cars. Saw you ever so novel a notion?" Then, with a quaint humor, she went on to explain the great, cumbersome, coop-like box—a clumsy wooden cage—floating in the water, with fish wriggling dejectedly within, their captive lives thus prolonged until the market claimed them.

For once I felt disloyally impatient with Cenone, when I looked at this gallant young Southerner, all his chivalrous soul looking out of glorious gray eyes, that burned as clear as lamps in his beautiful Vandyke face. No woman could want a braver lover or a bonnier. Why could Cenone not love him? I would fain see her wooed and wedded. Or did she mean to go on flirting away all the summer days of her life?—and squandering, in mock sentiment! that she despised, the sweetness and strength of her nature? For I had never known Cenone to care for any man, more than for the glove she flung aside when its freshness was gone, unless—ah! indeed, unless there might be a closed chapter in those months she had spent in lands remote.

We had come out into the wider straits, between bars covered with long, low sand-dunes, set here and there with white landmark frames of the coast survey and dismantled erections of summer campers. We came into a pretty rough sea, where cross-currents ran from two lines of breakers, thundering at right angles to each other, close at hand. We were watching a lighter coming in with the tide, from a little freight steamer out in the roadstead, and John Mackenzie was telling us how, just out there, his man, Scotch Sandy, single-handed, saved three men when the schooner Albatross went down one stormy night, when I saw a shade of apprehension cross Rupert Beaucampion's fine face.

"Shall not we take the oars?" he said.

John looked about, threw off his coat, and caught up an oar, and then—and then, I saw a black, hungry rock, just under water, that seemed rising up into my very face. I heard a cruel, crashing sound. I thought of Baby Mildred—ah! safe, thank God! yonder on the friendly shore, far away. Then the cold, lapping water, until Rob's strong arms upheld me, and Rob's dear voice spoke:

"Courage, Portia; steady, wife. Put your arms over my shoulders, and float easy; face up, head back. There." He lifted me across a great oar, and swam alongside.

Then I forced my senses to act, and looked for our companions, and this is what I saw: John Mackenzie could not swim, and Rupert Beaucampion was going to him from the capsized boat, on which he had placed Mrs. Heron in comparative safety. Close beside us Cassius Heron was making grand strokes with one arm; the other clasped Miss Webster. She struggled until both were submerged.

"Let me go," she gasped, as soon as her face was above water.

I lost his reply. Then she struck him full in the face with one white, dripping hand.

"Are you mad!" she cried. "Go to your wife!"

But still he held her fast until he lifted her to the hull beside his wife. Screaming wildly, and waving her hands to men on the lighter, Cenone deliberately slid off the boat, and swam toward that great, ponderous craft, urged on by willing hands. For all her clinging raiment, for all her slightness and womanish want of strength, she met them midway. We were all saved.

How, even with rescuers so near, I can not understand, when I think how our wet clothing impeded exertion. John Mackenzie had sunk twice. He was, indeed, almost dead; and Rupert Beaucampion's strength was well-nigh exhausted by this double task Cassius Heron had left him. But how transiently such things affect us! Twenty-four hours later we were steaming northward, as we had planned before, to see Madame Devonensis as Ophelia. I had hoped Rupert Beaucampion's presence might make a diversion; but Cassius Heron's infatuation was more evident than ever. His wife was becoming uneasy. No resentment against Miss Webster showed in her manner; indeed, she displayed an increased affection for the girl. But to her husband she was capricious, sullen, and petulant by turns; sometimes reproachful, and sometimes deprecatory, as we could not always help hearing.

Matters came to a climax two nights after our arrival. A little group of acquaintances had dropped into our parlor one by one, and some one asked Cenone in her turn to sing. I never was more surprised than when she struck the chords of a prelude. I had thought her completely ignorant of music. I thought "she looked like a queen in book" that night—or no, not that, either—like a lovely, loving girl, looking better than I had ever seen her, in her lace-draped, black frock, her pretty neck in the square corsage showing like the bosom of some fair child. Much of her rich color had come back, and her eyes had a languid dreaminess that was more attractive even than their usual full brilliancy.

Cenone was in one of her moods, very evidently. She sang a song that was new to us—a little English one, that I had heard of, merely.

"In the gloaming, oh, my darling,
When the lights are dim and low,
And the quiet shadows, falling,
Softly come, and softly go;
When the winds are sobbing faintly
With a gentle, unknown woe,
Will you think of me, and love me,
As you did once—long ago?"

I looked furtively at Cassius. He was gazing at Cenone with his heart in his eyes. She went on with the pathetic strain so softly, so sadly, a heartbreak in every note:

"In the gloaming, oh, my darling,
Think not bitterly of me,
Though I passed away in silence,
Left you lonely, set you free;
For, oh, my heart was crushed with longing;
What might have been could never be;
It was best to leave you thus, dear—
Best for you and best for me!"

Was that the key to her departure, two years ago? It certainly was a clever way to make painful explanations; but I thought I had never heard anything more audacious—before his wife, and us all. But then Cenone Webster, reckless or reckoning, was just the girl to do a daring thing.

An hour later, I overheard something that startled and shocked me unspeakably: the close of a conversation between Miss Webster and Cassius Heron. His voice was eager and earnest; hers was constrained and curious.

"You will? You will?" His voice was half rejoicing, half imploring.

"I will be ready," she said, "to-morrow at ten. The others are all going to the Gatelys at that hour, I know; and you can await me here."

"And you will come away with me—away forever—together?"

She smiled a baffling sort of smile.

"With what other motive would I meet you here?"

He stooped to raise to his lips a spray of mountain berries that had fallen from the knot at her breast.

I knocked at Cenone's door when we had separated for the night, and, getting no response, entered the room. She was sitting in an attitude of utter despondency. Before her was one of the fanciful little picture-stands that have been so popular—a velvet horseshoe, mounted in silver. I knelt down beside her. I could hold my peace no longer.

"Oh, Cenone! Even if you repudiate me, I can not be silent any longer. My dear, my dear, what is the reason you are doing this wicked thing? You do not care for Cassius Heron!"

She made no disclaimer. She did not affect ignorance of what I meant. Whatever else she might be, she was honest to her heart's core, and fearless. She pointed to the picture on the table.

"That is the reason." I looked up. She had painted on the violet velvet pansies and forget-me-nots, mistletoe and four-leaf clover—symbols, poor child! of faith and hope. The picture was a common little tintype, dim and indistinct; that of a young man with a slender, boyish figure, standing by an old well-curb, in an easy and unconstrained attitude. One hand hung at his side, the other shaded his face with a helmet hat. He was not handsome; but his brow was brave and frank; his mouth grave and tender; and the light, well-knit figure had a free, airy grace all its own.

"Is it a worthy love," I said, "if its ill prospering drive you to disgrace?"

She looked at me with her eyes ablaze. "What disgrace do you mean to impute to me?"

"I—I overheard your appointment with Cassius Heron," I stammered, abashed by her indignation.

"That is to us no dishonor—in the sense you mean," she said; "though I doubt if my actual intention is much less shameful. What I meant was simply this: to entice him there, having placed his wife so that she may hear any rash speech he may choose to make to me."

I was aghast at her quiet announcement of her heartless plan. I had read in novels of ultra mis-morality, of such treacherous cruelty, practiced by Circe-like women of sinful soul; but that such perfidy should exist in actual, every-day, commonplace life, I had not believed. Yet here was my spotless maiden, my Saint Agnes—telling me of such intent.

"How could you—O Enone, how could you plan such a heartless thing? To lead him on through all these weeks, to set at naught his suffering—to be reckless of that poor woman's agony?"

"You may believe me or not, as you will," she said; "but I have not planned it at all. I have been far too much absorbed in my own suffering. Only to-night, when I sang that song, it flashed upon me that the vain fool took it to himself, and I thought he might pay the penalty of his folly."

"But his wife! She loves him—she has done you no ill—she has trusted you, and believed in you wholly; more—forgive me, dear—more than I have done." She made no reply. "You did not sing to him?"

"I sang—to Jack!" Then her hardness melted. Then she fell on her knees. Then she wept, as one who weeps not often. When she had spent her tears,

"Will you do what you can to set things right?" I said. She rose. "Come with me."

We called Mrs. Heron. Enone talked with her aside. Mrs. Heron seemed half shyly pleased, half dissatisfied. "Yes, you must go," Enone said, "and be sure to tell him"—The rest of her whisper was lost.

In the corridor where our rooms were I saw something on the floor that glittered strangely in the gaslight. I picked up an opal ring. Deep down under its opaque surface, dead milky white, it burned with ever changing fires—flame color, sea-green, scarlet, gold, aqua-marina, violet—every tint and hue flashing from the bewitching, enchanted thing. Enone caught it from my hand. "Jack's ring, that I wore for months," she cried. Her color came and went; her face grew tender as a mother's over her babe. She wheeled about, and went swiftly down to the hotel office, I following mechanically to the desk.

"Have you a guest named True?"

"We have." The clerk ran his finger down the register—"J. T. True, Goldburg, Colorado."

"Be good enough to send him this card," She gave the line she made me write—a simple summons to No. 22.

Ten minutes later I opened the door to Mr. True. His face was finer than the picture had led me to believe. Like Enone's, its charm lay in expression. He frowned when he saw her standing there, his ring gleaming on her folded hands. She made one step forward, as if she feared to come nearer.

"Jack, will you forgive me?" His voice shook with passion—what passion I could not determine.

"I told you once—do you remember?—on the road from the old mill out yonder?—that I never forgive. You made a sport and mock of me—of me, who loved you better than my own soul. I could forgive you that. You tarnted me with being your dupe. I could forgive you that. I can not forgive your want of faith in me—the suspicion that let you listen to every idle tale against my truth. Forgive you? No! Never!"

I never saw anything so piteous as that proud girl standing there before his young anger, patient, submissive to his will. She must, indeed, have owned him master. I never heard anything so unspeakably sad as the resignation in her voice when she spoke.

"I had thought perhaps you would forgive me. Ah, Jack, there is nothing so grand as a man who forgives. How else can he so well show his greater strength? Here is your ring. I give it back again. Do you remember—before you said it had brought us nothing but misery—the opal of ill-omen? It brought me a happiness to remember all the days of my life; nothing can take that memory from me."

He looked sharply at her, standing there alone. She smiled a forlorn little smile.

"You once accused me of acting a part because I quoted poetry," she said, with a faint reflection of her old quaintness; "but I will risk your disdain once again. You will forgive me, Jack, some day. I shall be more worthy then; more patient and gentle, and—not jealous. I have lived, I shall say, so much since then; given up myself so many times. Good-bye, Jack! God bless you!"

His eyes had not moved from her face.

"Enone!" She looked at him quickly, with a vague, incredulous dawning of hope in her eyes. "You love me yet—after all that is past and gone?"

"I shall love you till I am dead," she cried, with a voice that might have thrilled through marble.

He held his young arms to her. "Come back to your shelter, poor, weary, wounded bird! O my little love, come back to me!" P. LATHAM HILL.

SAN FRANCISCO, December, 1882.

The popular impression that an editorial-room is a constant battle-ground, that the editors are being incessantly hounded for copy, that indignant subscribers rush in with complaints and horsewhips, that the editor is a persecuted creature, is all a fallacy, remarks the Denver Tribune. The average editorial-room is a very quiet sort of a place—a spot where loafers are seldom tolerated, and where disturbances very infrequently occur. The idea that the foreman is inveterately howling for copy is an erroneous one, invented probably by some amateur journalist long ago, who did not know that all well-regulated editors make it one of the important details of their business never to let the printers stand around and charge time. The editorial-room is especially a rare field for the study of character. In the course of a brief year every phase of human nature passes before the editor in his sanctum, and it is there that the cant and hypocrisy of humanity are most frequently self-exposed. The hollowiness and rottenness of politicians are first detected by the editor; for the politician has a confidant in the editor. And it is so with merchants, lawyers, preachers, and every manner of man that steps into the editorial sanctum. The editorial-room is a chamber where people come and lay off their masks and toggeries, and display their blemishes and weaknesses. To those who are in the secrets of the sanctum, it is no wonder that editors are invariably the most confirmed of cynics.

Invocation to Light.

Hail, holy Light, offspring of Heaven first-born!—
Or of the Eternal coeternal beam
May I express thee unblamed?—since God is light,
And never but in unapproach'd light
Dwelt from eternity, dwelt then in thee,
Bright effluence of bright essence increate.
Or hear'st thou rather pure ethereal stream,
Whose fountain who shall tell? Before the sun,
Before the heavens, thou wert, and at the voice
Of God, as with a mantle, didst invest
The rising world of waters dark and deep,
Won from the void and formless infinite.

Thou I revisit now with bolder wing,
Escaped the Stygian pool, though long detained
In that obscure sojourn, while in my flight
Through utter and through middle darkness borne,
With other notes than to the Orphean lyre,
I sung of Chaos and eternal Night,
Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
The dark descent, and up to reascend,
Though hard and rare; thee I revisit safe,
And feel thy sovereign vital lamp; but thou
Revisitest not these eyes, that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop serene hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim suffusion veiled.

Yet not the more
Cease I to wander where the Muses haunt
Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
Smit with the love of sacred song; but chief
Thee, Sion, and the flowery brooks beneath
That wash thy hallowed feet and warbling flow,
Nightly I visit; nor sometimes forget
Those other two equaled with me in fate,
So were I equaled with them in renown,
Blind Thamyras and blind Maeonides,
And Tiresias and Phineus, prophets old;
Then feed on thoughts that voluntary move
Harmonious numbers, as the wakeful bird
Sings darkling, and in shadiest covert hid Tunes her nocturnal note.

Thus with the year
Seasons return, but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal bloom, or summer's rose,
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud, instead, and ever-during dark
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge fair
Presented with a universal blank
Of Nature's works, to me expunged and razed,
And wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
So much the rather thou, celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate; there plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight. —John Milton.

Light.

From the quickened womb of the primal gloom,
The sun rolled, black and bare,
Till I wove him a vest for his Ethiop breast
Of the threads of my golden hair;
And when the broad tent of the firmament
Arose on its airy spars,
I pencilled the hue of its matchless blue,
And spangled it round with stars.

I painted the flowers of the Eden howers,
And their leaves of living green,
And mine were the dyes in the sinless eyes
Of Eden's virgin queen;
And when the fiend's art in the truthful heart
Had fastened its portal spell,
In the silvery sphere of the first-born tear
To the trembling earth I fell.

When the waves that burst o'er a world accused
Their work of wrath had sped,
And the Ark's lone few, both tried and true,
Came forth among the dead,
With the wondrous gleams of the bridal beams,
I bade their terrors cease,
As I wrote on the roll of the storm's dark scroll
God's covenant of peace.

Like a pall at rest on the senseless breast,
Night's funeral shadow slept—
Where shepherd swains on Bethlehem's plains
Their lonely vigils kept,
When I flashed on their sight the heralds bright
Of Heaven's redeeming plan,
As they chanted the morn, the Saviour born—
Joy, joy, to the outcast man.

Equal favor I show to the lofty and low,
On the just and unjust I descend;
E'en the blind, whose vain spheres roll in darkness and tears,
Feel my smile, the blest smile of a friend.
Nay, the flower of the waste by my love is embraced,
As the rose in the garden of kings;
At the chrysalis hier of the morn I appear,
And on the gay butterfly's wing.

The desolate Morn, like the mourner forlorn,
Conceals all the pride of her charms,
Till I bid the bright hours chase the Night from her flowers,
And lead the young Day to her arms;
And when the gay rover seeks Eve for her lover,
And sinks to her halmy repose,
I wrap the soft rest by the zephyr-fanned west
In curtains of amber and rose.

From my sentinel steep by the night-brooded deep,
I gaze with unslumbering eye,
When the cynosure star of the mariner
Is blotted out from the sky;
And guided by me through the merciless sea,
Though sped by the hurricane's wings,
His compassionless, dark, lone, weltering bark,
The haven home safely he brings.

I waken the flowers in the dew-spangled bowers,
The birds in their chambers of green,
And mountain and plain glow with beauty again,
As they bask in their maternal sheen.
O, if such the glad worth of my presence on earth,
Though fitful and fleeting the while,
What glories must rest on the home of the blest,
Ever bright with the Deity's smile! —William Pitt Palmer,

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A good deal of matrimonial tribulation was brought to light in the last census returns of Great Britain. Several husbands returned their wives as the heads of the families, and one describes himself as an idiot for having married his literal better half. "Married, and I'm heartily sorry for it," was returned in two cases; and in quite a number of instances "Temper" was entered under the head of infirmities opposite the name of the wife.

An old French judge, who has always been looked upon as the possessor of an iron constitution, calls upon his doctor. "You here?" says the physician, in astonishment; "what can be the matter?" "Well, doctor, the fact is that I am getting to be a little uneasy about the state of my health." "Ah! And where is the trouble? In the head? Stomach?" "No, they're all right; but of late I have been suffering a good deal from insomnia—in court."

Mr. Peet, a rather diffident man, was unable to prevent himself from being introduced one evening to a fascinating young lady, who, misunderstanding his name, constantly addressed him as Mr. Peters, much to the gentleman's distress. Finally, summoning courage, he bashfully but earnestly remonstrated: "Oh, don't call me Peters! Call me Peet." "Ah, but I don't know you well enough, Mr. Peters," said the young lady, blushing, as she playfully withdrew behind her fan.

The recent mobbing of "General" Booth, of the English Salvation Army, at Hereford, recalls a good story of a stalwart Kentucky preacher in the days "befo' de wah." He was once conducting a revival service, when he was annoyed by the indecent conduct of a couple of rowdies. He went up to them and rebuked them, when one replied: "We heard that you work miracles, and are come to see if it is true." "No, sir," said the preacher, taking off his coat, "hut we cast out devils," and he forthwith cast them out.

A young physician, says Cheek, who had long worshiped at a distance, was one day suddenly called to attend her. He found her suffering from no particularly dangerous malady, but she wanted him to prescribe for her, nevertheless; so the doctor took her hand, and said, impressively: "Well, I should prescribe—I should prescribe that—you—get—married." "O, goodness," said the interesting invalid; "who would marry me, I wonder?" "I would," snapped the doctor, with all the voracity of a six-foot pickerel. "You?" exclaimed the maiden. "Yes." "Well, doctor, if that is the fearful alternative, you can go away and let me die in peace."

The day after my arrival at Vittoria, says a tourist, I went to a shoemaker's to get some repairs done to my boots. There was nobody in the shop; the master was on the opposite side of the street, smoking his cigarette. His shoulders were covered with a mantle full of holes, and he looked like a beggar, but a Spanish heggar appearing rather proud than ashamed of his poverty. He came over to me, and I explained my business. "Wait a moment," said he, and immediately called his wife. "How much money is there in the purse?" "Twelve pesetas." "Then I shall not work." "But," I said, "twelve pesetas will not last for ever." "Who has seen to-morrow?" said he, turning his hack on me.

A Swedish farmer had a pretty daughter, with whom his hired man fell in love. The old man refusing him, he determined to emigrate to the United States. The old man, unable to persuade him to stay, went to the steamship to see him off. He offered to help him carry his blue box on the steamer. "It is pretty heavy," said the old man. "It will be lighter before it gets to America," said the young man. And so it was—the same minute; for the bottom gave way, and out rolled the pretty daughter. She blushed and explained, and the upshot was that her father promised the young fellow that if he would come back with some money in his pocket, within two years, he should marry the young woman.

A very exacting English landlord makes his tenants "come to time" on the day the rent becomes due, and will only relax his stern decrees when a handsome woman is in the question. Not long since he called for his rent of a very worthy mechanic, who, by the way, rejoices in the possession of a very pretty little wife. The husband was not at home when Shyllock called, and he was enchanted with the pretty little wife of the tenant. She could not liquidate the amount due, but the landlord becoming really enamored, told her he would give her a receipt in full for just one kiss. "Sir," said she, "myself and my husband are very poor—perhaps we can not pay our rent; but I tell you, sir, we're not so poor that we can't do our own kissing."

In an Episcopal boarding-school, a few years since, the scholars and teachers were assembled for morning prayer. The reading and singing were over, and all were resuming their seats, when one of the young ladies, of a very short and thick stature, missing her chair, seated herself with a "thud" on the floor. Nobody smiled; all were too decorous for that. The fallen one, embarrassed into the momentary loss of common sense, retained her lowly seat, opened her prayer-book, and appeared to be earnestly engaged in examining its contents. This was almost too much for her companions, and a smile began to struggle on many a fair countenance, when the rector rose and commenced reading the first morning lesson. He chanced to read from the fifth chapter of Amos, as follows: "The virgin of Israel has fallen; she shall rise no more; she is forsaken upon her land; there is none to raise her up." This caused a general titter; the voice of the rector trembled as he looked up and saw the fallen virgin; the scholars turned red in the face, and the exercises were brought to a hasty close.

It must seem very strange to the statesmen of other nations that, while they are struggling with financial questions and striving to make their revenues meet their expenditures, the Government of the United States finds its embarrassment in the contrary direction. Our financial magnates, finding an excess of revenue, are devising means to avoid its collection, lest we should be driven to the alternative of boarding unused money in our national treasury, or the too sudden liquidation of our national debt. And this, too, when we are just recovering from the exhaustion of a civil war in which this abnormal debt was created. We may not make too great a reduction in our collection of tariff revenues, lest we fail in affording proper protection to our national industries. When we look to the source of internal revenue we meet with embarrassment, because alcoholic liquors, wines, tobacco, and cigars are luxuries which ought to pay duties. The removal of duty from tea and coffee made no perceptible reduction in the cost of those articles to the consumers. To remove duties from matches, to take the stamp-tax from checks, and to absolve banks from payment, will scarcely be felt by the people, and is not demanded by any popular voice. The truth is, the country is so prosperous in all its departments of industry that the present taxation is scarcely felt. It would seem to us, therefore, that it is better to continue the present taxation till we pay off our national debt. Let us achieve the proud distinction of anticipating our obligations, and becoming the only one of the great nations of civilization which has no national debt. When the debt is paid, it will be time enough to consider how we may best curtail our revenues without embarrassing our industries. In view of our present exceeding great prosperity, our abundant resources, and the future outlook, we regard with favor liberal disbursements for works of internal improvement, and favor generous pensions to the soldiers of our late war; and we should be glad to see the country most liberally provided with public edifices for Government use. This mode of distribution is one way to equalize the benefits of our present most prosperous condition. The money that comes from tariff and internal revenue collections is mostly from those who can well afford its payment; while its distribution to invalid soldiers and to working-men engaged in labor upon our public works, is healthful, and promotes the public good. If a continuance in this direction shall accumulate too much money in the national treasury, let it be divided to the States, in proportion to their respective populations. Our State taxes are now collected from real property. The only class of citizens that feels the burden of taxation is the men owning real estate. They would welcome a distribution by the General Government that would enable the State to pay its debts or reduce its taxes. Too much money is a danger we are disposed to confront with fearless confidence.

It is not generous to question the motives that control President Arthur and his administration in pushing the Star Route criminal as political offenders have been rarely pushed in this country. Colonel Bliss is a personal friend of the President. The Attorney-General is retained in his Cabinet, looks as though the Government was, in real earnest, determined to punish these offenders against the law. Colonel Robert Ingersoll is justified in doing all that lies within his power to acquit his clients; but the country does not believe them innocent. The country thinks they are thieves and conspirators, and the country is with the administration in their prosecution. Public opinion does not regard them as martyrs or as persecuted; and it will uphold the President, his Attorney-General, and his special counsel in a well-sustained effort to send them to State-prison, with their aiders and abettors. The country believes that there is a vicious and depraved sympathy for thieves among Washington office-holders, and that the good of the country demands their removal. And the friends of ex-President Garfield hope his name may not be invoked for their protection.

The Pope wants more money. A collection was taken up for him in all the churches by the authority of Joseph Sadoc Alemany, Archbishop of San Francisco. If his grace the archbishop could be appointed Park Commissioner, and listen to the pitiful appeals for labor made by poor Irishmen, and by their wives in behalf of their large families, his heart would be touched. He would perhaps think he could serve his Divine Master as acceptably in this direction as by sending money to his Holiness the Pope, and to the priests and cardinals living in luxurious idleness around the great Basilica of Saint Peter's, and spending their useless lives about the palace of the Vatican. Perhaps the reverend archbishop will permit us to direct these weeping women with their tales of suffering to him for the future, that he may give them some of the Pope's money. We should be very glad if Irish charity would be given to San Francisco Irish mendicants, and not be sent abroad to foment political intrigue in Ireland or maintain an idle priesthood at Rome. Let the Italian Church maintain itself by Italian beggary, Irish politics by begging in Ireland, and in San Francisco let the Irish rich take care of the Irish poor. Let Roman Catholic millionaires provide for Roman Catholic paupers. Let the Roman Catholic Church, with its vast landed wealth in San Francisco, take care of its Roman Catholic beggars, and not blame American Protestants if they close their ears, hearts, and pockets to Irish distress, while money is being sent by the thousands to advance political intrigue in Ireland and for the support of priestcraft at Rome.

The Italian government has been compelled to the service of civil writs upon the members of the Pope's household within the Vatican. This is construed by his Holiness as an indignity to the church. It is asserted to be in disregard of certain concessions and guarantees given by the Italian government when it made Rome the capital of Italy, and subordinated the authority of the church of Rome to the "state" of Italy. These concessions, like all privileges conceded by a conquering to a conquered power, exist at the will of the conqueror, and may be withdrawn at his pleasure. The Pope chooses to consider himself a prisoner within the Vatican. He sulks over his loss of civil authority, and endeavors to make himself, his cardinals, bishops, priests, Swiss soldiers, and servants, as vexatious and disagreeable as possible to the king and government of Italy and to the citizens of Rome. We can understand the embarrassments that must attend the administration of justice in the city of Rome if the king's writ may not run within the precincts of the Vatican, the Lateran, and the Castle Gondolfo. The annoyance is the more pronounced if this "city of refuge" within Rome's capital is in hostile and angry attitude toward the rightfully dominant authority, and gives willing protection to those who, under cloak of religion, conspire against the law. It must be an exceedingly great annoyance to the king and government of United Italy, to have within their jurisdiction this old concern of dead-men's bones, at the entrance of which sits mumbling this toothless monster, defying authority, and using his cave as a hiding-place for conspirators and a place of refuge for criminals. Let us conceive the Bishop of London, or the Archbishop of Paris, holding himself above the civil authorities of England or France, claiming that the authority of law or the mandate of courts should not penetrate to their palaces, setting at defiance the government by whose clemency he is permitted to live within its jurisdiction. Let us suppose that these bishops should set up the absurd and ridiculous claim that they are the vicereagents of God, that they are infallible, that they are above the law, that their spiritual authority outweighs and overrules the laws of the land—how long would England or France, or any other civilized government, rest patient under so absurd and monstrous a pretension? Suppose that by some miraculous display of divine power the Vatican, Lateran, and Castle Gondolfo could be set over upon our continent and plumped down in the United States, what would be the relation of all this time-honored pretension to our institutions? The Pope with his three-storied tiara, the cardinals with their red hats and red pantaloons, and all the other moss-covered and ivy-clad ruins of an age when superstition and ignorance made the pomp, ceremonial, and pretension of this great gilded thing seem real—what would we do with them? Wouldn't Judge bobby ferral's criminal writs run to it, through it, over it, and under it as freely as to, or through, or over, or under a darky meeting-house, whose venerable and bald-headed preacher had been suspected of burning sulphur under a chicken-roost? If England, France, Germany, or America would not endure this anomaly of a church within the State, pretending to be above the State, and at war with the State, then why should King Humbert and the Italian government not subject the Bishop of Rome—for he is that and nothing more—to the authority of Italian law? We shall send to the king of Italy this copy of the Argonaut, marked, as indicating our approval of his policy, and advising him to continue to exercise the kingly prerogative of governing united Italy in defiance of Pope or church.

We are getting just the least bit impatient at the laudations over the Horace Hawes Consolidation Act. If there was ever a law enacted for a city's government that worked badly, where it worked at all, it was this. It was the cranky output of a dyspeptic and ill-natured man, who was not in any sense a good lawyer, who thought everybody dishonest but himself, and who had but one engrossing idea, and that was to hedge municipal authorities around with restrictive and impracticable laws. This bill has been so amended and changed that it bears but little resemblance to its original self, and all that there is good in it does not belong to Horace Hawes. Had it been strictly enforced, San Francisco would have had "no debt or liability of any kind," but it would have had no government. Under it our Street Department became a robber's den, from which property was plundered. Under it we were taxed enormously, with little to show for it. Under it bosses thrived, thieves prospered, contractors grew rich, and rings multiplied. And now that fifteen freeholders—intelligent, honest, and representative men—are endeavoring to give us a new charter to accommodate itself to a new Constitution, the Bulletin drags out this old rattle-boned skeleton of crazy Horace Hawes, and shakes it like castanets in the hands of a colored end-man. We would not use slang, but we beg of the Bulletin to give us a rest. Let us see what this non-partisan body of freeholders will produce. When their work is done we can consider it. It is our judgment that these men are working with an honest purpose, that they possess ordinary intelligence, and that it savors of impudence for every popinjay of a newspaper writer to be thrusting unasked advice upon them.

The President thinks, and every intelligent and reasonable person agrees with him in thinking, that the Chinese restriction act demands an amendment which will permit Chinese laborers to pass through this country, on their way from their native land to other countries, and to return. The great object of the Chinese restriction law has been attained. It has arrested the invasion of Chinese laborers who come to this country for employment. The object is substantially accomplished, and if, in the enactment of a law that is an experiment, it is found that small vexations and unexpected embarrassments arise from its strict enforcement, then it should be amended, and Californians should be the first to consent thereto. That such vexations and embarrassments do occur under the strict enforcement of its technical provisions, all admit. There is no reason in common sense why a Chinaman, or any number of Chinamen, should not be permitted to make the United States a highway of travel to and from their native land. Every sentiment of generosity and justice demands this concession. Business interests demand it. If from Cuba or elsewhere a band of workmen desires to cross our continent by rail, there is no reason why they should not be permitted to do so. It is all bosh and arrogant demagogism to pretend that there is any danger of their taking advantage of this permission to remain in the country. We have a case in point: One year ago, a young English gentleman, Mr. Fearon, married one of our San Francisco belles, Miss Emily Torbert, and took up his residence in Hongkong, where he is a merchant. His wife is on her way, with her baby-boy and Chinese ahmah (nurse), to visit her parents. He writes to know whether the nurse will be permitted to land. The answer is, of course, that she will not be permitted to invade our soil. So this English-American baby must be deprived of his nurse while mother and child are visiting in San Francisco. Perhaps the Morning Call and Bulletin, whose editors have become the champion of this strict construction, will raise the question whether the baby is not Chinese, and whether in safety to republican institutions, and without imperiling the liberties of our people he can be brought ashore. A European traveling from India to England with his Chinese servant is not permitted to take him across our country. Chinese sailors going from San Francisco to a foreign port are not permitted to return. A Chinese laborer traveling from Detroit through Canada is not permitted to enter the United States at Niagara Falls, or to return to Detroit. This is the interpretation of idiots and demagogues who desire to pander to the prejudices of Irishmen. It is unworthy of Americans, and if the law bears the interpretation which these fools put upon it, it should be changed at once, and we assure our legislators in Congress that such a modification will be cheerfully accepted by all sensible and honest Californians.

OLLA-PODRIDA.

If the Nilsson is a success, the Langtry will come; or to put it financially, if Mr. Manager Abbey can pay Madame Nilsson eight thousand dollars for four nights in concert, pay her expenses for traveling, hotels, maids, carriages, etc., etc., and in addition pay the balance of the troupe, from the tenor down to the gentleman who beats the bass drum, and pay for the theatre, and gas, and the gentlemanly ushers, for the printing, and posting, and advertising, and make a little over for Mr. Abbey—if he can do all this, then he will venture further in the same line of business, and bring out the Langtry. The logic of our situation—that is, we of San Francisco—is this: If we do not pay to hear Nilsson sing, we shan't be permitted to pay to see Langtry's face, arms, frocks, legs, and things. To make the application personal, the writer, not being fond of music, having no love for the concord of sweet sounds, preferring to study the stratagems of politics, and to watch those struggling for the spoils of office; having no knowledge of the art, and not being able to discriminate between classical music and the overture of a saw-mill, must pay sixteen dollars to Mr. Abbey for account of Madame Nilsson, as preliminary to seeing Mrs. Langtry. We went around on Monday to secure tickets for the concert, and were informed that we must buy for the season, or wait till Wednesday, when, out of the seats that were left, we might be accommodated for one time—price, four dollars; family of four, for season, fifty-six dollars. Fifty-six dollars is the profit upon two thousand eight hundred Argonauts. Fifty-six dollars is the price of seven splendid volumes of the Encyclopedia Britannica, bound in Russia. Fifty-six dollars will purchase about eleven barrels of flour. Fifty-six dollars will take a family of four persons to the Golden Gate Park and return, where they may hear upon Wednesdays and Fridays, and, next summer, upon Sundays, a very excellent band of twelve pieces play most excellent music, one hundred and forty times, and the money thus paid to the Geary Street cable-road is kept in the country, and goes to the maintenance of wire-works at North Beach, of car factories, to pay for labor of conductors and engineers. It helps support the butcher, baker, and candlestick-maker, encourages the grocer and tailor, gives value to real property, and helps to build a great city with varied industries. In point of health it is better to drink in the ozone from the salt sea with the park music, than to swelter in the noxious atmosphere of a crowded theatre. It is not quite so genteel, but it is just as respectable, and, if our ladies will begin to encourage our park music, drive out on music days, sit in their carriages and listen, and let the pedestrians look at them; or, if those having no carriages will go by cable with their children, give countenance to and make fashionable the Golden Gate Park by lounging in it, by ordering lunches at the Casino, where everything is cheap, clean, and well conducted; visit the conservatory with its rare plants, and let the children play on the grass; take out the family dog and give him a chance to exercise; or, if too poor to go to the Casino, take a family lunch, hunt out a cozy nook under the oaks, or in a pine grove, and have a good time—if the ladies will inaugurate this reform, the time and money thus spent, we think, will be better spent than in paying Mr. Abbey four dollars to listen for an hour to the phenomenal music of the marvelously gifted Nilsson.

This is a good time and place to inform our readers that the Commissioners of the Golden Gate Park intend to surprise the citizens of San Francisco with a pleasure-resort of which they will in time be proud. The first thing to do is to subdue the shifting sand-dunes. This will be accomplished. The solution of this problem is found in a curious grass, which, being properly planted, sends its long, stout tap-root down to water, and lifts its strong, fibrous, grassy top to meet and hold the shifting sands. After this comes the planting, and this rainy reason will add one hundred and twenty-five thousand young and vigorous trees to the forest. Eighty-five thousand more young pines are started in the nursery for next year, and thus in time the ten hundred and fifty acres of Park lands will be in condition for converting into romantic and picturesque drives. A broad boulevard of four miles in extent, from the entrance to the ocean beach, will give the finest drive in America. The conservatory valley will have its trees removed, and will be devoted to lawns, flowers, and flowering shrubs. Surrounded by high trees, it will furnish an amphitheatre protected from the wind for music, accommodated with seats, surrounded by walks, roads, and picnic nooks. It will in five years become the model park of America. When the Geary Street Railroad will have sense enough to spend money to improve its Park entrance; when the new Haight Street cable-road will build for itself an ornamental entrance, and improve the grounds about it; when the two together shall contribute for some electric lights in the Park grounds, and give us a splendid band for Sundays; when the two roads shall build down on either side of the Park to the ocean, thus protecting it from the drifting sands; when the splendid ocean drive is built along the shore four miles in extent, (for this is the only park in the world that has an ocean drive;) when the great boulevard is completed and the Garfield monument constructed; and when the city fathers become convinced that it is best to spend money generously, if spent honestly, in improving Golden Gate Park—when all these things are done, then our people, rich and poor, will find themselves in possession and enjoyment of a beautiful pleasure-ground. In the meantime, the Park Commissioners ask the people to be patient, while, with limited funds, they contend with great obstacles in the accomplishment of their purpose. In about four years these Park Commissioners expect the people to rise up and call them blessed.

There is no device calculated to entertain and amuse our people—we mean, of course, innocent and inexpensive device—that does not bring profit to this city. If more pains were taken by the authorities to make San Francisco attractive; if our property-owners and business men would give greater attention to the proposition of rendering San Francisco an agreeable and pleasant residence for people of wealth and leisure, and if they would endeavor to bring a greater number of amusements within the reach of the poor and laboring classes, great profit would result from it. Great advances would be made in the value of real property, and business would be more active in every direction, while the effect of innocent recreations and healthful amusements would have a direct effect in suppressing crime, encouraging temperance, and promoting the welfare of all classes of society. It was a wise movement of Louis Napoleon to make Paris the pleasure resort of all the world. When, by widening avenues, opening boulevards, parks, and public gardens, giving government aid to operas and subsidizing theatres, encouraging art and art-galleries, learned men and libraries, he succeeded in making Paris the resort of the gay and pleasure-seeking idle rich folk of the world, he did a wise thing. He established order, gave prosperity to his people, made money plenty, and for himself secured repose for a longer time than would have been possible for a better and wiser monarch who had left his workmen unemployed and his laborers pinched for bread and wine. San Francisco should be the most desirable place of residence on this side of the continent. It should, from climate and location, become one of the world's resorts. To this city the wealthy and idle ones, whose principal aim is to kill time, and who are seeking health, pleasure, and a place to spend their money, should be invited by all sorts of attractions. Our authorities seem to exert themselves in the very opposite direction. Not only do they not invite strangers from abroad, but they are driving from residence among us all who have acquired money and have the disposition to spend it. Our places of public resort are few and mean. To compare a "jardin chantant" in the Champs Elysées with our Winter Garden, Tivoli, or Vienna Garden, would be "odorous," and yet in each are beer and music. Ours are cheap and not nice, and an admission fee is asked. In Paris the garden is free. For the attractive café of the broad boulevard, where one may sip "eau sucrée" for a sou, or "pousse-café" for half a franc, we have bar-rooms and beer-cellars, and corner groceries. Our theatres are not comparable. Our streets are abominable. Our park, with its thousand broad acres, its magnificent ocean beach, and its colony of sea-lions, has a beggarly allowance most grudgingly conceded to it, and altogether inadequate to its proper ornamentation, to give it broad drives, and to beat back and subdue the drifting sands. Our hack service must be an imposition in price if we are allowed to compare it with the comfortable fiacre and cab at one franc and a half for the first, and one franc for each succeeding hour. We may not expect in San Francisco art-galleries where pictures and marbles may be seen, or a grand opera house, built by an extravagant dynastic usurper, or palaces; but we see no good reason why we may not have pleasure resorts equal to the Bois de Boulogne, or parks equal to that of Monceau, or the Tuileries. We may have roads, ocean drives, pleasant places, and cheap amusements. We may at least have what other American cities have, and so far we are behind them all, simply because we are mean. Our ever-devilish press continually rants—and ignorantly rants—about low taxes and "one cent on the dollar." "Economy" is regarded as expressing everything that is demanded in the direction of good government. A little honest reflection upon the part of supervisors, editors, property-owners, and business people would justify the expenditure of a million of dollars by San Francisco annually in the direction of making it an agreeable and pleasant city for the residence of people of wealth and leisure. One of these days we shall suggest a mode of improving Portsmouth Square—the old "Plaza." It will cost not less than a million of dollars—perhaps more—but it will be money well spent, better spent than for churches, free libraries, Magdalen asylums, or reform schools. It will improve a now unsightly part of our city. It will advance the value of adjoining property. It will afford pleasure to everybody, and bring fun within the reach of the poor and respectable. In this direction of thought it occurs to us that next August the triennial conclave of Knights Templars, some ten thousand in numbers, is to take place in San Francisco. A more representative body of the intelligence and business thrift of the nation could hardly be found than in these men of the higher degree of the ancient and honorable order of Free and Accepted Masons. With them will come people of leisure, sight-seers, and tourists from all over the world. The States of Colorado, Nevada, and Oregon, and the Territories of Washington, Utah, and Arizona, will send all their people down upon us, and we must be prepared to accommodate and entertain them. First in order of preference, Sir Knight must have the best of everything, and only one in a bed. He must have of the firstlings of our flocks and first fruits. He must be stuffed with chickens and all the good things to eat, and he must have the opportunity to determine, with unbiased judgment, whether our wines contain too much or too little alcohol. We must stretch ourselves to the capacity of a hundred thousand guests thrown upon our hospitalities. We must make all these people feel that California is a good place to come back to and a good place to stay in. We would have all of them follow the example of those who, leaving Rome, fling an obolus into the fountain of Trevi, and accompany it with a wish that they may be permitted to return. The Roman gamin dives for the coin and steals it, but, all the same, everybody goes back to Rome. We shall make money out of this pilgrimage, and in that view our money-makers must not be stingy when Boruck goes out with his memorandum book and buckskin bag asking for coin.

Speaking of Rome, we say so many hateful things about Roman Catholics, that we print the following letter as a sop to our conscience—an oblation. It is from a Protestant San Francisco lady of New England birth and Puritan bome. Let our good Catholic readers peruse it, thank us for printing it, and not expect us to agree with the sentiment that would plant a "Rome in a republic," or a "Holy See" anywhere:

PARIS, June 20, 1882.—I am just "at home" after a Sabbath morning well spent in this alien city of Paris. It needed some courage to throw off my spirit of indifference, and wend my way, solitary and alone, to l'Eglise de la Madeleine; for I was tired and alone, and a stranger, and to every one in a strange land this cloud must come over the spirit at times. Last Sabbath I braved the elements, (for it rained withal,) and took the children to Notre Dame, not knowing that it was one of several Sabbath fêtes that take place at this season of the year. To-day was the last. I have read descriptions of these "fêtes de Dieu," but they failed to make the picture, as only words must fail. The picture is now mine, never to be forgotten, and with it the spirit, in part at least, to deepen and hold it fast in my memory. To take part in such a scene, with the devout spirit of a good Protestant, to receive from it that help to adoration and aspiration which it may give, is to be a good Catholic, and that I am this morning. I would that we had more such helps in our own cold, unimpassioned Protestantism. Mind you, I bar all considerations of dogmatism—it has nothing to do with the matter as I view it; but it is worth something to feel as well as to think, and just now this is my point of comparison. This beautiful Madeleine, with its classic Corinthian columns, has been draped during these fête days with scarlet and gold draperies. To-day its columns were wound with garlands, and tree-ferns placed between. Entering, it was filled with worshippers. And I went outside, where another entrance took me up to the galleries, where I could look down upon the gorgeous ceremonial at one end, to the organ-loft at the other, and both see and hear the responses of ceremonial and choir. At intervals the grandest harmonies I ever listened to surged and swelled through the great aisles from an invisible band of wind instruments. After mass there came in troops of little children, dressed in the purest white, wreaths upon their heads, bouquets of white flowers in their hands, guided here and there by a sweet-faced Sister of Charity. Following them came troops of maidens, veiled in white, with flowers. Then, again, matrons in similar attire, with flowers. The master-pieces of melody, the grand marches of Beethoven and Mendelssohn, pealed in unison with their steps toward the high altar, where they entered the great procession of priests and bishops, incense and rose leaves, strewn by little choir boys, filling the building with mingled fragrance. It was not all this that brought me to a realizing sense that I was something more than a stoic, as I looked for my much needed handkerchief, but it was the sight of the humanity about me on bended knees, with suffused faces and calm, reverent looks. The day was cloudy, and fortunately so for the out-of-door ceremonial, for the procession moved on with banner and music out into the wide corridors, where the great pillars and masses of flowers and ferns and garlands added to the spectacle. I was fortunate to find foothold upon the steps of the church and overlook not only the scene about me, but, as far as the eye could see in every direction through the streets, the mass of humanity gathered there. The central point of interest was, of course, the bishop under his canopy of satin; his robes and those of the priests were magnificent in their richness. Noble, silvered heads loomed up here and there, studies in themselves. Incense bearers and baskets of rose leaves signaled their approach, and mothers brought their children to be blessed; old men and women threw themselves before the "Holy Father;" maidens held up their flowers, and the benediction seemed to fall upon us all. I have been wondering if, after all, it would be so great a calamity for the "Holy See" to establish itself upon our continent, and our New York become the Rome of our Republic. A Rome in a republic, a land of free schools and of independent thought, could never be a Rome of superstition, of ignorance, and of tyranny. It might equalize, spiritualize; equalize, in the sense of softening convictions without enslaving them; spiritualize, in the sense of freeing our spirits from the bondage of hard conventionalism. Why should not the Church be a mother to her children, caring for its babes, its young men and maidens, its old and infirm, its poor in spirit of every condition? It is the only church which seems to give help and succor when all else fails. Do not think me wild. I only write upon the impulse of the moment. A few days and it will be forgotten, perhaps. But I am free to admit that for rest from this vexed world it seems a blessing rather than otherwise to be a child in the fold.

TALLY-HO!

How the Institution of Fox-hunting is Maintained in England.

Although an exciting session is engaging the attention of Parliament, the furor attending the welcoming home of the victorious army from Egypt with Sir Garnet—I beg his pardon, Lord Wolseley—at its head, has not yet died out; and town, for the double purpose of law-making and hero-worshipping, is said to be unusually full. The first days of fox-hunting have been by no means neglected by the peers and members of the House of Commons, who are always supposed to hunt "only when they can," any more than by the public-service-untrammelled devotees of the noble sport, which, according to Anthony Trollope, is "not susceptible of being taken out of England." In November, fox-hunting begins all over England. There may, of course, be a stray meet or two during the latter weeks of October, to get people, as it were, into proper swing for the real business of the following month. Nobody, though, ever counts on getting really to work till November. There is, however, throughout October, plenty of cub-hunting, as rattling about the young foxes is called, to see what they are like and to blood the young hounds. There is a good deal of fun and sport to be had in cub-hunting, even though it is done in an artificial sort of fashion, and has none of the "style" that makes fox-hunting so popular and attractive to some persons. But as one of its conditions is getting out of bed before sunrise—autumn sunrises, themselves, being cold enough for most people—a cub-hunting party which consists of twelve, all told, may be considered a good one, notwithstanding that the M. F. H., the huntsman, and both "whips" be included in the dozen. Therefore, hunting, in its truest sense, may be safely dated every year from the first week in November.

Hunting in England is of three kinds; that is to say, it consists of riding on horseback in chase of a fox, a stag, or a hare. If the game hunted be a fox, it is done with fox-hounds; if a stag, with stag or buck hounds; if a hare, with harriers. Fox-hunting is the most popular and common of the three, and it is safe to assume when "hunting" is mentioned that fox-hunting is meant. It might be proper to state here that shooting is never called hunting in England, as in America, nor is a sportsman called a hunter. Taking into consideration the immense number of English novels imported, reprinted, sold, and read in America, in which hunting is spoken of or referred to, in many cases its incidents made the chief features of the plot, it is surprising how little trouble the authors ever put themselves to make themselves understood by people whom they must be aware are ignorant of the ways and customs, peculiarities, and lingo of the hunting-field. Whatever people may have done in Virginia "before the war" in the way of fox-hunting, it was very different from the English sport. There was but one thing in common—which was, that a fox was the animal hunted. But the fox of the Southern States is gray instead of red, and is as incapable of going straight across country for fifty minutes with the pack hard at him as a French poodle. The face of the country is unlike, also. Wild woodlands, full of dense brakes and swamps impassable for horses, take the place of the forty-acre fields smooth as a carpet, without a brush to stint the rattling gallop of the thoroughbreds; and snake rail-fences are there instead of old white-thorn hedges with double ditches.

The regular hunting season continues from November till April, and every man who can afford it, and whose time is his own, from nobleman and commoner down to squire and farmer, hunt. In hunting parlance, the hounds are called "the pack," and a pack of hounds consists, not of so many hounds, but of so many "couples." A pack of fox-hounds numbers from fifty to seventy couples, a pack of stag-hounds thirty couples, and a pack of harriers fifteen couples. There are in England and Wales no less than one hundred and thirty-eight packs of fox-hounds, containing five thousand eight hundred couples of hounds; while in Scotland there are eight packs, with three hundred and forty-five couples; and in Ireland eighteen packs, with seven hundred and eighty-two couples. Of packs of stag-hounds, England contains, including "Her Majesty's," whose master is the Earl of Cork, over ten, with two hundred and twenty-seven couples of hounds between them; while in Ireland there are four packs, with ninety-seven couples. Then, besides these, there are in England and Wales one hundred and seventeen packs of harriers and beagles, with one thousand six hundred and fourteen couples; in Ireland, forty-five packs, with eight hundred and ten couples; and in Scotland, two packs, with thirty-seven couples; giving a total of over nineteen thousand five hundred hounds in the United Kingdom, kept up exclusively for hunting purposes. Rather a good showing as to the popularity of the sport.

These packs of hounds are either owned by some one nobleman or gentleman of private means, who keeps them at his own expense, or they are kept up by subscription by a number of gentlemen, who are called "members of the hunt." Each pack of hounds is managed, controlled, and taken care of by one member, who is called the "master" of the hounds. When the hounds are owned by one man, and kept up by him, he is the master, naturally; but in other cases the master is chosen by the members of the hunt. The Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Grafton, Lord Fitzwilliam, Lord Portsmouth, the Earl of Zetland, Lord Yarborough, and other noblemen, have packs of their own, and of which they are the masters. The hounds and the hunt to which they belong—each hunt being limited within certain geographical lines—all have some distinctive title, taken either from the owner or the county or locality in which they are kept and hunted. Thus, the Duke of Rutland's are called the "Belvoir," (pronounced Beever), from Belvoir Castle, his grace's place in Leicestershire, or the pack may simply be called Lord So-and-so's, or Mr. So-and-so's hounds; or they may be called the "Pytchley," the "Atherstone," the "Hampshire," or the "Warwickshire." The place where the master keeps the hounds is called "the kennels." Each master has under him, and attached to each pack of hounds, two or three huntsmen, or "whippers-in," who are designated the first, second, or third "whips"; or the first may be called the "huntsman," and the other two the "whips."

For beginning a hunt is half past ten to eleven A. M. The place within the miles of the "country," as it is called, of the pack, is named by the master, or M. F. H., (Master of Fox-hounds), as he is commonly termed, for the beginning of the hunt, and is published in the papers of the neighborhood and in the general sporting papers published in London. The dates and places of meeting are usually published one week ahead, and are called "Hunting Appointments." A pack of hounds is hunted—i. e., used in hunting—about four days a week. The place named for the hunt to begin is called the "meet," and there, all who wish to take part in the hunt assemble at the appointed hour. If it is a fox-hunt, the place of the "meet" is selected with regard to its being at or near a spot where foxes abound. This spot is called the "covert," and may be an osier-bed, furze, (called "gorse" in Leicestershire,) or any timber or underwood. The owners of property who are hunting men, and few are not, consider it a slur upon them if no fox is found upon their land when the hounds meet on their estates, and it is not uncommon for a gentleman to dismiss his head game-keeper in consequence. When the stated hour arrives, the hounds in charge of the master and his subordinates, proceed to "draw the covert"; that is, the hounds are allowed to seek a fox in the covert. This "drawing" of the covert is also called "throwing off." If a fox is started from the covert, it is said to be a "find," and that the hounds have "found," but if no fox appears and makes away, or the hounds show no signs of scenting him, the covert is said to have "drawn blank," and another covert is resorted to. If a fox is "found" and makes off, the hounds start after him, the horsemen following, the signal being given by the cry of "Hark, tally-ho! Gone away!" The hounds follow the fox and the riders the hounds, and they both follow the fox wherever he may go, straight across the face of the country. Hunting is therefore called "riding across country," that is to say, roads are not kept to, but fields, meadows, pastures, etc., are ridden over, and impediments in the shape of hedges, ditches, gates, palings, walls, fences, rivulets, and brooks, jumped by the horses of the riders. The hounds follow the fox by scent until they see him, when they follow by "view." Then what is called the "view holloa" is given by whoever is near enough to see. When the fox is run into and caught by the hounds, they tear him to pieces and he is quickly devoured. The tail, which is called the "brush," is rescued by some person who gets "in at the death," as it is termed; also the skin of the face, which is called the "pate," and the four feet, which are called the "pads." The brush, of right, belongs to the first person in, but it is usually presented to a lady who has distinguished herself in some way, as a memento. The pate comes next in dignity to the brush, and then the pads. A fox-hunt lasts any time from ten or twenty minutes to two hours—sometimes, though rarely, longer—and depends for its duration on the energy and strategy of the fox. Very often the fox gets away altogether. He either tires the hounds out, they lose his scent, or he "runs to ground," the latter meaning that he escapes into his hole or that of some other fox. When the hounds lose the scent they are said to be "at fault," and hinderances to a continuous run are called "checks." A male fox is a "dog," and a female a "vixen."

The dress worn in fox-hunting is a scarlet coat, single-breasted and cut away, with brass buttons on which is the crest or monogram of the hunt; white cork breeches, "top" boots with light-brown tops; either a high black hat or a round-topped black velvet cap, called a "billy-cock," and a white-linen scarf with a pin in it. A hunting-whip called a "crop"—i. e., a short stick, like a walking-stick, with a long leather thong-lash to it—is carried by all hunting men. Steel or silver-plated spurs, buckled on, are also worn. The dress worn at a stag hunt is the same, except that a black coat takes the place of the scarlet. Black coats, however, are nowadays seen at fox-hunts more frequently than they used to be. Indeed, at some hunts black coats are almost as common as red. It is a pity, for the picturesqueness of the field is greatly marred by it. In hunting with harriers a dark-green coat is worn. Horses ridden in hunting are called "hunters." If the meet is some distance away from where a man lives, he sends his hunter on in charge of a groom on another horse, and either drives, or rides a horse called a "covert hack." This is called "riding to covert." On reaching the covert he mounts the hunter. A horse good at jumping fences is known as a good "fencer." All jumps, except ditches and "water" (brooks) are called fences. Fences, other than hedges and walls, are called "timber." A "bullfinch" is a thick, quickset thorn hedge. If a horse falls with his rider, or both get a fall, the rider is said to have "come a cropper." If an accident prevents a rider from continuing in the run, he is said to have "come to grief," which is the origin of the expression, now so general. A "stiff" country is one with many difficult jumps in it. The cry of the hounds is called "music" and "giving tongue." "Full cry" is when they yelp together. The course of a hunt is called the "run."

The best hunting in England is to be had in Leicestershire and Northamptonshire. Melton-Mowbray, which lies conveniently situated to the two counties, is the resort of the élite of fox-hunting every season. It is here that James Gordon Bennett has had a stable full of hunters for some years. The town is filled up with villas, empty except from November to April, and abounds in stables—for every man who goes to Melton-Mowbray to hunt takes with him, or sends on ahead, from twenty to thirty horses; for, besides others too numerous to mention, he is within reach of the Pytchley and the Quorn, the two most famous packs in all England. All over England hunting is indulged in, and there is hardly a corner in the land from which a "meet" can not be conveniently got to three days a week while the season lasts. But whoever wants hunting in its perfection, and desires to see it carried on in all the beauty of old customs and traditions strictly adhered to, must make Melton-Mowbray his headquarters.

The Prince of Wales does a little hunting in a quiet way, now and then. Of course, there is no end of a fuss made over him when he does go out. But there are better riders to hounds than his royal highness, just as there are better shots; and it is not altogether unlikely there are many people who like hunting better than he does. He has to do a good many things not to his liking, for popularity's sake; but he gets his taste gratified pretty often, too, when he is asked to preside at a good dinner.

LITERARY NOTES.

"Winning His Way," by Charles C. Coffin, first appeared in Our Young Folks as a serial. It now appears in book form, illustrated very copiously and elaborately bound. Although what might be termed an impossible story, it is entirely wholesome. Published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; for sale by the booksellers.

Mr. Frank Cassaway during the past summer made a tour of the California watering-places. He wrote many descriptions of these for the San Francisco Post. He has now collected these letters and published them under the heading of "Derrick Dodd's Summer Saunterings." For sale by the booksellers; price, 50 cents.

For some time the public has heard nothing of Mr. C. A. Stephens, who, about eight years ago, wrote a number of delightful hunting stories. He has finally emerged from his obscurity, and written a volume entitled "The Young Moose-Hunters." As usual, the story is laid in the Maine forests, and it shows that the writer has lost none of his old charm. Published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; for sale by the booksellers.

J. T. Trowbridge has for years been entertaining the successive juvenile generations with healthful stories. Although his work in this particular line is not characterized by special ability, there is a certain charm about his books that marks him as one of the children's most popular story-tellers. "The Jolly Rover" is his latest venture. It is after the "Jack Hazard" order. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by Bancroft; price, $1.25.

"Three Vassar Girls Abroad," by Lizzie W. Champney, is the latest volume of travel. Its binding is gorgeous, being designed from a Moorish interior. There are numerous illustrations, the better part of which are new impressions of the old plates used in the American edition of "Guizot's French History." The travels are confined to France and Spain, and are exceedingly harmless in their way. Published by Estes & Lauriat, Boston; for sale by the booksellers; price, $1.50.

"Our Boys in India" is by H. W. French, who issued about a year ago a story entitled "Nana, the Brahmin Girl." The present narrative details the wanderings of two young Americans through the wild mountains and mysterious regions of Hindustan. There is a sufficient thread of story to lend a greater interest to the descriptive portions. The volume contains over a hundred excellent illustrations. Published by Lee & Shepard, Boston; for sale by C. Beach; price, $1.75.
